[Excerpt] Torremolinos--Prime Minister Adolfo Suarez admitted yesterday to the 1,800 party members attending the closing session of the Union of the Democratic Center [UCD] of Andalusia's first congress-assembly that his party is alone, surrounded by demagoguery and besieged by contempt, and that it may have made mistakes but this was for the good of Andalusia; expressed his conviction that these mistakes will be forgotten "when blindness ceases to prevent people from seeing that we have offered the only safe path for building the state of the autonomies"; promised Andalusia that it will be denied nothing either in powers or in autonomous institutions in comparison with Spain's other communities, and that, if this is not so, the UCD should be called to account in the ballot box by refusing to vote for it in the next elections; and asked the Andalusian people in return to "unmask the demagogues and restore to the UCD the prestige which it has been denied."

Whenever Adolfo Suarez made these assertions during his speech, the centrist party members responded with stormy applause, lavished in particular when the party chairman abandoned defensive stances to attack the right and left--the latter more than the former. However, he devoted one of the most deliberate sentences in his speech to [Democratic Coalition leader] Manuel Fraga Iribarne, without mentioning him, when he stated: "If we are doing so badly, I cannot understand why some people wish to hold a small portion of power with us."

"It is being said by the extreme rightwing and by the leftwing press in order to discredit us," he stated at another point, "that we effected the transition well but are no longer any good for this postconstitutional stage. [paragraph continues]

"However, these are the same people who were telling us 2 years ago that we were handling the transition badly and soon, when they have to acknowledge that we are building the state of the autonomies correctly and tackling the economic crisis successfully, they will be asserting that we are no good for the Spain of 1983."

He answered these criticisms by saying that the UCD is where it has always been--neither more rightwing nor more leftwing--and that for this reason any plan to broaden the government's majority will be from a viewpoint strictly "of the center and for the center."

He stated that there is a lack of honesty on the part of those who speak of the UCD's isolation: "We are not suddenly alone; we have always been alone," he said. "We came into being alone, and this demonstrates our servitude and greatness: to receive blows from both sides in order to avert the historic confrontation of Spain's two hostile blocs."

He acknowledged the existence of problems in the party but said that they are not consuming it: "The cries invented by our opponents do not weaken us but strengthen us," he said. Adolfo Suarez called on the other parties, especially the Spanish Socialist Workers Party, to concern themselves more with their own problems because, although the UCD is a young party, others are more inexperienced, despite their years. "The opposition," he stated, "has accused us of lacking ideas and personnel and they harass us with acts of interference in our affairs; they tell us every day what we must do, and, in the meantime, we still do not know what their alternative is, if they have one."

Justification of Autonomy Policy

Adolfo Suarez devoted much of his speech at the congress-assembly's closing session to justifying the government's autonomy policy and to explaining the Andalusian UCD's setback, not so much in terms of its own mistakes but rather in terms of what he regards as a demagogic campaign by the opposition, which has abused the Andalusian people's good faith. He denied that, as has been said, the UCD is opposed to autonomy and to Andalusia because that would be tantamount to running counter to itself.

"I ask the Andalusian people," he said, "to judge the UCD severely and to refuse to vote for it in the next elections if this autonomy which they obtain is inferior to the Basque or Catalonian autonomy. Nothing that Andalusia wishes to have will be denied and neither powers nor their substance will be limited."

Reaffirming what he said in his recent speech in the Congress of Deputies, he interpreted the Constitution to mean that article 151 is appropriate only for certain historical communities, without directly mentioning Catalonia, the Basque Country and Galicia. He accused the opposition of political inconsistency and demagoguery for pressing for the generalization of this course. He specifically reproached the Socialists for seeking to amend the organic law on various kinds of referendum, 6 months after voting in favor of it. "Once more we must say 'no,'" he said, "because we must defend the state's stability and this will cause very harsh words to be leveled against us, but time will prove us correct."

CARRILLO URGES UNITY OF ACTION BY COMMUNISTS, SOCIALISTS

LD121035 Madrid MUNDO OBRERO in Spanish 10 Jun 80 p 2

[Jose Bollix report on PCE Secretary General Santiago Carrillo 8 June speech at rally in Leon: "Progressive Forces Must Count in Government"]

[Excerpts] Leon--"We are proud of our party's history," Santiago Carrillo explained at the start of his address to the rally in Leon commemorating the PCE's 60th anniversary.

"Sometimes," he continued, "it is clear that the people do not understand what we Communists do and this is not entirely due to journalists... It is due to the fact that almost all the media are owned by the Union of the Democratic Center [UCD], capitalists and the rightwing parties. Therefore journalists do not have the freedom to do their informational duty--and not only because there are civil and sometimes military courts, which violate the Constitution and put them on trial."

Television Debate

Next Santiago Carrillo explained how the people are really interested in political topics and cited the example of the parliamentary debate broadcast on radio and television.

"The people saw that not all deputies are the same and that we cannot all be lumped together. We supported the motion of censure introduced by the Socialist comrades without asking for anything in return. We would," he explained, "support a possible future Socialist prime minister just as we are hoping for the Spanish Socialist Workers Party's [PSOE] support when a Communist is nominated for this post of government leader.

"There will not always be 23 Communist deputies in the Congress of Deputies. There will be more and more and we will not present ourselves as the only government alternative, even when we have gained a majority. All the progressive forces are and will continue to be necessary for governing our country," he said.

"Our political and economic crisis," he said, "will not be resolved by Adolfo Suarez' replacement with another of the UCD 'barons.' We need a different government with a different policy, including the progressive forces, the workers' real representatives," he explained.

"In this country the censure motion is supported by the majority of voters, while Suarez has only about 6 million votes for the UCD. Therefore we Communists believe that the political action begun with this debate must be brought into the streets. This is the only way to prevent the censure motion from being forgotten. To this end the PCE, the PSOE and all the progressive forces must bring this political action into the streets. Therefore, the unitary spirit apparent at the PSOE grass roots should be adopted by the PSOE leaders.

"The PSOE leaders must understand that we Communists are their natural allies. And that problems are not to be resolved by flattering Mr Fraga Iribarne. This gentleman knows very well where he stands, with his 7-8 deputies.... But if Mr Fraga became interior minister again...then we would have to see what Mr Fraga would do again.

"Now that leftwing unity is more necessary than ever in Europe, now that Mitterrand and Berlinguer and the PCE are trying to prevent the cold war from 'heating up' and the fight from growing stronger, there must be understanding and joint action between Spanish Communists and Socialists. We agree with them on all essential topics concerning foreign policy. Why do they not want us to reach an agreement on domestic policy? It is not our fault, of course. The desire for a prominent role on the part of certain PSOE leaders is negative and is leading nowhere. We are willing to support Felipe Gonzalez because our interests are the interests of the workers and of democracy."

ULLSTEN DISCUSSES USSR DURING HUANG HUA'S SWEDISH VISIT

LD121445 Stockholm DAGENS NYHETER in Swedish 10 Jun 80 p 11

[Kaa Eneberg report: "Huang Hua on Visit to Sweden: Afghanistan Platform for Soviet Expansion"]

[Excerpt] It is of the greatest importance that the Soviet Union's expansion in Asia is stopped as soon as possible. The Russians have already succeeded in making Afghanistan and Kampuchea platforms for further expansion in the future. This was the message that visiting Chinese Foreign Minister Huang Hua gave to Foreign Minister Ola Ullsten (People's Party) during the almost day-long talks that took place on Monday, the first day of his visit.

According to information received by DAGENS NYHETER, Ola Ullsten pointed out that the Swedish Government strongly condemned the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan and at the same time questioned the presence of Vietnamese troops in Kampuchea. But Ola Ullsten stressed that the Swedish view of the crises is nevertheless different from the Chinese. For Sweden a Soviet withdrawal of troops from Afghanistan is a first step on the road to detente.

Huang Hua, however, advocated a more "offensive" solution without giving a clearer indication of what the Chinese envisage. He pointed out that Beijing considers the Russian threat to Afghanistan's and Kampuchea's neighbors to be great--perhaps not this year or next, but in the long term.

The aggressive Chinese criticism of the Soviet Union came as no surprise to the Swedish Government. The visit, which also includes Norway and Denmark, reciprocal accusations against each other from both Beijing and Moscow. In a situation where international tension continues to rise [as published]. This has found expression in among other things the warning to the Scandinavian governments and Ola Ullsten, published in the party organ PRAVDA on Sunday, that to receive the Chinese leader is to contribute to increased tension. This conflicts with the desire to contribute to detente that Ola Ullsten expressed during his visit to Moscow recently, the newspaper said.

At Monday's talks at Haga Palace and the Foreign Ministry the impression was created that tension between the two great powers is on the increase.

Out of the desire to ensure that Sweden does not get caught up on the carousel, official Swedish spokesmen are trying to tone down the criticism that Huang Hua voiced. The tone of his criticism is described as pedagogical and, "considering it is Chinese, extremely calm, muted and generally low key."

Huang Hua said in part that the threat from the Russians must be considered to have increased appreciably in recent weeks, when the Russians have strengthened their positions in Afghanistan. He claimed that the Russians have more than 100,000 men stationed there.

Despite protests against the presence of almost as many Vietnamese soldiers in Kampuchea, Huang Hua refrained from criticism of Swedish aid projects in the war-torn country. Sweden has chosen to support both the refugees near the Thai border--who the Heng Samrin government claims are pawns in the Chinese political game--and the Heng Samrin Government in the capital of Phnom Penh. Nor did the Chinese delegation mention the Swedish decision not to agree to the boycott of the Olympic games in Moscow this summer initiated by the United States.

Ola Ullsten himself raised the topic of his talks with the Russian leaders in the Kremlin recently. He described them as a very open discussion during which he stated the critical Swedish view of the invasion of Afghanistan.

PYM: REVIEW OF NUCLEAR POLICY DEPENDS ON SOVIET ACTIONS

LD121832 London PRESS ASSOCIATION in English 1735 GMT 12 Jun 80

[Text] Britain might review its nuclear arms policy if the Soviet Union agrees to negotiate the withdrawal of its SS-20 missiles, Defence Secretary Mr Francis Pym said today.

His cautious comments came in the Commons after questions by opposition leader Mr James Callaghan.

Mr Callaghan asked: "If Chancellor Schmidt's visit to Moscow should produce any indication that the Soviet Union is ready to enter into negotiations to withdraw the SS-20 missiles in exchange for the abandonment of cruise missile deployment, would the British Government be ready to support such an initiative?"

Mr Pym replied that attached to the NATO decision last December was "a very positive arms control initiative" which has not been taken up by Russia and had received only a negative response so far.

"If they change their tune then that is a totally new situation," Mr Pym said.

"If there is going to be a response, then naturally full consideration will have to be given at that time as to what our response would be."

Opposition MPs expressed alarm about the United States proposed nuclear exercises, during which an unarmed Minuteman missile is expected to be fired.

Shadow Defence Secretary Mr William Rodgers, who had asked for a statement about the exercises, said "many of us loyal to the Alliance believe that in the present circumstances this could be the wrong exercise, in the wrong place, at the wrong time."

The exercises are expected to take place in a few weeks time in the United States and part of the Pacific by American-based forces.

Mr Pym said: "This is a routine exercise, announced a month ago, involving U.S. based strategic forces."

It was "extremely important" that all the forces of all the Alliance were involved in regular routine exercises, he added.

GOVERNMENT TO SEND ROYAL MARINES TO NEW HEBRIDES

LD111702 London PRESS ASSOCIATION in English 1605 GMT 11 Jun 80

[By PA parliamentary staff]

[Text] A company of Royal Marines is being sent to Vila in the New Hebrides, the government announced today. And the French Government today despatched a contingent of gendarmes from Noumea in New Caledonia, Foreign Office Minister of State Mr Peter Blaker told the Commons.

The security situation in the New Hebrides had deteriorated. "I regret that last night on the island of Tanna, Alexis Yolou, an opposition political leader on the island was killed; the exact circumstances of his death are not yet clear."

But there was fierce criticism from Mrs Gwyneth Dunwoody, from the opposition front bench, who said the government approach "resulted in not solving one revolution but fomenting another insurrection at the same time."

Violence flared in the island of Tanna last night after a rebellion on the island of Espiritu Santo by secessionists against their British and French rules.

Meanwhile in the Lords, Foreign Secretary Lord Carrington warned that it would not be proper for the British and French governments to hand over independence to islands in a state of insurrection. Keeping to July 30 would depend on circumstances, "that goes without saying," he added. The Royal Marines would arrive on Saturday and the French gendarmes were due to arrive today on Vila, added Lord Carrington.

In the Commons, Mr Blaker said that the Royal Marines were being flown to Port Vila with a "headquarters element and logistic support." But he assured MPS that the situation in Tanna was now peaceful, and that there were two platoons of mobile police units there--one British and one French. Of the decision last week not to take military action, Mr Blaker said: "The circumstances have now changed, and we were right last week to reply on negotiations."

Negotiations had not succeeded, but the government still hoped to persuade both sides in Santo to resume talks. "The French have considerable influence on Santo, and we will exercise with them to get both parties to cooperate," he said.

He told Mrs Dunwoody: "Military action is not necessarily going the solve the problem. The people in the New Hebrides have to live together in the future. We want to create a situation in which the basic problems are resolved." Mr Blaker said: "The right posture for us to adopt is one of caution but resolution. The dispatch of the troops shows our resolution."

He noted that the opposition was divided, after West Lothian MP Mr Tam Dalyell, chairman of Labour's backbench Foreign Affairs Committee, remarked that it was always more difficult to take troops out than to put them in. Some Labour MPs had "very grave doubts" about the government's action, said Mr Dalyell.

Mr Blaker said the object of sending the marines and gendarmerie in was "to provide stability on the island so that negotiations can better be resumed." He told Mr Paul Dean (conservative, Somerset North) that he hoped the presence of the troops would not necessarily be for long. The government's plan for the island was "to leave it in a condition where its people are prepared to live together with one another in peace."

Bolsover's Labour leftwinger Mr Dennis Skinner said the government's declared reasons for sending the troops in were "almost identical" to those used by the Soviet Union when invading Afghanistan. But Mr Blaker told him the troops were being sent in to create stability.

The marines and gendarmerie would work in co-operation and in the last resort come under the command of the resident commissioners, he said.

Mr James Kilfedder (Ulster Unionist, Country Down North) asked whether the government had protested to the U.S. Government over the activities of an "American organisation which has been fomenting the rebellion" on the island.

Mr Blaker said they had been in touch with the U.S. Government, who had said that if they could obtain the necessary evidence, they would prosecute the individuals concerned.

Asked by Labour's Mr Stan Newens (Harlow) to confirm that the French settlers bore "considerable responsibility" for the revolt, Mr Blaker replied it was true that some French settlers had been co-operating with Jimmy Stevens--the secessionist leader on Espiritu Santo. But he insisted the French Government was resolved to restore the integrity of the New Hebrides and solve the problem of Santo.

Plans Operative Despite French Withdrawal

[By Paul Harris, PA staff reporter]

[Excerpts] Marine commandos on standby to go anywhere in the world were today set to fly out to the trouble-torn New Hebrides.

A company from the current "Spearhead" battalion will go some time this afternoon, following the bow and arrow rebellion on the island of Espiritu Santo.

It was announced in the Commons yesterday that the marines would be sent to restore law and order.

And according to the barracks at Bickleigh, Plymouth, the 170 men of the 42 Commando, Royal Marines, are "just waiting for the word to move".

The marines' operation will continue despite reports that the French were withdrawing their 55-strong para-military force of "Garde Mobile" from Vila less than 24 hours after it landed. A Defence Ministry spokesman, commenting on the reports from the New Hebrides, said: "There is no change in our plans. Our operation will continue."

The French Government has told the New Hebrides Government that the situation there was calm and the force, which had flown in from New Caledonia, was no longer needed. The marines had intended to work closely with the gendarmes.

I SIMERINI CRITICIZES U.S. FOREIGN POLICY AS 'INHUMAN'

[Editorial: "The U.S. Calculations...."]

[Excerpts] The electronic computer of the U.S. has failed, flashing an attack against the United States. An alert signal was given, the U.S. defense mechanism was set into operation and only a few minutes later it would have developed into an offensive operation. Finally, the fault was detected and a calamitous mistake was avoided.

Of course, U.S. officials are not famous for their successes. The Americans came out of World War II as saviors, liberators and defenders of the people's liberty. In a few decades, they have managed to be stigmatized by almost everyone as relentless opportunists who erect their economic trophies on the blood of innocent people.

U.S. foreign policy is completely bankrupt. The U.S. political-military allies in Europe and elsewhere no longer trust its ability to make the correct assessments and decisions. The Americans have failed everywhere.

What happened in Cyprus? When Carter, with his experience in marketing peanuts, assumed the office of President, he promised to implement principles in the Cyprus issue. He promised assistance. He promised to stand in favor of justice and the freedom of the Cypriot people and of Cyprus' territory. What has he done? Just the opposite. Instead of helping the victim of the invasion he helps the Turkish invader. Why? Because the Turk uses blackmail, for Turkey has common borders with the Soviet Union and the social revolution shaking Turkey could possibly bring Turkey closer to Moscow.

U.S. foreign policy is not based on true interests. Its appraisals are not made by human beings but by machines. Machines cannot find solutions to human problems; they give inhuman decisions.... Cyprus has been betrayed by the U.S. leaders, who have been misled by their computers and their interests. Cyprus has not been destroyed by imperialism as the leftist parties naively advocate. Cyprus has been destroyed mainly through its own mistakes and sins. There is no doubt, however, that the Americans have been rubbing their hands...and the Russians have been grinning....

It has always been the assessment of this column that Western quarters as well as the Americans are probably the only ones who can have and do have a true interest in solving the Cyprus problem. We do not know what their "electronic computers" say. We do not know if they have concluded that it doesn't matter to the Americans, if Cyprus becomes Turkish. If this is the conclusion, however, they will be led into new mistakes. Even though Cyprus is very small and weak, its unsolved problems may create new bankrupt situations for U.S. foreign policy. This is why now is the time for the United States to sincerely develop a new initiative for a just and workable Cyprus solution that is unrelated to its computers and that is based on a new mentality and on new, human U.S. approaches to the dramatic problems of weak people in general and of Cyprus in particular, which has been dealt so much injustice by what the United States has or has not done.

TURKISH OFFICIAL RENOUNCES KIPRIANOU VISIT TO CSSR

TA121146 (Clandestine) Bayrak Radio in English to Cyprus 1115 GMT 12 Jun 80

[Text] Acting President of the Federated State Mr Korhan has said that Mr Kiprianou's visit to Czechoslovakis posing as the president of the Cyprus Republic is a violation of relevant UN resolutions and international agreements. In a letter to President Husak of Czechoslovakia, Mr Korhan said that any agreement signed in Czechoslovakia by Mr Kiprianou would not be binding on the autonomous Turkish Federated State of Cyprus. Mr Korhan stressed that due to periodic armed onslaughts by the Greek Cypriot side on the Turkish Cypriot cofounder partner of the binational republic from 1963 to 1974, the constitutional machinery in the island had collapsed and the Greek Cypriots had no right to represent the Cyprus Republic or any of its legitimate organs in the absence of the Turkish cofounder partner. This fact, Mr Korhan added, was confirmed by the efforts of the UN secretary general aimed at having the Cyprus problem settled through the intercommunal negotiations on the agreed bases of reestablishing the binational government within the framework of a bizonal federal system.

I SIMERINI REPORTS AKEL PROMOTING NEW RIGHTWING PARTY

[Text] According to our verified information, serious political undercurrents have been developing rapidly since the outbreak of the disagreement between AKEL and Kiprianou. Specifically, we have been informed that AKEL is encouraging the establishment of a new rightwing political party.

Basically this new party will be composed of persons who served as ministers during Makarios' rule, including Tasos Papadhopoulos.

As a counteraction to these moves, Spiros Kiprianou seems to be strengthening the line of Azinas, Al. Mikhailidhis and the archbishop, which will also be protrayed as a party following Makarios' line. According to indications, this line, which will aim at de-activating the AKEL attempt, will also be supported by Lissaridhis' EDEK party.

It has been assessed that AKEL does not seem to know exactly what the next step will be--which is why, in his latest speech at the Elevtheria square gathering, AKEL Secretary General Papaioannou said a lot without actually mentioning what he would do about the president and his government.

AT121508 Athens Armed Forces Television Service in Greek 1500 GMT 12 Jun 80

[Text] UN Under Secretary General for Special Political Affairs Perez de Cuellar is fully satisfied with his meetings in Athens. Perez de Cuellar left Athens for New York at noon today. He added he will brief UN Secretary General Waldheim on results of his visits to Nicosia, Ankara and Athens.

TURKISH VIOLATION OF AIRSPACE DURING MANEUVERS TO BE 'REPULSED'

AT121412 Athens I KATHIMERINI in Greek 12 Jun 80 p 1

[Text] An impenetrable wall has been set up by the Greek Air Force along the 10-mile limit of national airspace over the Aegean in order to stop every attempt at violation of our sovereign rights. As reported, Greek jet fighters have received clear instructions to approach, identify and repulse every Turkish aircraft which approaches Greek airspace during the large scale maneuvers being conducted by Ankara since yesterday. These orders, as stressed by majority opposition leader A. Papandreou yesterday echo "the will of the entire Greek nation."

According to reports from official sources, the Turkish air and naval maneuvers, codenamed "Seawolf" are being conducted between Khios and Andhros and between Limnos and Lesvos.

Analytically, these maneuvers (which are being staged at approximately the same time every year) will be developed in the Khios-Andhros area and on Sunday and Monday in the Limnos-Lesvos area with increased air activity in both instances.

Until last night, reportedly, Turkey had not submitted any aircraft flight plans thus supporting its well-known position that, in accordance with the ICAO [International Civil Aviation Organization] agreement, there is no need to submit flight plans for military aircraft.

The Greek position on the issue is completely contrary and it is based on domestic law [esoterikon dhikeon] to which the ICAO agreement refers itself.

Turkey, in any case, announced to the civil aviation service details of the flights of its aircraft by informing Greece that it intends to use an area beyond the 1 nautical mile limit in international waters which is also usually used by Greek aircraft for training purposes.

The Greek side accepted the request because any refusal would be contrary to international regulations.

At the same time, however, one cannot exclude the possibility of attempted overflights by Turkish aircraft at distances closer than 10 miles, something which was attempted during past air and naval maneuvers in an effort to question these zones.

The Dangerous Zones

According to I KATHIMERINI information, these maneuvers will affect the air traffic control zone of the Limnos air corridor. Different phases of the maneuvers have been planned to take place at distances of 8.5 miles off the south end of Khios, 7.5 miles off the northwest point of Ikaria and 8.5 miles from the north end of Samos.

At the same time these maneuvers will also affect certain corridors used by civil air transport.

In conclusion another sector of the maneuvers encroaches by half into the Andhros danger area, specified as such because Greek artillery exercises are held there. The Turks have even announced plans for their maneuvers in this area at the same time as the Greek exercises.

As announced by the same authoritative sources, the Greek side will continually conduct surveillance of Turkish air and naval activity. Should there be any violation of the 10-mile limit by Turkish aircraft then Greek jet fighters will approach, identify and force them to return to their own area. With this identification and close surveillance our country will assert its position on the 10-mile limit and the obligation of foreign aircraft to submit their flight plan for their entry into the Greek FIR.

The Papandreou Statement

A. Papandreou made the following statement: "With its provocative maneuvers in the Aegean--in the area between Skiros and Evvoia, Tinos and Andhros--the Turkish Government is attempting to question Greek sovereign rights. Specifically it intends to question its obligation to submit flight plans for its military aircraft over the Athens FIR as well as the 10 nautical mile Greek national airspace. It is imperative to the defense of our territorial sovereignty that Turkey is 'informed' that we are not prepared to tolerate any violation of our sovereign rights in the Aegean. The planned interception by the Greek Air Force is an effort to prevent Turkish provocations and it echoes the will of the entire Greek nation."

PAPANDREOU, AVEROF CLASH OVER NATO TIES, TURKISH MILITARY AID

[Text] Severance of our country's ties with NATO would affect exercise of control over Aegean international airspace. This was the reply yesterday by National Defense Minister Evangelos Averof to a statement by PASOK Chairman Andreas Papandreou with which he requested severance of negotiations for our return to NATO's military wing following confirmation of reports that West Germany will supply Turkey with increased military aid within the framework of and with the encouragement of NATO. As reported, Bonn will give Ankara DM600 million in military aid in violation of the principle for the preservation of Aegean balance of power at a ratio of three to five (three for Greece and five for Turkey.)

Papandreou made the following statement: "There has been full confirmation of the report that the vast West German aid--military aid which decisively overthrows the balance of power in the Aegean in favor of Turkey--is for the implementation of a relevant NATO decision. As a result, it is incomprehensible why, under such conditions the Greek Government continues its negotiations for our country's reattachment to the military wing of the Atlantic Alliance."

Averof's Reply

E. Averof made the following response: "A. Papandreou's slogans are usually useful for party consumption. On a national level they are useless and dangerous. By severing all our ties with the Atlantic Alliance--apart from many other disadvantages--we would also have to face a possible revision of control over Aegean international airspace (international under the legal interpretation given to it by all) by some member of the Alliance. I am certain that the Greek people in no way wish for such a development which would complicate many things."

SOCIALIST INTERNATIONAL CONCLUDES DISCUSSION OF IRAN ISSUE

SPD's Wischnewski Interview

DW131347 Cologne Deutschlandfunk Network in German to East and West Germany 1000 GMT 12 Jun 80

[Excerpts from reporter Lenz interview with Hans Juergen Wischnewski, deputy SPD party chairman, in Oslo; date not given--recorded]

[Text] [Question] Prior to the beginning of the 2-day discussions of the Socialist International bureau in Oslo, the members of the Socialist International presidium had an opportunity yesterday in Oslo to talk to Iranian Foreign Minister Qotbzadeh. One of the issues was the fate of the American hostages. Willy Brandt, chairman of the Socialist International, has made cautiously optimistic statements. Bruno Kreisky even spoke of realistic hopes. Did the meeting with Qotbzadeh indicate that this optimism was warranted?

[Answer] Willy Brandt and I this morning had another special talk with the foreign minister. I would say that optimism is justified. But that does not say anything about the time involved. In other words, I am not in a position to say something about the time involved, but otherwise I would consider cautious, very cautious optimism as justified.

[Question] On what is this optimism based?

[Answer] Well, we had extensive talks, naturally not only on this issue. The Iranian foreign minister naturally considered it important to inform us on a number of matters involving the Iranian Revolution as a whole. But this [the U.S. hostages] was a very important point in the talk. We learned a number of details in this connection. I do not feel authorized to state them here in this context. The foreign minister himself will probably hold a press conference today in Oslo. He will decide what he will announce in this connection and what not to announce. But taking all these points together, it seems to me that very cautious optimism is warranted. The problem involves, among other things, whether good offices can be rendered to further develop these matters. I do not mean mediation actions, but good offices in general in order to settle a most important issue. I do not think that it would serve the interests of the cause if all details were publicly discussed. At any rate, the conference took place in an atmosphere that permits cautious hopes.

[Question] Qotbzadeh himself came to Oslo hoping to create more understanding for Iran. Did he succeed?

[Answer] He tried to explain from his point of view developments in Iran after the decisive political changes had taken place. Indeed, we learned a number of things which we naturally did not know to this extent before. We must deal with them intensively now; I consider this to be urgently necessary. It is, by the way, quite clear and obvious that Iran is not interested in being isolated from the world. On the other hand, Iran knows very well that a most decisive point in this respect is the solution of the hostage problem.

[Question] It is a matter demanded by the Western side. Iran demands recognition of the crimes of the overthrown shah and the United States, which was involved.

[Answer] We did not discuss the condemnation of others here. We have not demanded anything for which we would not be able to bear responsibility. I want to say this most clearly here. We have not taken any dubious stance in this matter. We are interested in seeing this problem settled in the interest of those involved, in the interest of international law. Quite a bit of patience will certainly be needed in this respect. But on the basis of these talks, I consider this problem to be solvable.

Qotbzadeh Remarks

LD131432 Oslo International Service in Norwegian 1300 GMT 13 Jun 80

[Excerpts] Iranian Foreign Minister Sadeq Qotbzadeh spoke at the Socialist International meeting in Oslo this morning. In his speech Qotbzadeh alluded to the hostage affair and said that the matter must be solved in a dignified manner. The Socialist International in Oslo is today considering the situation in Iran and the political crisis in relations between Iran and the United States. In his speech, Qotbzadeh gave an optimistic picture of conditions in Iran under Khomeyni. This is in sharp contrast to reports coming from Tehran today.

KREISKY PROPOSES EFTA-EC SKELETON AGREEMENT

[Text] Saltsjobaden (AZ)--on the occasion of EFTA's 20th anniversary, Chancellor Bruno Kreisky proposed in Sweden a multilateral skelton agreement between the EC and EFTA. The aim of his initiative is a revival of the discussion on West European integration. In the past few years, the discussion about this integration has died down more and more. Now Kreisky has again broached his old plan, which has not lost any of its topicality. According to Kreisky, every EFTA partner should seek--through bilateral additional agreements with the EC--that form of closer relations with the EC which is suitable for it.

Thus the EC would retain the leading role in European integration and its trend toward a supranational state structure would not be affected by the agreements, which would be exclusively of an economic nature. Thus every EFTA country could itself determine its closer relations with the EC, Kreisky declared. He called for intensified cooperation within EFTA.

COUNCIL OF EUROPE POLITICAL COMMITTEE MEETINGS END

TA131108 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1000 GMT 13 Jun 80

[Excerpt] The Political Committee meetings of the Council of Europe parliamentary assembly ended in Antalya today. In a statement to a TRT correspondent, Political Committee Chairman British Deputy Thomas Urwin said that discussions concerning the Conference on European Security and Cooperation to be convened in Madrid in November were held during the committee meetings. Urwin noted that the subcommittee dealing with the Middle East conflict and the situation in Lebanon and Syria was reestablished. Pointing out that the terrorist incidents in Europe were discussed in detail, Urwin said that the invasion of Afghanistan and the European approaches toward detente were also reviewed.

WIENER ZEITUNG SEES 'NO PROGRESS' AT MBFR TALKS

[Unattributed report: "Forces Reduction: No Progress"]

[Text] A report recently published in the New York HERALD TRIBUNE, which claimed that the Warsaw Pact forces in Central Europe have been substantially reinforced, was called an "imputation designed to gloss over certain NATO preparations and to justify the enormous armament expenses" by the CSSR press spokesman at the Vienna forces reduction talks. The press spokesman went on to say that the CSSR chief delegate, Ambassador Emil Keblusek--the only speaker at yesterday's plenary session--pointed out that the West still was not ready to adopt any binding commitments regarding reductions in an envisaged second phase.

A NATO spokesman again underscored the importance of the latest Western proposals of December 1979, pointing out that in these proposals Eastern objections had been taken into consideration and certain concessions had been made to the Warsaw Pact countries.

SUMMIT MEETING CONCLUDES; LEADERS COMMENT ON MIDEAST CRISES

Text of Middle East Statement

WA131537 London REUTER in English 1512 GMT 13 Jun 80

[Text] Venice, June 13, REUTER--Following is the full text of today's European Economic Community statement on the Middle East:

1. The heads of state and government and the ministers of foreign affairs held a comprehensive exchange of views on all aspects of the present situation in the Middle East, including the state of negotiations resulting from the agreements signed between Egypt and Israel in March 1979. They agreed that growing tensions affecting this region constitute a serious danger and render a comprehensive solution to the Israeli-Arab conflict more necessary and pressing than ever.

2. The nine member states of the European Community consider that the traditional ties and common interests which link Europe to the Middle East oblige them to play a special role and now require them to work in a more concrete way towards peace.

3. In this regard, the nine countries of the Community base themselves on Security Council Resolutions 242 and 338 and the positions which they have expressed on several occasions, notably in their declarations of 29 June 1977, 19 September 1978, 26 March and 18 June 1979, as well as in the speech made on their behalf on 25 September 1979 by the Irish minister of foreign affairs at the 34th United Nations General Assembly.

4. On the bases thus set out, the time has come to promote the recognition and implementation of the two principles universally accepted by the international community: the right to existence and to security of all the states in the region, including Israel, and justice for all the peoples, which implies the recognition of the legitimate rights of the Palestinian people.

5. All of the countries in the area are entitled to live in peace within secure, recognized and guaranteed borders. The necessary guarantees for a peace settlement should be provided by the U.N. by a decision of the Security Council and, if necessary, on the basis of other mutually agreed procedures. The Nine declare that they are prepared to participate within the framework of a comprehensive settlement in a system of concrete and binding international guarantees, including (guarantees) on the ground.

6. A just solution must finally be found to the Palestinian problem, which is not simply one of refugees. The Palestinian people, which is conscious of existing as such, must be placed in a position, by an appropriate process defined within the framework of the comprehensive peace settlement, to exercise fully its right to self-determination.

7. The achievement of these objectives requires the involvement and support of all the parties concerned in the peace settlement which the Nine are endeavoring to promote in keeping with the principles formulated in the declaration referred to above. These principles apply to all the parties concerned, and thus the Palestinian people, and to the PLO, which will have to associated with the negotiations.

8. The Nine recognize the special importance of the role played by the question of Jerusalem for all the parties concerned. The Nine stress that they will not accept any unilateral initiative designed to change the status of Jerusalem and that any agreement on the city's status should guarantee freedom of access for everyone to the holy places.

10. [number as received] Concerned as they are to put an end to violence, the Nine consider that only the renunciation of force or the threatened use of force by all the parties can create a climate of confidence in the area, and constitute a basic element for a comprehensive settlement of the conflict in the Middle East.

11. The Nine have decided to make the necessary contacts with all the parties concerned. The objective of these contacts would be to ascertain the position of the various parties with respect to the principles set out in this declaration and in the light of the results of this consultation process to determine the form which such an initiative on their party could take.

Declaration on Afghanistan

WA131532 London REUTER in English 1522 GMT 13 Jun 80

[Text] Venice, Italy, June 13, REUTER--European Common Market leaders today expressed deep concern about "intensification of the military operations conducted by the Soviet troops in Afghanistan."

In a declaration at the end of a two-day summit meeting, the nine leaders reiterated their readiness to support any "meaningful initiative designed to promote a solution of the Afghan crisis."

The declaration said the dramatic development of Soviet operations in Afghanistan increased the sufferings of the Afghan people.

"They emphasized the genuinely national nature of the resistance offered by an entire people. They threaten to jeopardize the climate of international relations for a long time to come," the declaration said.

It reiterated the European Community proposal that Afghanistan be made neutral and nonaligned in return for the withdrawal of Soviet troops.

The declaration called for the free exercise by the Afghan people of the right to determine their own future.

It reiterated that neighboring statesshould agree to respect the sovereignty and integrity of Afghanistan. They should also refrain from any interference in its internal affairs and "renounce any stationing oftroops on its soil or any form of military association with it."

The neighboring states are the Soviet Union, Pakistan, China and Iran.

The declaration shared the concern expressed by the recent conference of Islamic states in Islamabad about the continued Sovietmilitary presence. It noted "with great interest the creation by this conference of a committee to seek ways and means for a comprehensive solution of the grave crisis in respect to Afghanistan."

Giscard, PLO View Outcome

LD131905 Paris Domestic Service in French 1700 GMT 13 Jun 80

[Excerpt] The Middle East, Afghanistan and the future of Europe--these are the three main themes emerging from the communique issued at the end of the Venice summit. For the first time the Nine have demanded that the PLO be associated with the peace negotiations in the Middle East. At the same time, the Europeans have reasserted Israel's right to existence and security. Here now is Valery Giscard d'Estaing's comment on this European attitude:

[Begin Giscard recording] To begin with, the text is clear on this difficult problem. Next, it is a text which endeavors to show that France and Europe have a just and balanced position on this problem, inasmuch as it takes into account, naturally, the whole of the rights and interests of the parties in question--the right of security of the people of Israel and the right of existence of the Palestinian people. The third point about this declaration is that it comprises a followup, a process. It is not only a matter of describing the attitude or the judgement of the European Community, but also of indicating that contacts will be made with all the parties in question in order, should the case arise, to be able to take an initiative aimed at solving this problem. [end recording]

Several reactions have already been forthcoming after this European Council meeting. On the American side it is considered that it could have been worse. This is what Jimmy Carter stated after perusing the contents of the Venice statement on the Middle East. And now I have just been informed that U.S. Secretary of State Edmund Muskie this very day has proposed that the PLO should play a part in the Middle East peace negotiations on condition that the PLO renounces its pledge to destroy Israel. This is therefore an important element.

Another reaction, in fact preceding the final communique issued by the European summit, has come from Mr Begin. In an interview which he gave to FIGARO magazine, well before the European position could be known, the Israeli prime minister condemned what he called a shameful initiative.

Obviously, for the Palestinian side the position of the Nine, while not constituting a recognition of the PLO, is nevertheless an interesting step. Alain Chalvron in Beirut has questioned one of Yasir 'Arafat's advisers, (Adib Fathi).

[Begin (Fathi) recording] There are several positive elements, the first being Europe's awareness that the conflict in the Middle East is a regional conflict which constantly risks spilling over from its local frame. A second point is that for the first time the PLO is mentioned as an essential party to the settlement of the question. Unfortunately, we are surprised that recognition as the legitimate and sole representative of the Palestinians was not mentioned explicitly. I would like to hope that our right to return be mentioned, as well as our undeniable right to national sovereignty and state independence. Speaking of self-determination represents a step forward compared with the formulation adopted in the Camp David framework; and I would like to hope--as our people have manifested on many occasions--that self-determination may also be followed by a sovereign and independent state. [end recording]

The president of the republic, in any case, at the end of this summit expressed his satisfaction with the way the proceedings unfolded. The Council, he said, has once again found its rank and its character.

ISRAELI EMBASSY SPOKESMAN ATTACKS KREISKY REMARKS

[Text] Yesterday an Israeli Embassy spokesman in Vienna described Chancellor Bruno Kreisky's remarks on 11 June about Israel as "insulting attacks on the Israeli Government and especially on government chief, Begin." Kreisky's statements had acquired proportions "which one would not think possible in a democratic society 35 years after World War II," the embassy spokesman declared.

On Wednesday the chancellor had stated in his press conference before his departure for Oslo that the Begin regime was obviously sinking and that he hoped for a change in Israel's political leadership, bringing people to power who would better understand the signs of the times. Kreisky had described the expulsion of freely elected West Bank mayors as disgraceful and incomprehensible.

KREISKY FORESEES NO NEO-NAZI DANGER

AU121158 Vienna WIENER ZEITUNG in German 12 Jun 80 pp 1-2

[Report on Chancellor Kreisky's 11 June Vienna press conference]

[Excerpt] A Soviet correspondent again broached the topic of neofascism. In his reply the chancellor determinedly declared that no neo-Nazi danger exists in Austria. However, he said, it is necessary to be vigilant against these ideas. Regarding the voters who supported [National-Democratic Party Chairman Norbert] Burger [in the recent presidential elections], Kreisky declared that they consisted first, of the rest of the old Nazis who originally did not want to vote but were dragged out of their last holes by Burger's candidacy; second, of extremely rightist People's Party supporters who did not like the idea that their party indirectly supported the Socialist candidate; third, of young people holding the view that one can be German-nationalist even as an Austrian. Kreisky went on to say that he did not think much of bans. At the time when their party was banned [before 1938] the Nazis virtually mushroomed in Austria, for it is tempting particularly for young people to do something that is forbidden without being criminal, Kreisky said. He added that he was not very happy about the fact that the predominant role in rallies against neo-Nazis was played by the Communists, because they are not credible champions of democracy. On the other hand, Kreisky declared, he regarded it as right to tell the young people who the Nazis were, and to show them Mauthausen.

SCHMIDT RECEIVES CARTER LETTER ON UPCOMING MOSCOW VISIT

LD151912 Hamburg DPA in German 1743 GMT 15 Jun 80

[Text] Bonn--Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt has received a private letter from U.S. President Jimmy Carter on his forthcoming trip to Moscow. Government Spokesman Klaus Boelling confirmed this tonight in Bonn. Earlier, the Hamburg magazine STERN said, in a prerelease of its next issue, that Carter had, in the letter on Friday, warned Schmidt against making an agreement in Moscow which would jeopardize the planned stationing of new medium-range weapons in the Federal Republic or Western Europe.

Boelling said that there was no difference of opinion of any kind between the chancellor and the U.S. President regarding the necessity for all the NATO partners to stand by the counterarmament decision of 12 December 1979. It was, therefore, wrong to speak of a warning. The U.S. Government was very well acquainted with the chancellor's ideas, including Schmidt's repeated point that the Soviet Union's buildup of medium-range missiles could not be accepted and that the USSR had to be strongly urged in the future to accept NATO's December 1979 offer of negotiations. The government spokesman gave no further details of the letter's contents.

Boelling added that the U.S. ambassador to Bonn, Walter Stoessel, had correctly stated on Sunday that the Americans had no misgivings of any kind about the chancellor's talks in Moscow. On the contrary, the American leadership assumed that while in Moscow the chancellor would state the Western position with good arguments and with the weight of his authority.

SCHMIDT REASSURES U.S. SENATOR OF FRG RELIABILITY

[Commentary signed Rmc.: "Solid Factor"]

[Text] The blitz visit by U.S. Senator Biden to Chancellor Schmidt in Bonn makes it plain that Germans are gravely concerned about U.S. foreign policy made in the dualism between the White House and Capitol Hill. The chancellor made it clear to the ambitious young senator that the Federal Republic stands by the side of the United States more reliably than anybody else in Europe and that this will remain so. There is indeed no reason to have doubts about "Atlantic advocate" Helmut Schmidt, not even on the eve of his visit to Moscow.

Schmidt also told Biden that the Senate should ratify the SALT II treaty even though Carter shelved it after the Soviet aggression against Afghanistan. Schmidt's argument is that U.S. policy must remain predictable even in the face of, and despite, Soviet escapades.

REPRESENTATIVES TO ATTEND SPORTS CONFERENCES IN MOSCOW

LD150900 Hamburg DPA in German 0836 GMT 15 Jun 80

[Excerpt] Bonn--The lower house sports committee deems it basically necessary for German interests to be represented at conferences of international sports associations during the Olympic games in Moscow.

The lower house press office said that the committee nevertheless proceeds from the premise that the visit by German officials "will be limited to the necessary tasks" in solidarity with the nonparticipating sportsmen.

SPOKESMAN ON VENICE EC SUMMIT, SCHMIDT MOSCOW TRIP

DW131336 Saarbruecken Saarlaendischer Rundfunk Network in German 0816 GMT 12 Jun 80

[Text] [Question] Some news reports say that the Federal Government intends to urge a discussion of the controversial questions which continue to exist, or have newly arisen in the EC even after the compromise on reducing British contributions, and to urge at least a preliminary clarification of potential solutions. Does this mean that the compromise will not be advocated in its present form but that other options for solutions will be sought?

[Answer] No, it does not mean that at all. The Federal Cabinet, after a thorough discussion which was not easy in view of the financial effects in this country, approved the compromise and informed our partners accordingly. There will be no shilly-shallying about that, and it will not be changed one iota. What matters to us is that, on principle, we are agreed with our partners that this Brussels compromise on the matter of Great Britain's membership contributions on agricultural prices, mutton and so forth, has not solved the fundamental problem of surplus production of agricultural produce. Now it is necessary to ponder methods of preventing the European agricultural market from simply becoming a bottomless pit.

[Question] Does this not tend to weaken the position of the chancellor because he cannot--let me put this in quotation marks--appear as the strong man anymore since lately he has not had the support in the Federal Republic which he perhaps had anticipated?

[Answer] I believe that there is ample support in the Federal Republic for the European policy of the Federal Government. You cannot expect a government to say that, if we fail to attain results in the negotiations with the laender on the distribution of the turnover tax revenues, we will unfortunately be forced to jack up oil and liquor taxes and have the Federal Government receive acclamation from everybody right away. Nobody expected anything of the sort. What merely matters now is that this will be borne because it is necessary. It has never been the chancellor's style to appear as the one man in Europe, this is out of the question if only because, politically speaking, the EC involves a community of nine equal partners.

[Question] Does this also hold true for the predominant position of French President Giscard d'Estaing, perhaps with respect to the negotiations with the East? Some criticism has been voiced concerning his trip to Poland. Will the chancellor coordinate his Moscow visit with the Allies, with the other European partners?

[Answer] The chancellor will not ask for any negotiating mandates. It would be absolutely wrong to believe that he would negotiate on behalf of the European Community or on behalf of NATO. But he will be perfectly aware of what our closest allies and partners think about world issues. To this extent, an additional reassurance for our partners is that they will have another chance to tell the chancellor prior to his Moscow visit what their stance on world issues is.

[Question] Perhaps they will also tell him what our partners think about the attitude of the French president toward EC accession by Spain and Portugal.

[Answer] I would not be surprised if this became a point of question and answer at the Venice meeting of the European Council. It may not be a point of discussion, but surely this will be an opportunity for some of them to ask the French president personally about it and to hear what he meant by his remarks.

[Question] Does the Federal Government advocate the accession of these countries?

[Answer] We favor their membership. I do not know of any remarks by the French president which would perhaps indicate the opposite, say, that the French president opposes the accession of these two countries.

GENSCHER ADDRESSES FDP CONGRESS 6 JUN IN FREIBURG

DW121435 Bonn FDP Special Bulletin in German 6 Jun 80

[Speech by Foreign Minister and FDP Chairman Hans-Dietrich Genscher at the FDP congress in Freiburg on 6 June]

[Excerpts] My fellow party members, we begin the Bundestag election campaign from the bottom of the valley. This will be the most difficult election campaign in our history. It will tax us to the limit, to the limit of action on the part of all our members, and to the limit of clarity of our goals, our political position and our relationship with the coalition and the opposition.

Tactical games, slyness and gray areas on objective issues and questions concerning the coalition, which only confuse the voters, are bad even in good times; at this time they are dangerous to our existence.

It is the mission of this party congress to establish clarity. The scars which we have contracted in the past several years are obvious. The consolidation which we received from many citizens after the North Rhine-Westphalian election is naturally an encouragement. But let us not deceive ourselves; the road to 5 October 1980 is long and much will be forgotten if we do not continually remind ourselves. And sympathy is not a motivation to vote for us. So let us not lull ourselves to sleep with the sweet poison of the illusion that the voter will indeed set things right. We must set things right, and nobody else!

Let us not lie to ourselves by saying that it is almost a blessing with regard to the Bundestag elections that we lost in North Rhine-Westphalia. Clarity in objective matters and in coalition questions alone will bring success. For this reason nothing on objective issues must be diluted; there must be no faltering on the coalition issue.

Anyone who wants a social-liberal policy will prefer to put up with an absolute SPD majority than to have Franz Josef Strauss as chancellor if the FDP displays an unclear attitude. Former CDU voters who do not want Strauss will hardly vote for an FDP which represents itself as an ersatz CDU without Strauss.

Let us make the significance of 5 October absolutely clear: On that date the FDP will not only be up for election, like the SPD and the Union parties; no, the FDP will be subject to a poll, to a decision. This time it really is true that things are on a razor's edge. What is at stake is the liberal party in Germany. What is at stake is the party system in our country. What is at stake is the three-party system. This structure of parties that has emerged, too, is subject to a poll. What is important is to keep the door open for progress in freedom.

Our country needs the social-liberal coalition because this coalition alone can continue our policy of active safeguarding of peace, because this coalition alone provides capabilities for reform.

My fellow party members, the tasks ahead of us; the determination to make the liberal goals of our election platform prevail; long years of good experiences in cooperating in partnership; the will to continue, as chairman of the Free Democratic Party, the social-liberal policy with Helmut Schmidt as chancellor--a policy which has ensured for our country a liberal order, political and economic stability, social progress and social peace in the middle of a world which is seriously struggling with political and economic problems; the necessity to ensure peace for our divided country through the continuation of our policy of detente and the conciliation of interests--all this causes me to ask your approval of the following statement:

May the party congress adopt the following decision:

"The Free Democratic Party declares its will to continue the social-liberal coalition for the next legislative period. It is determined to make the coalition a further joint success for our country while implementing as great a liberal policy as possible."

In this connection, as far as we liberals are concerned, it goes without saying that the basis of the decision is this: Coalition means that no party has the absolute majority.

We do not deprive the Social Democratic Party of the chancellor if and when we say that anyone voting for the FDP guarantees that Helmut Schmidt will remain chancellor, and will decide once and for all that Franz Josef Strauss cannot become the chancellor of the Federal Republic of Germany. In this respect, too, the voter should know what to make of the Free Democratic Party--without any ifs or buts.

We want to continue the social-liberal coalition as reliable and fair partners, and in doing so we simultaneously are the guarantors of this cooperation in partnership. Our decision is the decision on the continuation of the coalition. This is the first time that the social-liberal coalition is being threatened from two sides: from the right, Franz Josef Strauss and the Union once again set out in the old formation; from the left, the demand from influential SPD groups that the SPD govern alone, a demand which means the end of the social-liberal policy. It is therefore the state political task of the FDP to make progress in freedom possible through social-liberal policy in the coalition with the SPD in the future as well.

My fellow party members, we are always ready to examine new dangers to the liberal character of our state as they emerge, and to call decisions into question which have been made earlier. Ultimately the liberal party must prove its worth as the impetus-giving party where determination and readiness for reform are concerned. What we need, and I am no exception in this respect, is more reflection even where we are up against seemingly unalterable, ironclad views and positions.

If liberalism means more freedom for as many as possible, then it means more freedom for every individual among these many. We must be the ones for whom the destiny of the individual alone is decisive. We must not tolerate the law of the majority deciding on whether a problem is a problem. He who appeals to the mature citizen must also ensure that the citizen is able to use his maturity by sharing in the decision on how things stand.

When this mature citizen is pushed back, when his readiness to assume responsibility and responsibly exercise his freedom cannot evolve, anonymity, hopelessness and isolation ensue. This makes people ripe for resigning.

It is indeed our great task to develop our society and state in such a way that the will for freedom and responsibility can develop much more strongly. All this applies to the younger generation particularly, but not just to them.

Our economic policy also serves to expand freedom and protect the individual. We determinedly advocate the view that it must not just be the big ones who are able to survive. Big companies are not always the paragons of flexibility and adaptability. As you know, problems of red tape exist not only in the state; you can also find them in business firms.

It is not that we therefore pursue a narrowminded policy of interests if we give small companies, commerce, the artisans and the independent professions the air they need to breathe. If they suffocate, a great expanse of freedom will perish with them. Then a many important impulses for our economic efficiency will be lost.

Economic decisions are expressive of economic power and what we want is not power in a concentrated form. We want power to be distributed. If trusts and trade unions remain the only ones exercising economic power, then many will lose freedom and just a few will gain power. I expressly want to thank [Economics Minister] Lambsdorff for repeatedly advocating competitiveness, with small companies having opportunities within this competition.

Our society must finally cease to consider only size as a seal of quality. Bigger does not always mean better. Market economy as we understand it is not just the businessman's economy. It is also an economy of white collar and other workers who we would like to see participate more and have more self-determination in their jobs. We are aware that we may well be facing economically difficult times.

We do not lead people to believe that our private and public prosperity will continue to increase as before. We simply state that no progress will be attained without the determination and readiness to perform and that, therefore, performance must be rewarded and not punished. Let us muster the strength to say that enormous problems will await solutions in the eighties. Not even a beginning has been made in really integrating foreigners, especially those of the second generation, and we are honest enough to say that we do not yet have a comprehensive concept to this end.

But the fuse is burning, and this bomb consists of the accumulation of millions of individual fates, people whom we must not leave alone with their problems.

It will be necessary to reduce the level of one's own claims and to deny new requirements more often than before. Especially in such a situation it is necessary to draw a sharp borderline on state influence. Nobody should believe that the danger emanates from the dogmatic left alone.

One can only shake one's head about how undogmatic the guardians of market economy can be once subsidies or support payments are in the offing. Some of them have sunk willingly onto the dissoluted bed of subsidies, holding in the left hand a state check and in the right hand an enlightening CDU pamphlet on models of socialism by the Jusos [Young Socialists] and the Judos [Young Democrats], while uttering the pious statement that Franz Josef should save the market economy.

But he will not come; he is angry at the economy since Lambsdorff and Schmidt are considered the better business partners.

It is also our task to tell the people frankly that the limits of reshuffling taxes and social payments have been achieved as have the limits to which the people can be burdened. Financing at the expense of the future through an increase in state debts would be irresponsible. We are not prepared to do this, but we are determined to make cuts in the fields which will produce financial effects where expenditures cannot or can no longer be made. The situation concerning public finances and the increasing demands from within and from without will call for much steadfastness on our part in the years to come. Hoppe pointed out very early that we will not permit the solidity of finance policy to be shaken.

Ladies and gentlemen, we Free Democrats were the first to face the ecological challenge. We said here in Freiburg 9 years ago: Priority must be given to environmental protection rather than profits and personal benefit.

One cannot say often enough that this was put down in the Freiburg theses, not in some Green manifesto. In matters of environmental policy we have been betting on reason and insight; and we have also been promoting this reason. Ecological awareness has become an indentification mark, a quality mark of liberal policy.

My fellow party members, there is fear among the people--fear for peace, fear that conflicts in other parts of the world could spread to Europe. Afghanistan, Iran, the Middle East, Africa and even Southeast Asia for our fellow citizens are not faraway regions--and rightly so--but parts of the world in which we live. There is fear of a new arms race, of arms whose destructive power goes beyond our human understanding. Our people want to hear an answer from us regarding the challenge this contains. They ask us because in matters of detente, safeguarding peace and disarmament we follow in the committed tradition of Pfleiderer, Dehler, Flach and Ungeheuer.

The Union parties, charging that detente policy has not made peace more secure, cannot or do not want to see that this time it was not Europe from which a crisis emanated and that, so far, the crisis has not spread to Europe.

The treaties and agreements within the framework of detente policy as not unilateral concessions made in advance by one side or the other, but balanced treaties in whose continued existence both sides are interested. This is becoming evident right now. We will therefore defend tooth and nail what we have achieved through detente policy; we will therefore do everything to create the prerequisites for further progress.

Let us never forget that no people would suffer more from a relapse into cold war than the German people. No conflict in other parts of the world would come one step closer to its solution if we willfully brought cold war to Europe. The reverse is necessary. Europe, which has so often in the past been the theater of bloody wars from which conflicts in other parts of the world have so often emanated, this Europe must preserve peace here through a policy of actively safeguarding peace, and it must promote peaceful solutions in all parts of the world.

We will act against those who now see a chance to undo the policy of the past 10 years. We must see how this policy can be implemented worldwide, beyond Europe.

This also includes the determination to have talks. He who criticizes the variety of West-East contacts these past weeks and the Moscow visit the federal chancellor and I will make, he who interprets this trip as weakness and tries to defame it by calling it a pilgrimage, denies the necessity of talks and considers public polemics to be policy; for him, verbal sharpness is the expression of steadfastness and the ability to prevail in safeguarding peace. This is not our approach to foreign policy. How will the Union justify its claim to form the government if it cannot even muster a uniform approach with regard to the Moscow visit?

Strauss favored it as long as he himself hoped for a Moscow invitation. Others are still for it, still others and more important persons are against it. Some even say that the day of the visit will be a black day for our country.

It would be a black day for our country if on 5 October 1980 people took over the government who do not want to have talks under such conditions. Peace cannot be achieved by keeping quiet or by indulging in polemics; it must be preserved day by day, it must be safeguarded daily, and it must be molded anew every day.

He who twaddles about possible action by German soldiers in the Gulf region as a contribution to overcoming the Afghanistan crisis must know that our demand for such action by German soldiers has been fulfilled once and for all--that is out.

And he who states that the Russians would not have marched into Afghanistan if there had been a CDU government is engaging in dangerous political swindle. This reflects not merely on the one who says it, but also on those who applaud him for saying it. He who looked on while he was in government as Soviet troops intervened in Budapest and Prague, as the wall was built in Berlin, should not act now as if he were the Cassius Clay of world politics.

We, the liberals, are called upon to continue making our contribution to the peace strategy of the eighties for security and detente in Europe and everywhere in the world. This peace strategy must recognize the reasons and not merely the effects of the crises. It must be a worldwide policy, because in the world we live in which is becoming more and more interdependent; there can be no island of happiness.

The basis of our detente, security and arms control policies is and remains our membership in the European Community and in the Western defense alliance. They are based on the same ideas regarding values and the resulting commong interests. We will not permit one or the other to be shaken.

Our claim to take part in the decisions of both communities corresponds to our interests and contributions. With extraordinary effort we have just made a contribution to the European Community in order to avoid a fatal crisis. It will ask much of our citizens. Our financial means cannot be extended indiscriminately. We may expect our European partners to implement the necessary reforms together with us so that the Community will not become a bottomless pit. We expect tangible steps to be taken toward a European energy policy. We expect all member states to show they are prepared to reform the structures of expenditures. Most of all, we want to achieve a reform of the European agricultural policy.

The European idea must not be discredited because of the state it is in at present. Those who demand the reform of the agricultural policy together with us should also help Josef Ertl implement this reform in the Community. But please let us not pretend that one could, if need be, do without the European agricultural market. Those who would end the Common Agricultural Policy would also contribute to ending the Common Market as a whole. If customs barriers are lowered again in Europe, many factories will have to close down in our country. I warn against such experiments.

Those who take part in political discussions in our country must not renounce Europe as a garbage can supported by German welfare. More than 50 percent of our foreign trade goes to the Common Market. If this market stops functioning it would mean mass unemployment for our country.

We expect all member states to be prepared to act politically. If the Community perishes Europe will no longer play a part in world politics. Then Europe will be at the mercy of the international politics. Active detente policy, a policy of safeguarding peace on a worldwide scale, is possible only in and with the European Community. We must not deprive it of its foundation.

Our role in the Western defense alliance is just as inalienable as is our affiliation with the European Community. Our contribution to this alliance and thus to common security is considerable.

Solidarity, listening to and heeding arguments is not an American-European one-way street to us, but a matter of mutuality. We are not prepared to abet cheap anti-Americanism which means something other than what it says. We are aware that European-American cooperation is vital. But because we are aware of this we also claim the right to state frankly among friends in the United States and the other alliance states what we consider right and what we do not. This, too, is solidarity--solidarity through sincerity. It may be that Europe's voice would be better heard in Washington if our Europe would speak more clearly with one voice and act in concert with more determination.

The chance to make the eighties a decade of disarmament is not yet lost, even if the developments of the past few months have not particularly improved the prospects. What matters especially at this time is to prevent another arms race. Each day lost makes this difficult.

Disarmament becomes the question of existence of man, disarmament for the purpose of safeguarding peace, disarmament for finally releasing the funds for effectively counteracting hunger and misery in the world. This is the common task of all industrial states, democratic and communist alike.

Distrust is the enemy of every understanding. Confidence-building measures, openness and frankness are required, particularly in military matters. They create more predictability for the other side. But even if more openness also offers more predictability, we must also create a balance in predictability. Balance is also what matters in the nuclear sphere.

SALT II must be ratified. Both superpowers should abide by the agreements made even prior to ratification. We call on the Soviet Union to enter into negotiations on the medium-range missiles at long last so that the period pending the first deployment of the new Western missiles can be utilized fully for negotiations. Any time loss makes negotiations more difficult as a consequence of the progressive missile increases in the East.

We must now concentrate on preparing for the CSCE followup conference in Madrid. It must be held on the foreign ministerial level. We endorse the French proposal concerning a European disarmament conference. We will constructively examine the corresponding proposals of the Warsaw Pact.

It is necessary to give more emphasis to the Vienna negotiations on troop reductions in Central Europe. All negotiations and talks should be conducted with the will to see the interests of the other side as well--its problems, its anxieties and its prejudices. They are, after all, components of the decisionmaking process. Seeking unilateral advantages by means of disarmament has nothing in common with constructive detente and disarmament policy.

It is only disarmament proposals which seek balance--and that on a lower level of armaments--which stand a chance of success and durability, and thus of building confidence as a prerequisite for further steps.

Many people, also in our country, have the fatal inclination of not being able to put themselves in the shoes of the other side. The Soviet Union, too, has legitimate security interests; we are aware of them, just as we expect ours to be seen.

The extension of cooperation to as many fields as possible preserves the dynamics for detente and for the stabilization of East-West relations--in relations with the Soviet Union, with other states of Eastern Europe and with the GDR. Our citizens concern for peace does not stop at the line of demarcation through Germany. The concern for peace and the hopes for preserving it are in no way different from ours in the homes, factories, canteens and schools of the GDR.

What this means for us is this--preserve peace and ensure what has been accomplished up to now for the cohesion of the nation. The situation in divided Germany is and remains our topic of discussion. In essential elements the basic treaty followed the proposals of the FDP. What matters now is to keep on working patiently on this basis. The options for cooperation between the two German states have by far not been exhausted yet. The durability of the bases created shows that headway is possible, particularly in this critical development. Any new, long-term project jointly ventured with the GDR creates new, common interests in the improvement and enhancement of relations. Time and again we measure the state of these relations by the situation of the people in both parts of our country.

We are indeed aware of the great and unsolved problems, yet they do not constitute arguments against our policy. Those who advance such arguments must tolerate being asked whether they wish to go back to the times when relations between the two parts of Germany were retrogressive.

The Hallstein doctrine cost us a lot of money on a worldwide scale; it delayed the beginning of a constructive policy on Germany for many long years, yet it failed to unite even one separated family in Germany. It failed to alleviate the situation in divided Germany.

The president of the GDR Volkskammer, Horst Sindermann, stated earlier this week that, as far as the GDR is concerned, its relationship with the Federal Republic of Germany is of special significance and that they intensified relations during the past few months on purpose, especially because the international situation is very complicated. I am expressly referring to this statement because it is this realization which governs our actions, too. For this reason we want to do everything to utilize this harmony of views for safeguarding peace and for improving the situation in divided Germany.

Detente on the basis of equal rights and balance is one of the pillars of a world order in which states ensure the future of peace with common responsibility. Cooperation in partnership between industrial states and developing countries makes up the other pillar.

In the Third World the determining forces are the will for independence and sovereignty, the pursuit of the realization of their own identities, and the pursuit of economic development. A Third World policy oriented toward the future can be made only with, and not against, these. Whoever denies legitimate claims such as the right to self-determination for the Palestinian people or for Namibia, whoever opposes the overcoming of racism in southern Africa cannot be a partner to the Third World.

For the opposition to demand that we, similar to Soviet power policy, also pursue goals of power policy and influence in our policy toward the Third World shows that we are worlds apart. Anyone transposing the East-West conflict from himself to the Third World is exporting conflict instead of a conciliation of interests. Anybody denouncing and rebuffing any liberation movement as a fifth column of the Kremlin must not be surprised if they really knock on Moscow's door. If we allow ourselves to be misused as the protector of obsolete structure, then we will have to gain the confidence of the peoples all over again. Developments in Central America will be a test of whether we need this realization.

The shah was not a page of glory in Western partnership. South Korea is not either. The dictator in the south does not look better because there is an even worse dictator in the north.

It is hoped that people will eventually realize that only a system supported by the will of the people is a convincing alternative to communist rule. The nonaligned movement is carrying more and more weight in international politics. Let us beware of viewing that great group of states in a generalizing way. Its diversity is not its weakness but its strength. The will with regard to independence vis-a-vis the Soviet Union is becoming stronger and stronger. But nobody should imagine that these countries therefore want to become dependent on us.

Worldwide peace policy means renouncing the attempt to export to the Third World one's own political, social and economic ideas within a certain system. This world will find its peace in plurality and diversity, without predominance. And with regard to our foreign policy, we must always bear in mind our liberal principles.

Human dignity and human rights for the individual and people's right to self-determination are fundamental liberal postulates. They demand our worldwide engagement. Overcoming famine and need is a dictate of an active human rights policy.

Wherever development assistance deteriorates into an instrument of the East-West dispute, not only its normal principles will be lost, but also its effects, which safeguard peace. If development assistance is a moral task, it is deeply immoral to let the people of a country continue to go hungry because the state president is a Marxist and because he goes to Moscow to make a state visit.

Hundreds of thousands of people are starving in Kampuchea, and next to them stand most modern arms on which much money has been spent instead of on food. It is intolerable to live with such a vision.

When will the United Nations obtain the right to drop food from planes in an emergency, drop it there as well as in other countries where people die of famine if the food cannot be brought in some other way? Hopefully the noble donors will tolerate a communist eating their bread.

Help for bitter need must not know any barriers. This pertains also to development aid. Our development policy program underscores our will regarding cooperation as a partners instead of economic tutors of developing countries.

Cooperation means for us joint undertakings for peace. He who wants to have detente in Europe must agree to our following demand: Make an end to the military armament of the Third World. The Third World need economic and social armament. Developing countries do not need arms, they need schools and hospitals, they need tractors and lathes so that elementary human rights will eventually be implemented everywhere.

Worldwide renunciation of force must take place in line with efforts armed at solving conflicts peacefully. This applies to such cases as Afghanistan, the Middle East and Namibia.

The occupation of Afghanistan is and remains unacceptable for us. But we would not overcome this crisis if we were to arm this region militarily. Making the region less susceptible to crisis through economic cooperation would be a significant contribution to stabilization. Stability also creates security against new violations.

Negotiations on the withdrawal of Soviet troops are necessary. The suggestion of the Islamic Conference is of great importance. We are also seriously examining the seven-point proposal by Kabul. The suggestion of the European foreign ministers of 19 February lies unchanged on the table.

With these as well as with the proposals on the Middle East issue and the Namibia initiative we want to make our contribution to the worldwide safeguarding of peace. Those who do not want to shoot will have to talk and negotiate. This also holds true here.

Dear fellow party members, the peace strategy for the eighties is intended not only to spare our country from war, but to safeguard peace. It is to be our contribution to the safeguarding of peace in the whole world.

To this end it is indispensable that our foreign policy be circumspect, clear and predictable. The nations of the world must know that we Germans have learned our lesson from history. Never again must a war start from German soil, but works of peace should. People in our country want nothing but to live in peace and work in peace. We still have many unsolved problems, but I am deeply convinced that our generation is faced with a really historic task: We must employ all our efforts for sparing our children and grandchildren the horrors of war which we experienced in our own youth. It is with this awareness that we accept our responsibility for peace.

FOREIGN MINISTRY CONDEMNS ATTACK ON EMBASSY IN LIBERIA

LD150942 Paris Domestic Service in French 0900 GMT 15 Jun 80

[Excerpt] The Quai d'Orsay has just reacted to the invasion of the premises of the French Embassy in Monrovia, Liberia, yesterday evening. For the French Ministry of Foreign Affairs this represents a flagrant and unacceptable violation of the status of diplomatic missions. The protest was transmitted to the new Liberian Government by the French ambassador.

Ambassador Protests Violation

AB151210 Paris AFP in French 1015 GMT 15 Jun 80

[Text] Paris, 15 Jun (AFP)--The French ambassador in Monrovia has protested against the intrusion into his residence on Saturday by Liberian military men to kidnap the son of the former president of Liberia, who had sought refuge there.

A communique issued on Sunday by the French Foreign Affairs Ministry stated that the head of the French diplomatic mission made a sharp protest against what constitutes a flagrant and inadmissible violation of the Vienna Convention and international rules on the status of diplomatic missions. Mr Tolbert, the French Foreign Office added, came to our embassy soon after the events in which his father lost his life. Due to the extreme seriousness of the situation in Monrovia, and for purely humanitarian reasons, the French representative accepted him while waiting for an appropriate solution to be found within the African context.

The French community in Liberia, which under normal circumstances numbers about 300 people, is reduced during the summer to about 150-200 people, the French Ministry of Foreign Affairs stated. Meanwhile, the French in Liberia are not threatened, it noted.

Tolbert's Son Received for 'Humanitarian Reasons'

NC151326 Paris AFP in English 1314 GMT 15 Jun 80

[Excerpts] Paris, June 15, (AFP)--The French ambassador in Monrovia has accused Liberia of committing a "flagrant and unacceptable violation" of diplomatic custom by sending troops into the embassy to arrest Adolphus Tolbert, the elder son of the murdered Liberian president.

The French Foreign Ministry said here today that Ambassador Louis Dollot had made this protest to the Liberian authorities yesterday when they told him their men were going to enter the embassy. The Foreign Ministry statement said that Mr. Dollot had "raised a vigorous protest against what constituted a flagrant and unacceptable violation of the status of diplomatic missions as this status arises from the Vienna Convention and international custom".

The ministry said that Mr. Tolbert had come to the French Embassy shortly after the Liberian military coup of April 12 that overthrew and killed his father and had been received "because of the extreme seriousness of the situation in Monrovia and for humanitarian reasons". The ministry said that the embassy had taken in Mr. Tolbert, who is married to a niece of Ivory Coast President Felix Houphouet-Boigny, "pending the finding of an appropriate solution in an African context".

There were no diplomats at the embassy when the Liberian soldiers moved in, but a well-informed source said in Paris today that Mr. Dollot was back in the embassy today and that it was not occupied.

Another source in Paris said that French nationals in Liberia appeared to be in no danger. The source said that there were between 150 and 200 French people in the country at present.

Liberians Request Envoy Recall

LD152319 Paris Domestic Service in French 2300 GMT 15 Jun 80

[Excerpts] There is a break between France and Liberia at present. The Liberian Government has asked France to recall its ambassador in Monrovia, Mr Louis Dollot. The Quai d'Orsay says it has not been notified so far about this demand to recall the ambassador announced tonight by the foreign minister of Liberia.

GISCARD INTERVIEWED ON EUROPEAN, INTERNATIONAL ROLES

LD131507 Helsinki HELSINGIN SANOMAT in Finnish 2 Jun 80 p 23

[Lauri Karen interview with President Giscard d'Estaing: "Finland Has Important Position in Europe"--date, place not given]

[Text] [Question] French foreign policy shows an obvious desire on France's part to take an active part in the world. What precisely is France's role in your opinion?

[Answer] France, because of its history, traditions and character, has its own place and plays an active role in the world. France pursues an independent policy, remains faithful to its principles governing relations between states and guaranteeing respect for human rights, takes an open stand on the hopes of nations that have gained independence, and promotes extensive dialogue and cooperation. Thus France enjoys acknowledged international esteem and has numerous different friends in the world.

In addition, because France is not a superpower, has no aspirations to be a superpower and does not strive to make any political or territorial demands, its aims are above suspicion.

Thus France's role is, through its moral and political authority and its international experience, to ease tension and to bring about a more just state of affairs in the world, founded on cooperation and progress and the defense of human rights where these are ignored or trampled upon.

[Question] The present state of world affairs makes it difficult for states to follow a neutral or nonaligned policy or any policy which deviates from the superpowers' established lines. What is the future of a policy of neutrality or nonalignment in a world where political, economic and military pressures are growing all the time?

[Answer] Neutrality and nonalignment are completely different concepts. Despite this, they are both expressions of the desire of the nations in question to remain outside superpower rivalry. This desire can only be fulfilled if the rivalry between the blocs does not impose its conditions on others, if the confrontation between the superpowers does not determine all international relations.

The respect for policies of neutrality and nonalignment is thus bound up with East-West relations. For this reason it is imperative that the balance between East and West be preserved. It is also imperative that a superpower should not try to gain one-sided advantages through acts of violence, in contempt of those principles on which the international community is founded. [paragraph continues]

Therefore, neutral and nonaligned states are affected by the crises that endanger the international balance and the spirit of detente and they must make their voices heard so they can bring about the reestablishment of such relations that guarantee their identity.

[Question] What are the real political possibilities of detente? From another perspective, France proclaims on behalf of the other nations in the European Economic Community that detente must be a worldwide concept and that it cannot be limited to Europe. What are the practical consequences of this view, for the meeting in Madrid for example?

[Answer] The policy of detente, in the initial stages of which France played a significant part, is founded on the principles governing international relations, the known balance of power and trust. If these basic elements of detente are called into question, detente itself is endangered. This does not mean that detente is becoming less important; on the contrary, it has become a much more serious consideration. In such circumstances initiatives are needed which when taken are the very prerequisites of detente, especially where it has been endangered.

France, like its EEC associates and numerous other nations, firmly believes that the concept of detente is worldwide. We cannot accept anything that is reduced, diminished or limited to any one region, for in our view that would not be real detente. This view governs France's attitude to the imminent meeting in Madrid. It would be useless to try to hide the fact that the international situation weighs heavily on this meeting. We for our part hope that a positive intermediate stage will come from the Madrid meeting, and we are making active preparations for the meeting with this in mind.

[Question] At the moment, firm ties between Western Europe and the nations that produce energy and raw materials are being considered. Does this scheme not involve the danger that Europe will become the hostage of governments that are either unstable or which pursue their own political ends?

[Answer] International cooperation is founded on the fact that states show solidarity with one another and complement each other. Lack of cooperation is a factor that causes tension and by no means strengthens relations.

Thus I am convinced that the creation of stable relations with countries which produce energy and raw material, be they industrialized or developing countries, is a factor which creates balance in international relations. It reinforces mutual confidence and leads to a better understanding of the anxieties and strengths on all sides.

This is the goal of France's proposed trilogue, whose intention is to give positive and dynamic content to relations with Africa, the Arab world and Europe through friendly ties.

[Question] If the EEC wishes the superpowers to take it seriously, can a political and above all military unit develop from it?

[Answer] The European organization, which has been in the process of development for 30 years already, strives above all to replace relations based on power between states with relations based on agreements, which in turn are based on solidarity and the fact that the resources of various nations can complement each other. This is shown in the EEC'S agreements, which offer a basis for growing interdependence between the Nine in the economic field.

The European organization is characterized by the fact that the nine member nations share the same fate but that, at the same time, the right of each member nation to self-determination is respected, it also manifests itself in political unity which leads to joint action on the political stage. There Europe often speaks with one voice and is given a hearing.

It has also become the custom of the nine member nations in our economic community to concentrate their activities, to make their views known to each other, and, when the opportunity arises, to present proposals for action, whether on the situation in the Middle East, Southeast Asia, the Soviet Union's invasion of Afghanistan or relations with Africa or Latin America or the United Nations, or the preparations for the Madrid meeting. And the Nine's views are given a hearing.

There can be no doubt that Europe is taken seriously. Many place their hopes for the building of a more just and safer world in Europe.

[Question] Western Europe strives to avoid situations in which the superpowers make decisions affecting Western Europe without Western Europe having any knowledge of them. Does France see the initiatives on disarmament that affect Europe in this light? How have these plans developed?

[Answer] I want first to remedy the negative impression that your question could give. France considers it extremely desirable that the superpowers negotiate on the limitation and hopefully the reduction of nuclear arms, which have grown out of all proportion. The nuclear arms race is between the United States and the Soviet Union. Therefore it is they who must put an end to it.

In this spirit France welcomes with pleasure the signing of the SALT II agreement and hopes that the agreement will be able to come into force as soon as possible.

The objective of these French initiatives which you refer to is different, although complementary. They concern Europe as a geographical unit and have as their goal the limitation of conventional arms. The growth of the numbers of these arms and their uneven distribution is a threat to the security of Europe.

It is obvious that in this field, which directly concerns the countries of Europe, they must take their own initiatives. France is proposing a European disarmament conference and hopes that agreement on such a conference will be reached in Madrid. We would initially strive to create a spectrum of measures to increase confidence which have indirect importance for security and which in the second phase would create a basis for a study of the limitation and reduction of conventional arms.

We hope that it will be possible at the Madrid meeting to approve a mandate for a European disarmament conference. We have expressed this hope with the support of both the EEC countries, the NATO countries and numerous other European countries; a number of neutral and nonaligned nations also added their voices to the announcement made by the European Council on 22 November 1979 and 10 April 1980, in which it repeated in essence the proposal that I have just told you about. At the moment France is promoting talks with all the nations which signed the CSCE Final Act.

France attaches great importance to the maintenance of relations with the neutral countries and especially to the maintenance of ties with Finland.

[Question] How do you evaluate the present state of relations between France and Finland and what importance do you attach to your Finnish visit?

[Answer] My trip to Finland is a return visit after President Kekkonen's visit in 1962. This visit has been delayed too long.

I consider my Finnish visit to be particularly important, because I feel that relations between our two countries are not as close as they could be.

In France there is a great appreciation of Finland and the Finnish people, who throughout history have shown in the midst of trials and adversity their desire to preserve their identity and to be masters of their own fate. Finland has an important position in Europe. It has made useful initiatives to promote dialogue and cooperation on our continent, particularly by hosting the European security and cooperation meeting.

I am glad that I am now able to meet President Kekkonen, who has guided Finland's fortunes for over 20 years. In the present international situation our countries, each of which has its own particular characteristics and its own experiences, must enlarge their dialogue. I have no doubts that from this dialogue will come topics of common interest and that it will benefit both states in their own work and their own areas of responsibility on the international stage.

I also hope that this visit will have positive effects on the ties between our countries. Better knowledge on both sides is bound to promote our trade and industrial cooperation, as well as our cooperation in the fields of science and technology. We must broaden these areas of intercourse as far as we are able. In such a way we can develop and maintain a habitual dialogue, founded on mutual understanding and the common interests of our peoples.

FRANCOIS-PONCET: GOVERNMENT STILL FAVORS EEC EXPANSION

LD131053 Paris LE MONDE in French 13 Jun 80 p 8

[Unattributed report: "The Government's Position Has Not Changed"]

[Excerpt] "The government's position on expanding the Common Market to Spain and Portugal has not changed," Jean Francois-Poncet said in the National Assembly on Wednesday, 11 June. The foreign minister was answering a question from Mr Roger Chinaud (Union for French Democracy, Paris), chairman of the Union for French Democracy group in the National Assembly, about the statements made by Mr Valery Giscard d'Estaing on 5 June.

The government, Mr Francois-Poncet specified, "is still in favor of expansion for fundamental reasons." Mentioning the agreement concluded with Britain in Brussels on the financial rules in the Treaty of Rome which reduces the British contribution for 2 years, the minister said that after this period "either Britain will revert to the general rules and there will be no problems in drawing up the rules for admitting Spain and Portugal or Britain will demand a permanent reduction in its contribution and the Community rules will have to be altered; financial solidarity will remain but we will have to lower deficits and surpluses. Until these rules have been drawn up it will be extremely difficult to carry out negotiations with Spain and Portugal."

Mr Francois-Poncet was questioned on the same subject by Mr Bernard Deschamps, PCF deputy for Gard. He told him that "expansion is still in the interest of France and Europe...."

GOVERNMENT DISAPPROVES OF UK MARINES IN NEW HEBRIDES

LD141810 Paris Domestic Service in French 1700 GMT 14 Jun 80

[Text] The French Government disapproves of the dispatch of British Marines for the restoration of order in the New Hebrides. For this reason, the 200 marines who are due to arrive from Britain tomorrow will be employed only by joint agreement of the two resident commissioners. France wants above all a political settlement in the New Hebrides, where the second island of the archipelago, Espiritu Santo, has been under the control of rebels for the past 10 days who have unilaterally proclaimed an independent republic.

ROME POLICE BAN DEMONSTRATIONS FOR CARTER VISIT

AU151905 Rome ANSA in English 1850 GMT 15 Jun 80

[Text] Rome, June 15 (ANSA)--The Rome Police Department has banned demonstrations in the capital for the three days this week that United States President Jimmy Carter will be in the city. Carter will be making a state visit to Italy June 19, 20 and 21 before going on to Venice for the June 22-23 round of summit talks between the leaders of the West's seven most industrialized nations (the United States, Japan, Canada, West Germany, France, Britain and Italy).

COLOMBO COMMENTS ON MIDDLE EAST, EUROPEAN POSITION

LD121652 Rome Domestic Service in Italian 0600 GMT 12 Jun 80

[Text] Italian Foreign Minister Emilio Colombo returns this morning from his Washington visit. During his talks with U.S. President Carter. he concentrated on the U.S. concern for a strengthening of the unity of Western countries. The talks also dealt with the Middle East crisis. Our Washington correspondent, Antonello Marescalchi, asked Minister Colombo during a press conference about Italy's attitude on the summit of the seven most industrialized Western countries:

[Begin Colombo recording] We are a European country. We cooperate with the other European countries not only within the framework of the Economic Community but also in political matters. Therefore, we have the [word indistinct] of our European positions. But these European positions concerning the Middle East do not represent an attitude of contradiction or split vis-a-vis Camp David. We have greeted with pleasure these last few days the resumption of the (?talks) and the concrete hope of a resumption of the (?spirit) of the Camp David negotiations. We have always regarded Camp David as a step, as the prospect of arriving at a [word indistinct] solution. We shall conform at the Venice summit to this European position. [end recording]

BERLINGUER: PCI MAY SOFTEN OPPOSITION TO ROME GOVERNMENT

AU160830 Rome ANSA in English 0827 GMT 16 Jun 80

[Text] Rome, June 16 (ANSA)--Italian Communist Party [PCI] Secretary Enrico Berlinguer has given a signal that, under the right circumstances, his party would be willing to soften its opposition to the Rome government.

The message was launched in an interview in the party's L'UNITA daily Sunday just as the nation's political parties were coming to grips with the results of last week's local elections in Italy and the effect they will have on regional, provincial and municipal governments up and down the peninsula.

Berlinguer stressed the importance of the June 8-9 poll for the country and for his party insofar as it helped reveal the key role that local administrations played in the daily life of the population.

Noting that the parties giving Premier Francesco Cossiga's government its majority support garnered 52 percent of the vote, enhancing their previous majority standing of 51 percent by one point, Berlinguer stated:

"In such dramatic times as these, you can't govern with 52 percent, especially if you have the backbone of the working classes against you. The present government can just about get along but it can't govern. Then we talk about 'governability', we're not just talking about the numerical sum of parliamentarians....

"We mean the substance (of leadership), the proposals for solving problems and the practical moves of ministers in all fields. And it is on this point that we stepped up our opposition".

Elaborating on the nature of his party's opposition, Berlinguer denied that the "PCI" was tightening up for a lurch against the government. On the contrary, Berlinguer commented, insisting that his party had not given up the idea of taking government responsibility along with the rest of the Italian left in a line-up that truly expressed popular interests.

"Never in our history have we conducted a blind or prejudicial opposition", he stated. Berlinguer went on to say that it was "evident" that the "PCI" would adapt its opposition to the quality of rule that was wielded by Rome.

"If this or any other government took more appropriate steps to meet the nation's needs, we'll react accordingly, encouraging it to follow that direction and therefore adjusting our opposition struggle to the circumstances", he said.

In other points, the "PCI" leader said that the ruling Christian Democrat Party (DC) had "big internal problems" and noted that, while "the Communists had a problem in the south of Italy", the "DC" had one that was just as big in the more industrialized center and north of the peninsula.

Concluding the interview, Berlinguer stressed that Italy will never solve its problems if it does not take care of the underdeveloped south. "And the 'Italian problem', including the south, can be solved only by changing the type and quality of national economic, social and civil development," he said, adding, "and by changing the country's political leadership".

One of the first reactions to Berlinguer's interview came from Justice Minister Tomasso Morlino, a Christian Democrat, who welcomed the "PCI" leader's statement as "a major constructive development". Morlino particularly singled out the possibility that Berlinguer indicated of "a more constructive opposition" as opposed to what he termed the "PCI's peremptory demand for the immediate ouster of the government during the electoral campaign".

That possibility, the justice minister sent on, could be promoted "just by carrying through this government's platform and by intensifying its activity in this pre-vacation period".

According to Morlino, the important thing is that a dialogue be resumed and that "political developments stem out of constructive confrontations instead of hasty operations".

Republican Party (PRI) Secretary Giovanni Spadolini called attention to the "important and urgent deadlines that the government has to meet" following a round of elections whose "exasperated tone" made everything harder in a speech delivered in Milan yesterday.

Meanwhile, the Proletarian Unity (PDUP) party holds a leadership meeting today to evaluate the results of the recent elections.

The Social Democrat Party (PSDI) will be holding its meeting tomorrow while the Socialist Party (PSI), the party which made the biggest gains in the poll, will be gathered on Friday after its regional and provincial party leaders hold their convention in Rome Wednesday and Thursday.

The "DC", "PCI", "PRI" and Liberal Party (PLI) leaderships held meetings last week to scrutinize the results of the poll.

PCI'S MINUCCI CITES COMMUNIST 'RECOVERY' IN ELECTIONS

[Article by PCI Secretariat member Adalberto Minucci: "1975 Swing Consolidated"]

[Text] The latest provincial and municipal election results confirm, and in some cases accentuate, the first impressions of a considerable Communist recovery in the major urban areaa administrated by leftwing forces over the past 5 years, some of which rank--on account of their stability, if not yet the degree of consensus--with the traditional "Red" cities and regions of Emilia-Romagna, Tuscany and Umbria. In the major cities the PCI's recovery in terms of votes and percentages over last year's general elections is considerable and in certain particularly significant cases, such as Turin and Naples, borders on and even surpasses the record results of 1975.

The swing which took place 5 years ago, marked by the good government and clean hands of so many local administrations, has therefore left deep impressions in public opinion and has been consolidated almost everywhere. The Communists gain strength above all where people know them and see them at work, in a direct relationship which weakens the effect of the ideological and propagandist manipulations of anticommunism. Furthermore, it is very significant that the Socialists' success is also greatest where they are allied with Communists in local government.

The stakes in these elections were particularly high in the major cities and in the country's most highly developed regions, since it is precisely here that the moderate and conservative forces mounted their most acute offensive aimed at eliminating or at least reducing the "Italian case," viewed primarily as the Communists' presence and capacity for government in the most modern and dynamic sectors of Italian society. Furthermore, it was precisely in these areas and in the provincial and municipal elections that the Christian Democratic Party [DC] confirmed its general setbacks compared to last year's elections, having emerged defeated from each of the ferocious duels that it started with the leftwing administrations.

Nevertheless, the elections have not resolved certain very acute problems not only for us Communists but also for Italian democracy as a whole. The politico-electoral disparity between northern and central Italy and southern Italy is widening. Throughout most of the south the PCI and the progressive forces are standing still or losing even more ground, while the DC continues to consolidate its position by means of corrupt methods and a power system which drain the energies and prospects for regeneration of the southern regions. This contradiction increases the pressing need for the entire party to embark on a new phase in the battle for southern Italy.

Another very worrying aspect is the rejection of the right to vote by a minority--but a growing minority--of the voters. There is no question of a "new party," as some people would have us believe, but a very heterogeneous combination of protests, anxieties and lack of confidence in democratic life, motivated primarily by DC misgovernment and the DC's obstacles to change and regeneration in the country's political leadership.

Our party's initiative must be stepped up in this area too, by extending our relations with the masses and developing an increasingly effective opposition battle against the present government and the DC's power system with a view to resolving people's most acute problems and bringing a political turning point nearer.

OREJA: GOVERNMENT TO APPLY FOR ENTRY INTO NATO

LD150718 Madrid Domestic Service in Spanish 0700 GMT 15 Jun 80

[Text] In an exclusive interview published today in the Madrid daily EL PAIS, Foreign Minister Marcelino Oreja announces the government's intention to apply for entry into NATO next fall to coincide with the renewal of the bilateral agreements with the United States. The two premises underlying this integration are, according to Minister Oreja, the maintenance of the process of Spanish integration into the EEC and the negotiations for the recovery of sovereignty over Gibraltar.

Comments on EC, Afghanistan

LD150847 Madrid Domestic Service in Spanish 0600 GMT 15 Jun 80

[Text] On the subject of NATO, the minister of foreign affairs said in a statement to the Madrid daily EL PAIS that the question of Spain's entry into NATO should not be submitted to a referendum but should be approved by a parliamentary majority. Oreja insisted on the need for incorporation soon and said that the content of the new agreements with the U.S. will be negotiated on the basis of technological compensation, thus rejecting for the first time the economic remuneration or grants of earlier treaties. On the subject of Europe, the minister said that France's desire to block Spain's entry into the Community of the Nine has been successfully thwarted, adding that had this turned out otherwise Spain's position in the world could have been affected. Further on in the exclusive interview given to EL PAIS, the Spanish foreign minister referred to the sparse cooperation between Spain and France on international matters, and particularly on the question of the struggle against terrorism. For Minister Oreja, many of the crimes committed by the terrorist organization ETA [Basque Fatherland and Liberty] are prepared on French territory. The minister of foreign affairs also announced another meeting with Lord Carrington to discuss the negotiations over Gibraltar. Finally, Marcelino Oreja acknowledged that there has been a cooling of relations with the Soviet Union in the wake of the invasion of Afghanistan, criticized the Camp David accords--accords promoted by the United States--and announced that Spain will recognize Israel if UN Resolution 242 is revised.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS OFFICIALS STUDY VENICE SUMMIT DOCUMENTS

LD132048 Madrid in Spanish to Europe 1830 GMT 13 Jun 80

[Text] At the end of this afternoon's Cabinet meeting, which ended at 1730, the government's Foreign Affairs Commission held a meeting in the Moncloa Palace chaired by Adolfo Suarez. At the meeting, attended by the ministers whose departments are responsible for foreign affairs, the documents issued in Venice at the end of the meeting of EEC heads of state or government were analyzed. The minister for relations with the European Community, Leopoldo Calvo-Sotelo, held a press conference at 2000 this evening in which he expressed the Spanish Government's attitude to the decisions adopted at the Venice summit: [begin recording] A week ago, at a press conference in this same place, I told you that the situation regarding Spanish-Community negotiations was serious. Today, with the meeting of the European Council in Venice just over, I can tell you that (?this is no longer the case). A week ago I was concerned that the negotiations could be interrupted, that there might be a pause. Today I can say that the negotiations are still on, that there is to be no interruption, and no pause. The question of Spain was not formally raised at the Venice meeting. [end recording] Meanwhile, government sources said that Spain views with satisfaction the fact that the Venice document totally reflects the Spanish position on the Middle East problem. Among the points mentioned in the Community document which Spain has previously put forward is the recognition of the right of the self-determination of the Palestinian people and the right of Israel to exist within secure frontiers.

AKTUELT VIEWS DISPUTE OVER FISHING ZONE

LD121355 Copenhagen AKTUELT in Danish 10 Jun 80 p 13

[Unattributed report: "War of Notes Between Denmark and Norway"]

[Text] Danish-Norwegian disagreement on the fishing limits between east Greenland and the small uninhabited island of Jan Mayen north of Iceland has assumed the character of a war of notes.

It began when Norway, after enlarging the fishing zone round Jan Mayen to 200 nautical miles, informed Denmark in a note that Norway would uphold its control of fishing in all of the new zone round Jan Mayen and has also fixed a mid-line between its own zone and Denmark's. Denmark had originally decided to maintain control only as far as the mid-line and not to enter the disputed "gray zone" in the areas where the Danish and Norwegian fishing limits overlap. Because of recent developments and the Norwegian decision, Foreign Minister Kjeld Olesen has informed the Norwegian Embassy in Copenhagen in a note that Denmark will reconsider its attitude to its fishery jurisdiction over the full range of the 200-mile zone off Greenland. The gray zone, on which the two countries cannot reach agreement, comprises an area of 80,000 square kilometers.

BORDER TRADE WITH USSR INCREASING

LD140220 Helsinki Domestic Service in Finnish 1530 GMT 13 Jun 80

[Text] Finnish-Soviet border trade, which has been quiet during the past few years, is again increasing. Last year border trade increased by 13 percent, and there was clearly more trading during the early part of this year, too, than in the early part of 1979. This was noted at the third joint meeting of the Finnish-Soviet border trade working group in Riga.

This year, for instance, saw the start of the export of agricultural products from Finland to Murmansk. The deliveries are paid with electricity imports to Finland. The talks also expressed the desire to establish the regional development fund as a Finnish coordinating body in the border trade. The payments system of the border trade is to be changed. The payment for the foreign parts, delivered by Finland in connection with machinery supplies, will in future take place in the form of products which Finland can export to third countries. Until now these parts have been paid for in Western currency.

The chairman of the Finnish section of the border trade working group is Under Secretary of State Paavo Rantanen from the Foreign Ministry and the chairman of the Soviet section is Deputy Foreign Trade Minister N.G. Osipov.

IRAN'S QOTBZADEH ARRIVES FOR 'BRIEF' VISIT

WA132253 London REUTER in English 2226 GMT 13 Jun 80

[Text] Stockholm, June 13, REUTER--Iran's Foreign Minister Sadeq Qotbzadeh arrived here tonight for a brief visit to Sweden, during which he will meet Foreign Minister Ola Ullsten. Mr Qotbzadeh, who had been in Oslo attending a meeting of the Socialist International, is expected to return to Tehran tomorrow afternoon, according to Social Demoorat sources.

Meets With Ullsten, Palme

LD141722 Stockholm Domestic Service in Swedish 1600 GMT 14 Jun 80

[Text] [Announcer] First we shall review today's great political visit, the visit of the Iranian Foreign Minister Sadéq Qotbzadeh. Qotbzadeh has, among other things, had discussions with representatives of Swedish industry, with Olof Palme and with Foreign Minister Ola Ullsten. Our reporter has been following the visit:

[Unidentified reporter] Qotbzadeh met Swedish and foreign journalists at the (Runeberga Manor) on Lidingoe, near the Iranian ambassador's residence. He had by then already met representatives of Swedish enterprises, but he only remembered the Johnson concern and Volvo. He said that he was interested in an expansion of trade with Sweden. Qotbzadeh wants to create understanding for the Iranian Revolution, but he is greeted all the time by the question: When will the hostages be freed? [begin Qotbzadeh recording in English, fading into Swedish translation] I believe very firmly that this problem should be resolved as soon as possible in a peaceful and honorable manner, and by honor I mean that it should not be separated from the 25 years of American domination of Iran. [end recording]

[Reporter] After the press conference, the Iranians flew to Haga Castle for lunch and talks with Foreign Minister Ola Ullsten, who said the following after the meeting: [begin recording] [Ullsten] I have tried to explain that while we can understand the feelings existing in Iran toward the shah's regime and the American role then, though we can well understand that, we cannot accept the holding of diplomatic personnel as hostages. There are two reasons for this: It is an offense against international law and it means that the already fairly difficult international situation will be further worsened. Nor is it right from the humanitarian point of view, which is not the least important point.

[Question] Olof Palme has stressed the importance of not isolating Iran, and he has expressed fairly positive views about the Iranian Revolution. Do you see any reason for criticizing conditions in Iran, apart from the hostages problem?

[Answer] Yes, I have emphasized that we view seriously the summary trials and death sentences and the Kurdish situation. One must have the right to do that, otherwise such talks would be meaningless, perhaps even counterproductive if one does not express (?clear views). [end recording]

[Reporter] Olof Palme said that he had told Qotbzadeh sharply that the hostage affair is an offense against international law, but when we condemn Iran, we must remember that the country is living in a revolutionary situation. Palme wanted to reduce the threat against world peace by starting a dialogue with Iran. He does not want to miss the chance of making this contribution. Why is it just him, Olof Palme, who has the opportunity? [begin Palme recording] [Words indistinct] the country one lives in is Sweden, which has a nonaligned position, and the party one belongs to is part of social democracy, which has a tremendous standing in the world. This is the basis which exists, and this is quite decisive in being able to achieve anything. [end recording]

[Reporter] What then seems to be the result of Palme's efforts? What have the visits to Norway and Sweden yielded, in fact? Well, those who perhaps hoped for a concrete answer to what is going to happen to the American hostages in Iran have been disappointed. Qotbzadeh has not said anything different from what he said in Iran earlier, even though [words indistinct] said clearly that he would like to see a quick end to the hostage crisis. He shares this attitude with several Iranian leaders, including President Abolhasan Bani-Sadr. Iran has, despite everything, reason to consider its international reputation. Moreover, the country has great internal problems, which also demand more attention.

During his Nordic tour Qotbzadeh has obviously met with a considerable amount of sympathy for his views on Iran's conflict with the United States. At the same time, he has been reminded that the taking of the hostages was a flagrant violation of international law. But the question is whether it is of any importance to the solution of the hostage crisis if Qotbzadeh himself is prepared to adopt a somewhat milder attitude. It is known that the Iranian Government is fairly powerless in comparison with the religious leaders possessing considerably harder attitudes, who dominate the Iranian parliament, and as compared with the students who, with Ayatollah Khomeyni's support, are holding the Americans prisoners.

The Iranian foreign minister says that the purpose of the visits to Norway and Sweden is clearly to create understanding for the Iranian Revolution, but certainly also to advertise himself, not least for home use. Whether the dialogue which Palme and others are working for will have any effect on other power groupings in Iran is still quite uncertain. Thus, we know nothing more about a solution of the hostage problem today than before Qotbzadeh began his sensational tour of the north.

[Announcer] And now the tour is at an end, for tomorrow Qotbzadeh will leave for home again. This report was by (Kerstin Bodell) and (Arvid Lagercrantz).

Leaves for 'Undisclosed Destination'

[Text] Stockholm, June 15, (AFP)--Iranian Foreign Minister Sadeq Qotbzadeh left here today for an undisclosed destination after two days here as guest of the Swedish Social Democrat Party, informed sources said. From Wednesday to Friday Mr. Qotbzadeh was in Oslo to attend a bureau meeting of the Socialist International. No progress was reported in talks he had with Social Democrats here concerning the United States Embassy hostages held in Iran since November 4, the sources said.

HEAD OF LIBYAN MISSION IN LONDON EXPELLED

[By PA parliamentary staff]

[Excerpts] The head of the Libyan mission in London is bieng expelled from Britain, Deputy Foreign Secretary Sir Ian Gilmour told MP's today.

Mr Musa Kousa's expulsion follows his reported comments in today's TIMES saying the Libyan revolutionary committees had decided last night to kill two more people in the UK. Mr Musa Kousa, chief of the Libyan "People's Bureau", formerly the embassy, was quoted as saying "I approve of this."

The latest threats to kill follow reports that Libya's president, Colonel al-Qadhdhafi, has abandoned his "death list" of exiled opponents, with some exceptions.

Sir Ian said the government had declared last month that it wished to maintain good relations with Libya. "That remins our position, but we are making clear that the Libyan authorities must understand what can and cannot be done under the law of the United Kingdom, and that criminal actions in the United Kingdom must cease.

Mr Shore said the opposition would "whole heartedly endorse" the action taken. Quoting Mr Musa Kousa's "I approve this" comment, Mr Shore said: "We don't approve of Mr Musa Kousa and I am very glad indeed you have taken the action you have." It was later disclosed that the government was tightening up on Libyan representatives in the UK, writes a PA diplomatic correspondent.

The Libyan authorities have been told that its so-called people's bureau in London will from now on be treated as a diplomatic mission. This means that the mission will be required to give a list of individuals attached to the mission and in general, what their functions are.

The status of the people's bureau and the Libyans who worked there has been in some doubt. The mission will now be expected to conform to normal diplomatic procedure and the secretary of the bureau will be regarded by the British Government as fulfilling the functions of a head of a mission. The note setting out Britain's new stance was delivered to the Libyan authorities yesterday and was apparently unconnected with today's expulsion.

In the Lords, government spokesman Lord Trefgarne said all personnel at the Libyan People's Bureau were being screened and their right to diplomatic accreditation checked. "The number of diplomats at the peoples' bureau is uncertain," he told opposition foreign affairs spokesman Lord Goronwy-Roberts. "We are in the process of going through the names and accrediting those who appead to justify that."

"In the case of some personnel there appears to be some doubt as to their precise status, but we are working to resolve that doubt. We shall only accredit those entitled to be accredited," Lord Trefgarne said.

Later, Lord Trefgarne said the "revolutionary committees" described by the expelled diplomat as responsible for the elimination of dissidents in England would be investigated.

Labour's legal affairs spokesman Lord Elwyn Jones had pointed to references to the committees by Mr Kousa, and demanded a "searching inquiry."

Envoy Reiterates Death Threats

LD131630 London PRESS ASSOCIATION in English 1601 GMT 13 Jun 80

[Text] Arab vendetta killings will continue on the streets of Britain, a Libyan diplomat vowed shortly after being ordered to leave the country.

Mr Musa Kousa, secretary of the Libyan People's Bureau, was today given 48 hours to quit Britain by Deputy Foreign Secretary Sir Ian Gilmour. The Foreign Office called him at 6 pm on Thursday and asked him to the showdown meeting at 11.00 a.m. today. Mr Kousa said he was not told why he was being ordered out and he did not ask. On Thursday he announced from the steps of the Libyan People's Bureau, formerly the Libyan Embassy, in St James Square, London that hit squads were out to kill two men. Today he repeated that the killings would not stop. He said: "The British authorities believe that if they close this bureau, everything will be finished. I am willing to say here strongly they are mistaken. It will continue."

Police chiefs have believed for some time that the bureau is a centre of terrorist activity. Two Libyans, opponents of the Al-Qadhdhafi regime, were shot dead in London earlier this year. But Mr Kousa denied the raids were planned from the four-storey building. "The British Government thinks wrongly that the Libyan People's Bureau is organised for assassination and to kill people here. They believe that the facilities of this bureau are used in this manner but they are mistaken about this."

A revolutionary committee, spread throughout Britain, planned the attacks, he claimed. "The committee isn't here, in this building, or in this bureau. Its members are all over the UK and they are not only Libyans but there are some Arabs and some black Britons."

Wearing a smart black pinstripe suit and multi-coloured shirt, he gave his statement from his large, oak desk in a first floor office. The building was covered with portraits of Libyan leader Colonel al-Qadhdhafi. Mr Kousa said he was happy to go back home. He plans to continue his studies as a sociology student in Tripoli.

"I hesitate to stay here in this country because I hate this kind of bureaucracy. I am a man, I am not a politician and I am not a diplomat. I classify myself as a revolutionary. I cannot deal with this bureaucracy. I like to live with the people and study with the people."

He went on to warn that the Libyans would help the IRA if the British Government continued to support opponents of the Arab regime. Referring to Libyan exiles, he called them "criminals." He said: "There are many criminals here in London. We believe strongly that the British Government supports them by all means, giving them security, by giving them hiding places, and giving them cars. If the British authorities keep taking action against the Revolutionary Council and help the other side, I expect they will help the IRA again." He added: "We believe the IRA is the British liberation movement, so, according to this principle, we have the right to support them. We don't need British public opinion. We are a revolution and we have our laws."

The tall Libyan denied diplomatic bags were used to smuggle guns into Britain. He said a gun cost 40 pounds on the British black market--cheaper than it could be bought in Libya. When asked how he knew this, he would only say: "That's not the problem."

He said he did not know the names of the two men under threat of death, but added: "They will know who they are." The two, formerly Libyan Government employees, are now being guarded by police. Mr Kousa said Britain was free to convict in court anyone found breaking the law and Libyan assassins expected life imprisonment.

SPOKESMAN CITES TURKISH MINISTER'S STATEMENT AS 'PROVOCATION'

NC131130 Nicosia Domestic Service in Greek 1030 GMT 13 Jun 80

[Text of Cyprus Government spokesman's statement in reply to "recent remarks" by Turkish Foreign Minister Erkmen]

[Text] While UN Under Secretary General Perez de Cuellar's mission was in progress, we refrained from making any comment on Turkish Foreign Minister Erkmen's statement in which he said that bizonality and the security of the Turkish Cypriots, as defined by the Turkish side, were not negotiable.

Mr Erkmen's statement constitutes a provocation and strengthens the creation of a negative climate for resuming the talks and the auspicious outcome of the UN secretary general's initiatives. Mr Erkmen's statement reaffirms that the Turkish side refuses negotiations and that it would be ready for talks only after securing advance commitments that would prejudge the content of the partitionist solution desired by Turkey. It becomes obvious from Mr Erkmen's statement that the Turkish demands are not a question of words but clearly one of imposing a Turkish solution. The views of the Greek Cypriot side are well known to everyone and we reiterate them. We are ready to go to the talks and let any suggestions, views, proposals or matters be raised at the negotiating table. Within this framework, we are continuing our support for the UN secretary general's initiatives.

KIPRIANOU RETURNS FROM VISITS TO CSSR, GDR

NC142112 Nicosia Domestic Service in Greek 2100 GMT 14 Jun 80

[Text] President Kiprianou has returned from his official visits to Czechoslovakia and the GDR. The president was met at Larnaca Airport by House President Mikhailidhis who was acting president of the republic during President Kiprianou's absence; members of the Council of Ministers; the charges d'affaires of Czechoslovakia and the GDR; House members; the National Guard and the police chiefs; and metropolitan and other officials. A National Guard detachment presented arms during the president's arrival. Foreign Minister Rolandhis, who accompanied the president during his state visits, returned to Cyprus with President Kiprianou.

Airport Arrival Statement

NC150640 Nicosia Domestic Service in Greek 0330 GMT 15 Jun 80

[Excerpts] In a statement at Larnaca Airport, the president of the republic expressed his full satisfaction with his visits. He stressed: These visits have been successful from every aspect and I sincerely believe that they were a landmark in the further development of relations and cooperation between Cyprus and these countries. He added: I not only met friendship and understanding everywhere, but the leaders, other officials and the people of the GDR and Czechoslovakia manifested their support for and solidarity with our people's struggle for freedom and vindication. The talks I had with President Husak in Prague and President Honecker in Berlin were exceptionally useful. I had the opportunity to brief them on the Cyprus issue in full detail. There has been complete understanding and full support for the line which we follow; this is also apparent in the joint communiques issued. There is a true intention to strengthen Cyprus in its struggle for freedom and the implementation of the UN resolutions.

On bilateral relations, the president of the republic expressed the conviction that his visits would prove very useful in broadening them and strengthening friendship and cooperation in all fields--not only in the political field, but in the cultural, economic and trade fields as well.

He stressed: is proven by the GDR's satisfaction of our demand in the field of trade exchanges--specifically on the issue of potato exports--a fact that is of particular interest. I would like to underline that these visits have been useful in various aspects. Of course, we had the opportunity to discuss the present international situation and I have established these states' strong interest and concern for it. Their strong interest lies in again securing a tempo of detente that would result in resolving world problems with world peace as the objective, something we also share completely. We also pursue--and they support it--a peaceful solution to the Cyprus problem on the basis of the UN resolutions. They support the implementation of the UN resolutions and charter and the provisions of the Helsinki Final Act that concerns the Cyprus issue. They support the dialogue, but they very clearly see our position that such a dialogue must be conducted on the basis of what has been agreed upon and without advance commitments that would have terrible repercussions on developments. This is particularly stressed in the communique on the talks with President Honecker, which was issued after the statement by Turkish Foreign Minister Erkmen, who was already given the proper reply by the Cyprus Government. Therefore, in the Cyprus problem, there is absolute understanding, support and solidarity.

President Kiprianou went on: In the international field, our positions basically coincide. Concerning bilateral relations, I believe that they will develop to the greatest degree possible. As I stated to President Husak and President Honecker, on our part--on the government's part--we will do everything possible not only to safeguard the existing good and friendly relations and cooperation among our countries, but also to strenghten them even further to our mutual benefit. The president of the republic concluded: I sincerely believe that these visits have been and will prove useful to Cyprus from every respect.

TA NEA NAMES POSSIBLE FOUNDERS OF NEW RIGHTWING PARTY

NC140918 Nicosia TA NEA in Greek 14 Jun 80 pp 1, 8

[Excerpts] Consultations aimed at establishing a new political faction have been in full swing in the rightwing. According to some reports, which have not been confirmed by the pioneers of the new rightwing political movement, this new faction will attempt--with what is described as a "hard" wedge within DIKO, [Democratic Party]--to cause a sensation by involving well-known names and, moreover, by forming a parliamentary group within the present House of Representatives that will consist of a team of deputies who will desert DIKO. At the same time, it is considered certain that the three independent deputies will join the new government.

Tasos Papadhopoulos is said to be one of the pioneers of the new movement, and it is almost certain that he will be the leader and will also head the parliamentary group, which will joined by the other two independent deputies:

--Khr Khristofidhis, Larnaca.

--L. Ierodhiakonou, Nicosia.

It is also considered certain that DIKO Deputy Khristos Vakis will joint the group, while there is persistent talk about Alexis Galanos and at least two deputies from the so-called "pro-Azinas team," as manifested in the latest House of Representatives session. At the same time, it has been learned that former Commerce Minister Mikh. Kilokassidhis is to be one of the basic elements in the new movement while Andreas Khristofidhis, director general of RIK [Cyprus Broadcasting Corporation], as well as Foreign Minister N. Rolandhis have also been mentioned persistently.

In any event, the entire issue is expected to be clarified soon as various contacts are in the final stages, after which the establishment of the new rightwing movement will be announced.

PRIME MINISTER SAYS U.S. BASES AGREEMENT SEEMS 'CLOSE'

AT131444 Athens NEWS in English 13 Jun 80 p 12

[Text] Agreement between Greece and the United States on the future of U.S. military bases in Greece appears to be close, Prime Minister Yeoryios Rallis said Thursday.

But even so, peace in the Mediterranean and the stability of the NATO alliance in this strategic part of the world will remain undermined until Greece and Turkey resolve their differences, Rallis said yesterday.

"Until Greek-Turkish relations are settled, Turkey's value to the Alliance is incomplete," said the 62-year-old premier who succeeded Konstandinos Karamanlis in May.

"Greece is an avenue between European countries and Turkey and Yugoslavia," Rallis said.

Greece, a NATO member, pulled out of its military system in 1974 in frustration at the Alliance's failures to prevent the military invasion of Cyprus by Turkey, also a NATO member.

"We have publicly declared our willingness to resume Greece's cooperation within the integrated NATO military system," Rallis said.

"We want to re-enter NATO, but not on any condition. Only on conditions that will not be harmful to Greece."

Further on Bases, Cyprus, Aegean

[Text] Greece does not feel that it should have to give anything in return in order to feel secure within its own borders and to obtain the respect of its allies for its rights of sovereignty. Prime Minister Yeoryios Rallis stressed this in an exclusive interview with the vice president of the UPI news agency [for Europe, Middle East and Africa] Julius Humi.

Outlining the general lines of our country's foreign policy, the prime minister expounded on Greece's positions on the most important problems. On the issue of return to the NATO military wing, Rallis stressed that it is still open and underlined that we are prepared to discuss proposals, provided that they fully cover Greece's defense needs. We believe, he added, that the value of Greece's participation in its allies defense and the significance of the restoration of the cohesion of the southeastern wing will be correctly assessed and thus a satisfactory solution will become possible.

On the issue of the U.S. bases, Rallis said that the effects of U.S.-Turkish agreement should be taken into consideration in any agreement that becomes the object of negotiations between Greece and the United States. The maintenance of a balance, the prime minister stressed, in this area is a significant prerequisite not only from the military viewpoint but also from the political one.

On the Cyprus problem, Rallis said that a solution must be sought within the UN framework and added that in this spirit we fully support Secretary General Waldheim's efforts for the resumption of the intercommunal talks.

On Greek-Turkish relations, the prime minister stressed that, unfortunately, the dialogue which has been going on for years has not produced specific results. However, we are ready, he said, to continue these efforts.

Specifically on the issue of the demarcation of the Aegean continental shelf, he stressed the need for the issue to be jointly submitted to the International Court or to a court of arbitration and expressed the hope that the Turkish Government, which so far has maintained a negative position on this issue, will recognize the advantages of such an approach to the problem.

KKE (Interior) Criticism

AT141318 Athens I AVYI in Greek 14 Jun 80 p 1

[Text] The KKE (Interior) Press Office has announced:

In connection with Prime Minister Rallis' interview, which touches on many issues, we single out those concerning the government's persistence in returning to military NATO and on the bases agreement.

That is, it should be stressed that in the current circumstances of deteriorating international relations, these issues have acquired a new dimension and the dangers to our country from these agreements are becoming more tangible, immediate and specific because they unequivocally involve it in the aggressive plans of the U.S. for the Middle East and the Persian Gulf and turn it into a supply area and a launching pad with incalculable consequences for the country's international position and its existence.

What the people want and what is imperative is to disengage the country from this policy.

TO VIMA REPORTS U.S. ASSURANCES ON AEGEAN BALANCE

AT151740 Athens TO VIMA in Greek 15 Jun 80 p 8

[Report by New York correspondent St. Evstathiadhis]

[Text] New York, 14 June--U.S. Under Secretary of State Nimetz, who is due in Athens next week, will explain more general U.S. policy in the eastern Mediterranean area to the Greek Government and "will give assurances" that this policy is not aimed at overthrowing an Aegean balance in favor of Turkey but at "strengthening an Allied country within the framework of strengthening NATO in a particularly sensitive area of the Alliance."

Nimetz, who recently has concentrated on the problem of the area, will also explain U.S. views on the question of Greece's return to NATO and on the Greek-U.S. bases agreement and so forth, in the promotion of which Washington is particularly interested today.

Nimetz is authorized to convince his Greek interlocutors that there is a "bad interpretation in Athens" of the U.S.-Turkish defense agreement and that Washington's sole aim is to create "those permanent conditions in Turkey which will guarantee the political and economic viability of the country as well as its military strength exclusively within the framework and general interests of NATO."

At the Department of State, where at this moment the "Nimetz mission" is in the stage of "careful preparation," well-informed sources added that "there is no reason" for Greece to be irritated and concerned with the creation of a Turkish war industry and of the necessary economic-technological substructure since Greece has already organized its own "national war industry and substructure," and this not always with the assistance of NATO countries. The same sources added that if anyone should be irritated then this should have been the Turks who "in fact never looked positively" on the development of a Greek war industry.

Naturally it is not known whether Nimetz will use this argument in Athens which, however, is being presented by many in Washington. Nimetz will emphasize that the intention of the U.S. administration always remains not to overthrow Aegean balance but he will make it clear that he is only speaking on behalf of the U.S.administration and that he can "guarantee nothing at all" with respect to military-economic aid which other NATO member states will give or are giving to Turkey, which in conjunction with U.S. aid, "could be considered as refuting today's facts of Aegean balance"--according to the definition of a well-informed government official in Washington.

The U.S. under secretary will also attempt to explain to Athens the U.S. views on the question of Greece's return to NATO and the bipartite Greek-U.S. agreement on bases and so forth.

Nimetz is authorized "to stress emphatically" to his Greek interlocutors that the U.S. administration does not agree with the Greek position of "connecting" the two issues and that, on the contrary, it considers them to be "absolutely independent of each other." According to Washington, the Greek Government should start to push the question of the bipartite agreement on U.S. bases immediately, irrespective of developments on the question of Greece's return to NATO. As well-informed circles state, Nimetz will also attempt to "explain" to the Greek Government that it would be in the interest of Greece "to immediately proceed to negotiations on the bases because this would strengthen and assist its position on the question of its return to NATO."

Nimetz will naturally try to avoid a misinterpretation of these views in Athens as blackmail against the Greek Government. In other words, "unless you proceed on the question of the agreement on bases you must not hope for a return to NATO under the conditions you want..." Washington, however, is not too sure that such a misunderstanding can be avoided.

As informed sources at the State Department stressed, the U.S. under secretary will avoid any dialogue with members of the Greek Government he might meet because, as finally stressed, his mission is in some way supplementary to that of Secretary of State Muskie at the NATO ministerial conference in Ankara. Specifically he is limited to informing Athens of the U.S. views on questions of interest to Greece which have raised "understandable Greek questions" and, at the same time, to be informed of Greek views and issues "which could be discussed between Muskie and Mitsotakis on the sidelines of the NATO conference in Ankara."

AKROPOLIS WARNS FRG AGAINST EXCESSIVE SUPPORT FOR TURKEY

AT131357 Athens AKROPOLIS in Greek 13 Jun 80 p 2

[From the "Laconic" column: "Bonn and Ankara"]

[Text] It is difficult for us to understand the logic of Bonn's policy recent toward Ankara. On what assessments did Bonn rely for its decision to open the taps of special military aid to Turkey? What current situations or what prospects encouraged it? What good does it expect to emerge from the military strengthening of our neighboring country? We admit that we do not see the interests of the Western system of defense nor even those of Western Germany nor even the well-meant interests of Turkey itself being served. On the contrary, we see the road being opened to possible bleak situations.

First, certainly Turkey needs economic help to avoid economic collapse and to confront its oppressive social problems. However, when military aid is given to a country with such problems, a country that is on the verge of an internecine strife, nobody knows how it is going to use this aid. In its desperation, it may seek ways out through external adventures and adventurism which may create an exceptionally dangerous situation in the Aegean and more generally in the eastern Mediterranean. Certainly it will be encouraged in such adventurism by a feeling of military superiority.

Second, the arguments of the Marxist-left in Greece will be strengthened, especially those of Papandreou, who claims that the Western allies are using Turkey as the basic mainstay of their policy in the area and are demanding that Greece pay the price by mutilating its sovereign rights in the Aegean. The military reinforcement of Turkey by Bonn comes as manna from heaven for the Greek opposition. It affords it the chance to strengthen anti-Western and centrifugal tendencies in the country and it may possibly rekindle anti-German feelings among the Greek people, poison Greek-German relations and perhaps even provoke the restriction of West German commercial and entrepreneurial activity in Greece because it is quite possible that, in a strong reaction to Bonn's military reinforcement of Turkey, Greek consumers may boycott German products. Turkey represents a direct and serious threat to our country and whoever strengthens this threat of course cannot enjoy the sympathy and friendship of the Greek people.

I KATHIMERINI WARNS OF FOREIGN POLICY SHIFT DUE TO TURKISH AID

AT141357 Athens I KATHIMERINI in Greek 14 Jun 80 p 7

[Editorial: "Need for Frankness"]

[Text] We do not belong to that group of people who become excited, dramatize situations and lose their sense of values and of possibilities at a certain juncture. Also we do not belong to the group of "merchants of crises", that is, those people who aim do cause uneasiness and create certain impressions in order to gain benefits, commercial (usually), electoral or other. For this reason--after continuing the subject we noted yesterday--we shall attempt a sober and coolheaded evaluation of at least some of the elements of the situation which is shaping up in our area through the massive supply of military and economic aid to Turkey by some of the strong Westerners--without the reaction and without even the expression of displeasure (quite the contrary, actually) of the Eastern superpower.

The phenomenon of this massive aid should not have surprised anyone because it loomed on the horizon long ago. It is the result of a certain "perspective" and viewpoint, which--although both proved erroneous and brought about failures and results contrary to those sought in many instances and areas of the world--the stronger factors of the Western world insist upon. Early in 1979 and before the collapse of the regime of the shah in Iran--which had appeared secure--we had already noted that the new situation in the area east of Turkey would result (even in the short term) in an increase in the importance of the Turkish factor in the eyes of the well-known complex of forces and interests which act in the area and would lead to granting munificences to Turkey "that would go well beyond massive economic aid." Not only has this prospect been confirmed but the phenomenon has become more extensive and has been accelerated because of the events in Afghanistan on the one hand and the rapid deterioration of the internal socioeconomic situation in Turkey on the other.

We do not nurture the preposterous demand that others conduct their policies in accordance with our interests and that they support us only because right is legally and morally on our side. Everyone is entitled to conduct one's policies in accordance with one's (correct or erroneous) assessments regarding one's own (true or assumed) interests. However, one is obligated to be frank--especially when one addresses one's self to countries which one wants to see as allied and friendly--in one's claims about one's goals.

The consolidation of Turkey (as "the West's bastion" in a sensitive area) and of the southeast wing of the Altantic Alliance is proposed as the aim of the mass economic and military aid to Turkey but neither the one nor the other can be achieved as long as Turkey is in dispute with Greece because of its expansionist and hegemonistic designs against our country and Cyprus. When the main portion of the Turkish Armed Forces is deployed against the Greek area and is used for the occupation of 40 percent of Cyprus, of what use are they to the aims for which the aid is allegedly given? And when this aid causes tension and a deepening of the dispute with Greece--because of the escalation of Turkish provocativeness against Greece and Cyprus as has been recently noted--is the aid really being used for what it is allegedly intended or are its results contrary to those which are being sought? If those giving the aid are truly concerned about the southeast wing of the Atlantic Alliance and about everything else which they claim concerns them, how can they disregard the fact that the potentials of both Greece and Turkey for the Alliance are neutralized since these potentials are directed against each other? And why do they not set as a condition for aid the removal of the Turkish military presence in Cyprus and of Ankara's expansionist designs against Greece--thus utilizing the truly unique opportunity being offered them to eliminate the entire crisis in the area of the eastern Mediterranean?

The peoples of Greece and Turkey share the same geographical area and have every interest in coexisting peacefully and constructively. After all, such coexistence is the only guarantee of stability and security in this critical and sensitive area of the world. However, this coexistence must be based on mutual respect. Adventurist compromises not only are unrealistic but will be to the detriment of their agents or of those who support or tolerate them. When the giving of unconditional aid is tantamount to financing Turkey's designs against Greece and Turkish military occupation in Cyprus, those giving the aid assume the responsibility of the consequences and ramifications which include the possibility of an involuntary turn or chance in Greece's entire international position wrought by the independent forces of the state of affairs....

DHROSOS DEFENDS INFORMATION COLLECTION BY EMBASSIES

AT131428 Athens I KATHIMERINI in Greek 13 Jun 80 p 6

[The "Political Issues" column by G.N. Dhrosos: "Agents and Spies"]

[Text] Iran's prime minister, who if not very powerful certainly has a lot of brains, in an interview explained the reasons why a possible trial of the U.S. hostages as spies, regardless of how it was conducted, would be Iran's detriment. Bani-Sadr, who has lived for many years in Western countries, regardless of how fanatic a muslim he is, knows how foreigners think and the arguments which, in any case, will finally prevail.

In addition to everything the Iranian leader has said, the issue which is inevitably posed in the ultimate analysis is who is a spy and what is the meaning of "spying," because the passing of information to a country by its representatives in another country concerning the situation and prospects there is, of course, not spying. This has always occurred everywhere and is the principal reason why every country accredits its representatives in other countries. Specifically, the great countries which deal with international interests in every area of the world want to be informed of what is happening or may happen in those areas.

Some time ago a report appeared here in Greece which gave the impression of a scandal in the way it was presented because some U.S. service has been collecting information about various political organizations and personalities in Greece. This is the principal duty of that service and other great powers, perhaps not only the great ones, do the same. We certainly do the same in certain other neighboring countries in which we have special interests.

Consequently, the fact that "dossiers" are opened on personalities and organizations by great foreign powers is something most natural. For instance, elections are held and the great foreign country which has interests in our area wants to know what the opposing parties advocate, what is the ideological line of the various parties and what are the personal tendencies and convictions of the various personalities which will compose the new government or will lead the opposition. For instance, Rallis becomes the prime minister in Greece. Do not the U.S. and Soviet governments want and should they not want to learn what his background is and what his tendencies and his preferences are? Even if the governments of the great foreign countries do not ask for this information their services here will hasten to supply it because their job is precisely this. The description that the military attaches of a country are that country's officials spies in another country is well known and internationally established. However, things get complicated sometimes at this point because we touch upon the sector of military secrets and in this case things take the form of true spying after a certain point. In this instance, however, it concerns a purely informative sector which has absolutely no relation to the defense organization and the military secrets of a country.

In Iran a change in regime took place and suddenly a profusion of political or religious organizations sprang up to claim power or a percentage of it. Is it not natural for the Americans, who had huge interests in that country, to want to learn what each of these organizations represents, what power it has and what and how many opportunities it has to influence the future political directions of the new regime? Is it not natural for them to want to learn the possibilities of each organization, what circles it influences and what weapons it has?

In this instance there are a number of parties and organizations, the power of which escalates from almost zero to a high percentage. When foreigners--Russians or Americans--see the signature of an organization under a text or a declaration is it not natural for them to want to know from the outset what this organization is and what it represents? Or when a new magazine or newspaper is published is it not logical that they will instruct their people to learn who the publishers are, who finances it, whose views it represents and why the effort is taking place? Consequently they will instruct their people to ask certain people who know about such things and a dossier will be opened to be supplemented periodically as new facts are collected.

It is possible for this new group or new publication to have clearly hostile intentions against this or that great power. It is absolutely natural that this great power will want to know of it.

After all it does not concern a state secret. The simple monitoring of reports or of the policy of that new movement may prove sufficient. If, in addition, these facts are confirmed by certain people who know persons and things, essentially nothing changes.

Therefore, certainly some of the U.S. hostages used to do this in Iran and many of the employees of the various U.S. services here do the same. After all, do the Soviets do anything else? It just so happens that they have not been discovered or that the evidence which has been revealed has not been considered worth publishing.

It is not necessary for one either to reveal all these things or to prove them. They are common sense and therefore no trial is needed in Tehran nor statements by politicians in Athens. Actually, perhaps in certain cases the directly concerned people and the people about whom the "revelations" were made themselves wanted the opportunity to correct possibly wrong information that had been collected regarding their organizations and their personalities by various foreign "agents" and "spies" around whom such an effort is being made to incite the imagination and to fanaticize public opinion.

[Text] Foreign Minister Hayrettin Erkmen has said: Turkey is a country that must be a link between Europe on the one hand and the Middle East and the Islamic world on the other. Akajans [Mediterranean News Agency]--reports that in a statement to a foreign newspaper, Foreign Minister Erkmen pointed out that Turkey attaches great importance to equality and human rights. Recalling that Turkey has bilateral and multilateral relations with European, Middle Eastern and Asian countries, Erkmen said: The establishment of peace and security in the Balkans, the Middle East and Western Asia is closely connected with Turkey's security requirements. Commenting on the Soviet intervention in Afghanistan, Erkmen said the region's countries must have closer relations in order to deal with developments that might threaten world peace.

RPP TO SUBMIT INTERPELLATION PROPOSAL ON GOVERNMENT

TA121644 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1600 GMT 12 Jun 80

[Text] The RPP General Administrative Council has decided that an interpellation proposal should be submitted concerning the government. The discussions held during yesterday's RPP joint parliamentary group meeting were assessed at the RPP General Administrative Council meeting, which began at 1100 and lasted 3 and 1/2 hours. In a statement at the end of the meeting, RPP Deputy Secretary General Altan Oymen said: The RPP General Administrative Council has unanimously decided that it is necessary to submit an interpellation proposal concerning the government. The Administrative Councils of the RPP Assembly and Senate groups will meet at 0930 tomorrow and discuss this subject, which was submitted by the General Administrative Council as a recommendation.

RPP Parliamentary Groups' Approval

TA131846 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1600 GMT 13 Jun 80

[Text] The Administrative Councils of the RPP Senate and National Assembly groups have decided to submit an interpellation to overthrow the government. RPP leader Bulent Ecevit disclosed the decision by the groups' Administrative Councils at a news conference at the parliament today. Ecevit said that the country was rapidly being dragged into an economic calamity, as well as the crisis in domestic security and the regime, because of the government's attitude and administration.

Noting that the Administrative Councils of the groups had unanimously agreed on the necessity of submitting an interpellation to overthrow the government, Ecevit added that various group members had certain misgivings on the issue and that, therefore, the issue would be taken up at the group meeting on Monday. Ecevit said that if this opportunity--though not decisive--to overthrow the government was not exploited, the RPP would be held responsible by the nation and history.

Noting that great difficulties will be faced if the responsibility of forming a government falls to them after the current government is overthrown, Ecevit added: However, the important issue is that there are no problems within the RPP.

It is very beneficial for us to clearly assess whether or not, and if so to what extent, the misgivings expressed in our recent group meeting will constitute an obstacle and a problem to our shouldering this burden. Therefore, if our groups feel it is necessary, the issue will once more be taken up at the group meeting to be held on Monday. If we are convinced that these misgivings will not be a source of concern in the future, the interpellation will be submitted to the Assembly chairmanship. Ecevit concluded by saying that a binding decision will not be made on the voting for the interpellation at the Assembly to enable the group to fully and freely express its willpower and unity.

DEMIREL ACCUSES ECEVIT OF INVOLVING ARMY IN POLITICS

TA141053 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1000 GMT 14 Jun 80

[Text] Prime Minister and Justice Party leader Suleyman Demirel said that it is meaningless to involve the army in political arguments. In a written statement issued today Demirel said: I saw a statement by RPP leader Ecevit in today's press which said: I heard of certain plans that will inflict great damage on the army unless the government falls by August. If this statement is correct, it displays once more how irresponsible and far from serious Mr Ecevit is. I do not know what made Mr Ecevit, who is trying to create a government crisis, think of involving the army in this matter. Let him do whatever he wishes in connection with the government. However, it is meaningless to needlessly and unjustly involve the army in political arguments. The army is fulfilling its duty within the circle of its own command, in the place stipulated by the Constitution and with the seriousness and soberness of fulfilling the duties envisaged by the Constitution and the laws.

Demirel continued: It does not occur to anyone to inflict damage on the army. Mr Ecevit is obliged to reveal the source and contents of the plans that he has heard. Otherwise, his action would be tantamount to destructiveness and not opposition. Talking haphazardly on such serious subjects and basing this on imagination cannot be interpreted in any other way. The government is concerned only about assisting our armed forces in fulfilling their duty in tranquillity.

Mr Ecevit divided the police force of the republic, its teachers and its students and he also divided the people through secterian provocations in various places. Let him, at least, leave the army alone. In whatever capacity, we will always continue to oppose such schemes and provocations, like the ones staged by Mr Ecevit.

Ecevit Response

TA141740 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1600 GMT 14 Jun 80

[Text] RPP leader Bulent Ecevit has said: Based on a report incorrectly leaked to a newspaper from a private conversation I held, Prime Minister Demirel leveled grave and unjust accusations against me today.

Commenting on a statement by Prime Minister Demirel, Ecevit said: At my meeting with the independent deputies, I expressed my concern about the (?promotion) procedures to be carried out in the armed forces in August. I expressed my concern in the same way and to the same extent that I expressed my concern in public statements and meetings. I did not say anything more or less. I did not say anything about having heard about certain plans. I only mentioned my concern as I have expressed it publicly.

Ecevit added: There are two reasons for my concern. The first is that certain circles which support the government are nervous about the martial law's impartial attitude and about its operations that remain loyal to a democratic state of law.

The second is that during his previous terms as prime minister, Mr Demirel made certain moves that ran counter to the armed forces' sound rules and traditions about promotions and appointments. I hope that Mr Demirel will not add new examples to those moves at this time of crisis. Loyalty to the armed forces' legal and traditional rules is a guarantee both for our state as well as for the democratic system. We are not trying to divide the armed forces; on the contrary, we are trying to prevent intentions and tendencies to divide the armed forces. In fact, we do not believe that anybody has the power to divide the armed forces anyway.

In conclusion, Ecevit said: It has always been Mr Demirel's basic strategy to provoke enmity in order to divide not only a particular class or organization, but the entire nation. Mr Demirel discriminates even among terrorists; he has not publicly condemned even once the terrorists who support him. In the light of all this Mr Demirel has no right to accuse us of causing division. If the Turkish nation's unity has been protected to a great extent against a politician like Mr Demirel--who tried to divide our nation into fronts by establishing a [nationalist] "front" governments--it is thanks to the contributions of the RPP which advanced Ataturkist nationalism is this country and which cherishes that nationalism in its banner and conscience.

TURKES ACCUSATION

TA151755 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1600 GMT 15 Jun 80

[Text] Nationalist Action Party [NAP] leader Alpaslan Turkes said that RPP leader Bulent Ecevit is exploiting the Turkish Armed Forces for his own interests. Speaking at the Marmara regional meeting organized by his party, Turkes said that the functioning of the armed forces outside and above politics while preserving its unity within its chain of command was a principle of vital importance. Noting that this principle was introduced to the armed forces by Ataturk, Turkes added: Now Ecevit has trampled upon this Ataturkist principle of keeping the armed forces outside daily political arguments and has attempted to involve the armed forces of the republic in politics in order to divert public attention elsewhere with the aim of serving his greedy interests and preserving his party leadership, which is being threatened.

Calling on Ecevit to make public all the information he possesses on the issue, Turkes continued: Ecevit should explain his statement, which created suspicion and concern with regard to the armed forces. He should make public all he knows about what is going on within the armed forces. He should also expose the documents on the issue, if he has any. Otherwise he should not exploit the Turkish Armed Forces, which is the apple of the nation's eye and its sole guarantee. Turkes concluded by saying that the country needed unity and solidarity more than ever to solve the current crises.

TURKES BLAMES ECEVIT FOR CURRENT POLITICAL SITUATION

TA141920 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1600 GMT 14 Jun 80

[Text] Nationalist Action Party [NAP] leader Alpaslan Turkes has said that his party is waging a struggle to establish a new administration that is based on love of mankind and respect for human dignity. Addressing an open air rally organized by his party in Bursa, Turkes said that with feelings of brotherhood the NAP was struggling against injustices and against the practice of blaming all the problems and placing all the burden on one segment of the nation. Turkes said: We consider man's labor to be holy and honorable. We are a new power, a new movement, which, before everything else, believes that the country will be happier by working and saving, which considers it its aim to protect labor from all kinds of injustices and which takes its (?inspiration) from the Turkish nation.

Turkes said that he was determined to eradicate bribery and usury in the country. He added: That is why the traitors and divisionists and their collaborators, and mostly, the Babrak Karmal candidate Ecevit, are enemies of our party.

Turkes stressed that his party would not fall into the trap of those who wanted to divide the nation and drag the nation into a civil war. He added that the NAP would trust the common sense of the nation and continue to struggle for its cause. He said: We consider the Turkish nation to be an indivisible and sacred entity from Edirne to Kars, from Sinop to Mersin, regardless of regional, sectarian or party differences. We are determined to protect this indivisible whole in spite of everything.

In his speech, the NAP leader alleged that RPP leader Ecevit and his collaborators were the main ones responsible for the present situation in the country. Turkes said: An awakening has started within the RPP as well. There are movements within the higher echelons of the party against Ecevit's leadership. Ecevit is scared and in panic. He is trying to divert the attention of the conscientious and patriotic RPP members who want to get rid of his leadership and to keep them behind him by creating enmities outside the party. That is the real reason why he submitted a motion for an interpellation, why he is trying to topple the present government and why he is talking about his dream of coming to power again. I am convinced that conscientious RPP members will not fall into his trap.

DEMIREL: GOVERNMENT TO ASK ASSEMBLY FOR MARTIAL LAW EXTENSION

[Text] Prime Minister Suleyman Demirel said that the increasing political arguments have made it impossible to deal with the future of the country. Demirel held his weekly meeting with Acting President Ihsan Sabri Caglayangil. He replied to reporters' questions as he was emerging from the Cankaya Mansion. Noting that the government was trying to correct what has gone wrong, Demirel said that the government has made very important decisions since it received a vote of confidence 6 and 1/2 months ago, especially since 24 January. He expressed the belief that the policy pursued in combating anarchy and inflation will be successful.

Demirel added that he will hold a meeting with the martial law commanders on 16 June and that the National Security Council will convene on 17 June. He noted that the government will ask the Grand National Assembly on 18 June to extend martial law. We are in control of all of Turkey's problems. We are trying to serve our nation and our country with determination and enthusiasm.

A reporter recalled claims that the government was acting in accordance with the requests of domestic and foreign interest circles. In reply to this question, Demirel said that a government based on the majority of the nation cannot collaborate with interest circles.

Noting that the $1.65 billion loan to be extended to Turkey will be endorsed by the IMF on 18 June, Demirel said that $250 million of this amount will be available as of 20 June. In reply to another question, Demirel said that curbing the rate of inflation was the primary economic problem and that inflation could disrupt not only the economy but also law and order.

A reporter told Demirel that the presidential election has become secondary and that the primary issue has become the government issue. Demirel said that the presidential election was the most important issue but that the RPP had failed to nominate a candidate for the past week. He added that the RPP was not participating in the voting to elect a president. He said: A month has gone by since we first proposed to resort to the nation. Had they acted in accordance with our wish we would have elected a president by Sunday.

Noting that RPP was trying to shift political discussions toward another issue, Demirel said: However, the presidential election cannot be treated as a secondary problem. It is the most important problem. Was it not he [RPP leader Elevit] who claimed that the acting president cannot appoint senators? If they create a government crisis tomorrow how are we to solve this crisis? How will an acting president, who cannot appoint senators, appoint a prime minister? Demirel said that the letter of requests submitted by the National Salvation Party will be answered on Monday.

Question: Do early elections affect the stability program?

Answer: We are fulfilling our task in a spirit of great responsibility without thinking of elections at all.

Question: Will there be any more price increases?

Answer: Price increases in goods and services apart from the essential commodities will be within the power of the producing organization, not of the government. No increase in the price of essential commodities and services is envisaged.

Question: You went to Saudi Arabia twice. Prime Ministry Secretary General Turgut Ozal visited the same country once. But there has been no development in obtaining credits from Saudi Arabia. Why?

Answer: I hope that we shall sign a credit agreement with Saudi Arabia by the end of the current month.

Question: Will the money shortage in the market continue?

Answer: Yes, it will. We will continue to implement our money and credit policy. We have no other choice. However, bank credits will be shifted to productive fields. Our aim is to increase production and we are taking the necessary steps in this direction.

Question: How much credit shall we receive this year?

Answer: The IMF Administrative Council is meeting on 18 June. Aid of $1.65 billion is envisaged for the next 3 years. We have already used $650 million of this amount. We are going to use another $250 million after 20 June.

KREISKY VIEWS MIDEAST, SOUTHWEST ASIAN CRISES AFTER OSLO MEETING

AU161453 [Editorial Report] Vienna Domestic Television Service at 2045 GMT on 15 June carries 45 minutes of recorded excerpts from Chancellor Bruno Kreisky's speech at a Vienna Austrian Socialist Party rally on 14 June, in which he extensively discussed the Middle East, Iran and Afghanistan problems.

Speaking about the Middle East problem Kreisky reiterates his recent criticism of Israel's current policy, stressing his opinion that, if that policy were tolerated, Israel would ultimately disappear from the map because in the long run it can exist only in a peaceful environment--and that environment is an Arab one. He strongly pleads for the Palestinians' right to a state of their own and argues that their position and that of the "most reasonable Israeli, future Prime Minister Peres" are not so far apart that the gap could not be bridged by thorough negotiations. Failing that, however, Kreisky says a new radicalization in that part of the world is inevitable.

As regards Iran, Kreisky says the overthrow of the shah's regime with its excellently organized "Gestapo-type police" and a "loyal army" had been possible only because of the strength of religious beliefs. But now, in the second phase of the revolution, the religious leaders are being confronted with the country's big social problems of starvation, need and unemployment, he says, expressing doubt that the Koran would provide the answers to those questions.

"And on the strength of what we have seen in Iran I have come to the conclusion that this revolution is far from being over, and that the power centers existing there are still far from being in actual control, that they are struggling against one another--and you see, comrades, the hostages affair is nothing else but an expression of this struggle among the various power centers. One of them--which is represented by the Iranian foreign minister, who yesterday, or rather for 2 days, visited the Socialist International [SI]--that group is very well aware of the fact that sooner or later this problem will have to be solved if there is to be another opening toward the Western world, primarily toward democratic Europe. And the other group is also aware of this--only, it does not want such an opening, because of course many followers of Islamic fundamentalism feel that such an opening would interfere with the implementation of their own ideas."

Kreisky adds that this is what makes the problem so complicated, and that neither Palme, Gonzalez nor he himself would have understood the correlations without having gone to Tehran. We are now dealing with a revolution which no one knows where it will end, Kreisky says, but at least no one will be able to reproach the SI later on for having remained inactive. He describes the SI delegations's approach at the talks with Iranian representatives in Tehran: to display interest in all aspects of the revolution without broaching the problem of the hostages, but wait for the Iranian side to bring it up, which it did right away. He hailed as a success the Iranian leaders' decision to dispatch Foreign Minister Qotbzadeh to Oslo and said in this context: "Only fools or impatient journalists always expect us to solve at such meetings as if by magic everything that has been messed up and ruined for weeks, months and years. That requires a process, a new opinion-forming process."

Recalling in this context the hostility and difficulties he encountered in Arab countries on his first SI fact-finding mission, Kreisky goes on to say: "It took a long time before they (in the Arab world) talked differently with us--months and years. But today the SI carries some weight in the Arab world--and there have even been rather worried voices in the Soviet Union expressing concern that we have too much influence in the Arab countries. And, comrades, naturally there are also others who do not like to see us talk with the Iranians and tell them much more than we are willing to announce publicly.

"But yesterday he [Qotbzadeh] left the SI bureau session with the feeling: Here are people who did not ask us for oil, who did not demand that we pay our debts, people who have no divisions that threaten us--here are men and women who are freely elected representatives of many millions of democratic socialists from Europe and other parts of the world--and that is certainly a moral force which should not be ignored. Of course, those who do not want to have anything to do with this force because it seems dangerous to them will not be impressed. And thus we will have to wait and see how the discussion develops and above all we must take part in it as long as they let us."

Kreisky continues: "I am convinced that if this discussion can be continued in the same way, then we will also come to the release of the hostages. And whatever they maybe charged with--of course we know all about the fact that diplomats are not always just diplomats, that there are crosscurrents, conspiracies that are being encouraged, and all that sort of thing--but since we have agreed that whoever holds a diplomatic passport must be expelled from a country if he has done something wrong and cannot be taken hostage, and because that is a practice that has been observed for thousands of years--a practice which, by the way, is also laid down in the Koran--it must be respected. However, this cannot prevent us from telling the Americans plainly where we believe that they have blundered. It cannot prevent us from telling them that this is another example showing what a delusion it is to hope that one's cause is safe in the hands of a military dictatorship."

The Afghanistan problem is described by Kreisky as the most difficult because one of the big powers was already directly involved, and the Russians had been just as wrong in their assessment of what was in store for them in Afghanistan as the Americans had been in the case of Iran. Describing the views of the two sides, Kreisky says things were "looking pretty bad at the moment," he notes that there are other powers behind the rebels, adding that if this war should drag on it might kindle numerous other wars in that region--and that would be bound to lead to a tremendous confrontation of the superpowers. "Hence it is necessary to keep the three hotbeds of crisis apart, to prevent them from becoming intertwined, merged into one big hotbed of crisis that can no longer be controlled." He goes on to say that it is still possible to seek peaceful compromises in that region, and that it is everyone's task to work wherever he can to ease tensions and bring back such a situation as existed a year ago, when SALT II was signed and there was hope for an early start to the SALT III talks, for progress at the MBFR, and for the success of the Madrid conference.

'Begin Must Go'

[Text] Beirut, June 16 (AFP)--The solution of the Palestine problem lies in recognition of the right to an independent state, Austrian Chancellor Bruno Kreisky told the newspaper AS-SAFIR in an interview published here today. "Israel, with its army of 30,000 men is one of the best equipped and trained in the world and would have nothing to fear from a Palestinian state led by the PLO (Palestine Liberation Organization)," Chancellor Kreisky said. The PLO was the sole representative of the Palestinian people and the United Nations' resolutions should be "amended and completed" to detail their rights. He praised the "sincere efforts" of President Jimmy Carter and Anwar as-Sadat to search for peace, but declared the Camp David Peace process between Egypt and Israel had failed.

Mr. Kreisky kept his strongest attack for Israel's prime minister, Menahem Begin, describing him as "an extreme chauvinist." "The resignations of Moshe Dayan and 'Ezer Weizman as foreign minister and minister of defense confirmed my view," he said. "As long as Mr. Begin stays he will do nothing. Therefore he must go."

Talks With Pahr

[Text] At the invitation of Foreign Minister Willibald Pahr Prof Mohammad Shamsul Haq, foreign minister of Bangladesh, paid an official visit to Austria 12-14 June.

Their working talks, marked by an openminded and friendly climate, were also attended by A.K.H. Morshed, ambassador of Bangladesh to Austria; M.R. Osmany, director general of the Bangladesh Foreign Ministry; and on Austria's side by Ambassador Alois Reitbauer, secretary general for foreign affairs, as well as by high-ranking Foreign Ministry officials. In the working talks, bilateral and international questions of mutual interest were discussed. In the assessment of many international questions a similarity of views was noted. The two sides agreed to intensify their bilateral relations. At the conclusion of the working talks Bangladesh Foreign Minister Haq invited Foreign Minister Willibald Pahr to pay a visit to Bangladesh. Pahr accepted this invitation with thanks. The date of the visit will be fixed through diplomatic channels.

The Bangladesh foreign minister visited President Rudolf Kirchschlaeger and conveyed to him an invitation from Bangladesh President Ziaur Rahman to pay a visit to Bangladesh, which was accepted with thanks. The Bangladesh foreign minister also called on State Secretary Adolf Nussbaumer. The Austrian Government representatives displayed interest in economic cooperation with Bangladesh in connection with the implementation of Bangladesh's second 5-year plan. Professor Haq invited State Secretary Nussbaumer to pay a visit to Bangladesh. The invitation was accepted with thanks.

MORE REFUGEES--In May 1980, 444 persons requested political asylum in Austria as against 251 in May 1979. At the same time, asylum proceedings were concluded in 318 cases: 246 persons were recognized as refugees under the provisions of the Geneva Convention (as against 107 persons in May 1979), and the remaining 72 persons who had requested political asylum were permitted to stay in Austria. [Vienna WIENER ZEITUNG in German 17 Jun 80 p 3 AU]

HUNGARY BOOSTS EXPORTS--In the period January-April 1980, Hungary boosted its exports to Austria by 65.5 percent to 1.39 billion schillings, while Austrian exports to Hungary went up only 1.4 percent to 1.48 billion schillings. The slight Austrian trade surplus will be far overcompensated by proceeds from tourist trade, since the number of Austrian tourists visiting Hungary has soared since the abolution of visas. Austrian economic experts welcome this development, which has put an end to the longstanding Hungarian problem of large deficits in trade with Austria, and hope that the new situation will result in new Hungarian orders for Austrian exporters. FOREIGN MINISTER ON EUROMISSILES, DETENTE, ARMS SALES

[Francis Unwin interview with Foreign Minister Charles-Ferdinand Nothomb on 10 June; place not given: "No Belgian Decision on the Missiles"]

[Text] [Question] Mr Minister, Mr Simonet, your predecessor, granted us an interview on 28 November last year. He began by stating that "Belgium exists too.... If it seems to the rest of the world that Belgium did not exist why," he said, "do you think that our opinion would still be asked?" Mr Nothomb, do you think that our partners still care about Belgium's opinion? Moreover do our laborious Community compromises not prevent us from forming such an opinion?

[Answer] I find that foreign countries attach importance to our opinion on European affairs and in defense matters. Therefore we must be a credible country outside our own dimension. Our opinion is only important if we assume the corresponding responsibilities. Ultimately a big country can have successive conflicting positions. If we are to have a say we must be a serious partner for our opinion to be considered. Otherwise the temptation is to consider only the country's influence. I will add that it is also useful for the big groups to which we belong to contain small countries which can express their views at a given moment.

[Question] We were recently prompted to write that "indecision" had become a "Belgian speciality." While Belgium should in principle have given a decision on the deployment of cruise missiles in our country in 1983 at the Atlantic Alliance meeting in December 1979, we decided to give ourselves a 6-month period to determine whether detente could be continued. This period was decided upon in fact to hide differences of opinion within the Martens II government. The Martens III Cabinet's governmental statement says that no decision will be taken before the foreign minister has made the "necessary contacts." In other words we are discreetly giving ourselves another period for consideration of at least 6 months and this will have to be announced to our Atlantic partners at the Alliance's spring ministerial session in Ankara on 25 and 26 June. Do you think we could do this while preserving what remains of our credibility? Especially since there has meanwhile been the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan?

[Answer] The Martens III government has observed that all the contacts which should have been made could not be carried through successfully because of the government crisis. The Ankara meeting is a little too close for the new government to be able to complete these investigations. Hence in Ankara we will merely explain our position which can be explained by events in domestic politics. Nonetheless the Belgian Government is taking its decisions in the light of 1980. Russian intervention in Afghanistan, considerable arms effort--one SS-20 missile deployed each week--while also taking account of the weakening of transatlantic relations. It is in this context that we will have to carry out the talks which will enable us to decide our stance.

[Question] When in opposition the Liberals were resolutely in favor of an immediate decision in favor of the deployment of cruise missiles in Belgium. All the indications are that they have not changed their minds now that they are in government....

[Answer] I refer you to the government declaration which the Liberals backed. To return to the vital investigations, it must be pointed out that we are not carrying out this work alone. The United States has twice proposed negotiations to the USSR and the reply has twice been negative. Chancellor Schmidt is expected in Moscow at the end of the month (to try to persuade Mr Brezhnev to finally start discussions on the Soviet SS-20 missiles on the one hand and on the Pershing-2 and cruise missiles on the other--LE SOIR editor's note).

Mr Schmidt's approach is similar to the approach which the Belgian Government wants to make. Therefore we are not taking any decision until we see how his visit to Moscow goes. The ideal solution would have been to follow, as [former Belgian Foreign Minister] Harmel did, a voluntary detente policy toward Eastern Europe based on the credibility of our defense system. However, our relations with the East have now seriously deteriorated. Furthermore our relations with the United States are not as good as they might be.

[Question] Your predecessor did not hide the fact that the United States can be a difficult ally. It showed this, he said, especially in the disarmament sphere by making unilateral concessions to the USSR. Furthermore in the Iranian and Afghan crises everybody agrees that the United States did not always act with all the diplomacy necessary to obtain equally necessary solidarity from its allies. Do you believe that the United States is in fact a "difficult ally"?

[Answer] Any alliance is difficult. Any political alliance is something which has to be handled with care. This alliance with the United States is vital. We have inescapable ties with the United States but also different sensitive areas which call for a constant effort at reciprocal contact and understanding. Moreover this can also be done discreetly.

[Question] After announcing Europe's intention to launch a spectacular initiative to take over from the "pax Americana" in the Middle East, are the Nine not likely to show at their meeting in Venice this Thursday that their intentions carry little weight when Washington does not share their opinions? Indeed there is no longer any question of a European initiative but simply of a declaration.

[Answer] It is obvious that Europe should be concerned with peace in the Middle East. This search should take place in line with the Camp David process. It is clear that a joint European declaration drawn up in Venice would constitute a positive factor, for the Europeans among others.

[Question] How do you view the development of our relations with Zaire and with the whole Third World?

[Answer] The government declaration makes provision for continuing to give special aid to Zaire, Rwanda and Burundi. For Belgium this is a huge task but we must nonetheless try to make efforts to aid the poorest Third World countries.

[Question] From time to time affairs concerning the sale of arms to foreign countries cause a stir in Belgian public opinion. It seems that the foreign minister has very considerable powers in this sphere and that Parliament cannot fully exercise its monitoring mission. What is your opinion on this question?

[Answer] It is true that Belgium has a tradition in the arms production sphere, specializing in the manufacture of light weapons, and this tradition goes back to the last century. This production, like any other, is also important from the viewpoint of employment. Nobody disputes our country's right to produce the arms it needs. That is true of our own country and of the alliance to which we belong. I would also like to stress that Belgium is a net importer of arms. Having said that, it is true that there are problems of political appropriateness and that the minister has a tricky responsibility because it is he who gives the verdict on this appropriateness. Every decision he has to take must take account of a whole series of frequently conflicting factors. It can be said that no choice can be completely satisfactory unless we decided not to produce any more weapons. We started our efforts to provide information at the parliamentary level last week and we are going to have a discussion on this problem. I obviously want to give as much information to the houses of Parliament as possible and to discuss the general interests on which my decisions should be based. However it is important to realize that there will never be any simple decision in this sphere. In any case it is not the foreign minister who decides arms sales. However, it is the foreign minister's job to decide any ban for reasons of political inappropriateness.

BOELLING DISCUSSES CARTER LETTER TO SCHMIDT, MOSCOW VISIT

DW161202 Cologne Deutschlandfunk Network in German to East and West Germany 0549 GMT 16 Jun 80

[Reporter Kroenig interview with State Secretary Klaus Boelling, chief of the Federal Press and Information Office; date, place not given--recorded]

[Text] [Question] It is a fact that U.S. President Carter has written a letter to Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt. The sender's motives and the tone of the letter, however, are unclear. According to reports of the magazine STERN, the letter was written in a rough tone, warning the federal chancellor prior to his Moscow visit against making an agreement that could call into question the planned stationing of new medium-range missiles on the territory of the Federal Republic or elsewhere in Europe.

Regardless of the tone--rough or not--a letter at this time seems to be some sort of warning shot from Washington.

[Answer] I do not know what you base that impression on except the STERN report. It is my impression that STERN has gotten a story from somebody who might be pursuing his own interests.

The letter from the U.S. President is factual, friendly, like all the letters that have been exchanged over the years between any German chancellor and the leader of the United States. The President describes, for example, the common Western position on the so-called decision to close the arms gap of December last year. There is not even a trace of differences of opinion.

You may remember that the federal chancellor described the position of the Federal Government at the SPD congress in Essen in such a way that there can be no doubts that we back the decision to close the arms gap and that we consider the balancing element of this decision, as before, to be very important, as the chancellor has repeatedly said. This balancing element is the offer on negotiations made to the Soviet Union, since the USSR has upset the balance by its stepped-up armament in the field of medium-range missiles. The chancellor, in going to Moscow at this time--and he has the explicit agreement of the American President--will naturally discuss this issue. This will also serve the interests of the United States as our most important Alliance partner.

I have seen nothing of a rough tone in this letter. It is a factual letter, depicting the arguments of the Alliance.

[Question] But perhaps there are still differences of opinion, and I do not mean just since yesterday, with regard to NATO's double decision of last December which you mentioned--namely, the decision to close the arms gap and the simultaneous offer to hold negotiations. It seems to me that the Americans give much more weight to the decision to close the arms gap and that they believe that the negotiating offer does not at all carry the same political weight.

[Answer] This interpretation was heard occasionally last year but we, the Federal Government, believe that this impression is wrong. When Vance was still secretary of state the United States urged the Soviet Union several times to take up the second element--the arms limitation element--in the decision, exactly as the federal chancellor has done in many speeches.

[Question] Does this mean that the federal chancellor will probably bring back from Moscow the interest of the Soviet Government, its agreement with regard to arms control talks?

[Answer] Well, that remains to be seen. You just cannot predict 2 weeks prior to such a visit what the other side wishes to tell us concerning this important point. But you will recall that the Soviet Union expressly said when Leonid Brezhnev was here in Bonn in 1978 that neither side should aspire to military superiority over the other--and that was one of the most important parts of the joint Soviet-German statement. I think that the chancellor will recall this extremely important principle in his Moscow talks.

[Question] It is striking that Herbert Wehner, the SPD floorleader in the Bundestag, said the other day that he sees slight changes in Moscow which could lead to the conclusion that there is receptiveness to negotiations on medium-range missile armament in Europe.

[Answer] It would be in the interest of the Federal Republic, in the interest of the entire Western alliance and, we believe, in the well understood interest of the Soviet Union if this assessment by the SPD floorleader were to be confirmed in Moscow.

[Question] Don't you have similar information?

[Answer] I don't want to get involved in speculation just prior to this trip.

[Question] In any event, would emphasis on, a repetition of, the statement in Moscow which you just mentioned, namely, the statement issued when Brezhnev was here about not seeking military superiority, be indirect circumstantial evidence for the potential readiness of the Soviets to talk about medium-range missiles?

[Answer] This, too, is speculative. I believe we can assume that the Soviet leadership is even better aware of how important it is to finally open negotiations on the issue of medium-range weapons.

[Question] And the Americans would be happy about it, too, would they not?

[Answer] But of course.

[Question] And Washington circles--for example, around security adviser Brzezinski--do not harbor any skepticism with regard to FRG foreign policy in general and Ostpolitik in particular?

[Answer] During this interview this morning, let me say this with great emphasis: We, at any rate, have not given any cause for skepticism or doubts as a result of our actions. And people voicing such skepticism here and there probably have something other than objective goals in mind.

[Question] Meaning that, in this case, you also have in mind Washington circles?

[Answer] Yes, Washington circles. You know, there are journalists, there are members of parliament who sometimes suspect this or that owing to their inadequate familiarity with German policies. It is probably better to ignore them and proceed with business as usual even if the opposition has occasionally deemed it necessary, and probably will deem it necessary each day in the future, to listen to such voices, anonymous voices, and to exploit them. That's life.

ZIMMERMANN: CARTER LETTER REFLECTS 'DEEP CRISIS' IN ALLIANCE

LD161248 Hamburg DPA in German 1141 GMT 16 Jun 80

[Text] Friedrich Zimmermann, chairman of the CSU laender group in the Bundestag, sees Carter's letter to Schmidt as confirmation of the "deep crisis" into which the chancellor has cast the Western alliance with his plans for negotiations in Moscow.

Zimmermann said in Bonn today that the views of the governments in Bonn and Washington were divided despite their mutual concern--conditioned by the election campaign--to put forward a common assessment regarding security. Schmidt is ready to put the NATO counter-armament decision on ice in Moscow and to help guarantee the USSR's immense superiority. It was against this that Carter was directing his "veto," and it is this that the CDU-CSU feared, Zimmerman claimed.

COMMENTATOR VIEWS U.S. RESENTMENT TOWARD EUROPE

DW161450 Bonn DIE WELT in German 14 Jun 80 p 6

[Peter Boenisch editorial: "Bad Friends"]

[Text] "Well," many Europeans are saying, "it has been inflated by the press." President Carter said himself that he is content with the European allies.

Maybe Carter believes what we would so much like to have happen. It is more likely, however, that he speaks of agreement in the Alliance because he fears that the voters could hold him responsible for dissonance within it. This President cannot afford to be involved in failures of any kind.

But he who does not listen to the President but to what Americans say in private, both here and overseas, will notice very quickly that the resentment of the Americans with regard to Europe is deep. They feel abandoned and are deeply worried by the course the Europeans are taking.

It does not help the Germans very much by being the least bad friends among the bad friends of the Americans. It is felt we should be taking a leading role but are not; our political influence and economic strength are overrated. Since Bonn gives the appearance of being so high-handed and capable, it must also do more.

The result of this assessment is that we are not better off than others with regard to U.S. public opinion, but worse. Traditional feelings may be involved also. Even if the British are weak helpers in matters of sanctions, they still remain Anglo-Saxon brothers. If the French undertake self-willed action, they remain an old love from the Revolutionary War. Egocentric action by Anglo-Saxons and Gauls is accepted--not ours. Steuben is just not Lafayette.

What older people would rather not hear about is being ignored by youth even more, the youth who have no sense of history. They seem to have forgotten that the Germans and Americans are just postwar friends and that they were enemies in a genocidal war begun by us. Our crimes live not merely in the memory of the Jews, and often, only too often, one of the "Krauts" runs in a Third Reich uniform across the screens of U.S. television: a symbol of evil.

Friendship, which is a tender plant, needs special care on that soil. The postwar generation on both sides knew it and worked on it. Common suffering (public revolts crushed by Soviet tanks in 1953, 1956 and 1968) and common struggles (blockade, division of Berlin and the building of the wall) made many Germans and Americans rally together.

Pampered with care packages, helped by the Marshall Plan to rebuild the country, and having experienced the Berlin airlift which helped to save half the city from Stalin's grabbing, a postwar generation grew up which has been rightly called by Gerd Bucerious of DIE ZEIT as being pro-American.

Now a young leftwinger wonders: "Why should I be pro-American? After all, I do not ask the Americans to be pro-German, either." Thus an alliance as a cool transaction on the basis of mutuality. The chancellor, who likes so much to press cool formulas through his teeth, has found dangerous emulators here--dangerous, because they are far less loyal to the Alliance than he is.

But on the other side of the Atlantic, too, the keepers of the seal of U.S.-German friendship are no longer in office. Tough and domestically entrenched figures such as Carter's adviser, Hamilton Jordan, are calling the shots. And sometimes one gains the impression that Henry Kissinger has taken Washington's foreign policy along with him into his private life.

But whatever we may lament as mistakes of the United States--inadequate consultation and lack of conscription--these mistakes, after all, are no reason to deny friendship.

The behavior of Europe toward the United States is not only ungrateful but foolish. The protection of the old world by the new world just cannot be measured by missiles and soldiers alone. What is decisive is the will and readiness of the American people to come to our aid. Particularly anyone seeing the bipolar world of the superpowers drawing to an end, particularly anyone seeing new powers growing and refusing to be the mere object of negotiations, rather wishing to have a say about and determine their destinies themselves need the protection and confidence of their partners more than ever.

The way Europe is behaving now is paradoxical. When security is at stake the people in government in East and West hang onto their respective big brothers. Without the Russians in the East they would have to fear for their rule; in the West they would have to fear for their freedom and prosperity without the Americans. Still, the small ones are always peeking from behind the legs of the two big ones to ascertain whether or not playing with each other is possible.

This lust for getting together, which produces new formulas for conjuring up detente, cannot be explained only by fear of war, longing for peace, and a resultant neo-Chamberlainism. European attempts to test this situation reveal that European partition will not work in the long run. The people of this continent want to jointly climb over the wall of concrete and the barbed wire of ideology. What is absolutely necessary in this respect is that politicians who join these dreams of their peoples do not neglect national security. Neither defense readiness nor force of deterrence must become questionable, otherwise, there could be unity some day, albeit a unity without freedom.

As good as it is for Willy Brandt to call the SPD a "party of the West," it is equally regrettable that something like that is necessary in a divided country with a divided capital, and that after 35 years of experience with barbed wire and tanks from the East.

PAPER QUESTIONS CARTER BELIEF IN U.S.-EUROPE 'HARMONY'

DW1314444 Frankfurt FRANKFURTER RUNDSCHAU in German 13 Jun 80 p 3

[Werner Holzer editorial: "The Competition From Overseas"]

[Text] If what some European journalists now report from Washington is true, the U.S. President is convinced that there is really no such thing as "great disharmony" between the United States and its allies. According to Jimmy Carter these are exclusively products of the imagination of the press. If it contributed to the internal peace of the Western alliance journalists on both sides of the Atlantic would probably take this accusation without too much of a contradiction. After all, they are used to being made the scapegoats by politicians.

The problem is that this optimism on the part of President Carter comes too much as a surprise. Just a few days ago he threatened the Europeans with a U.S. veto in the UN Security Council if they develop activities on their own in connection with the Middle East conflict, and he now flatly maintains that the Western alliance is stronger today and more in harmony than ever before.

Naturally this could also be the product of journalistic imagination, theoretically. Much rather, though, we cannot but assume that it is only political tactics that hide behind these friendly words. Probably we come closest to reality in the U.S.-European relationship if we neither take Jimmy Carter's new optimism at face value nor the croaking on both sides of the Atlantic heralding the gradual ruin of the Alliance. No doubt a growing displeasure has spread among the U.S. public because these Europeans have lately been developing concepts of how to deal with international problems which are too individualistic. It is a displeasure which has been born from a mixture of irritation over the ingratitude of the Alliance partners and a poorly defined mistrust regarding their reliability, but also from lack of understanding for the structure of an alliance of sovereign partners.

In Venice, where the summit meeting of the European heads of state and government has just begun, there is ample cause, anyway, for particularly pondering the phenomena of alienation between the United States and its partners. As much as the Europeans would have reason to debate their own, often pussillanimous controversies, it is just as definite, on the other hand, that broad segments of the debate will be commanded by a topic in which strong differences of opinion do indeed exist between Washington and the European capitals.

What is meant here above all is the intention of the Europeans to again state their views about the Israeli-Arab conflict in a statement of their own. If the relationship within the Western alliance were as untroubled as Jimmy Carter now describes it, this difference of opinion would have been superfluous.

Most European governments never wanted to try to torpedo the U.S. Middle East initiative and turn themselves into peacemakers. Hardly anyone in Western Europe is so unrealistic as to fail to see how little power is behind European statements concerning any conflicts. On the other hand, people in Europe have been convinced for quite some time that the negotiations in the Middle East, which have been made possible by the Camp David agreements, have been stalemated for some time. Their initiative was intended to provide new impulses in this situation and make Europe's position clear to all parties involved--though not to the United States.

But suspicious as people now are in the United States, Washington saw nothing but cunning competition in the intention of the Europeans. From quarters very close to the U.S. President, blunt statements could be heard as to why this is so. Jimmy Carter, they said, would not dream of letting others seemingly pass him by as a creator of peace. The situation of Egypt's President as-Sadat, they say, who likewise cannot allow the Europeans to overtake the Camp David agreements to the advantage of the Palestinians, is similar.

These are understandable motives. Still, it is oppressing when even in such a dangerous crisis situation it becomes clear how much the foreign policy of a great country can be overshadowed by domestic political debates. It remains profoundly regrettable that Europeans and Americans are obviously incapable of coming to terms on decisive issues in good time.

GENSCHER TALKS WITH KISSINGER, COMMENTS ON WESTERN SOLIDARITY

LD161206 Hamburg DPA in German 1122 GMT 16 Jun 80

[Text] Bonn--Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher today called for the "closest possible" cooperation between Bonn and Washington. During an extensive exchange of views with former Secretary of State Henry Kissinger, Genscher underlined that this would be "unrenounceable support" for European-American cooperation in the Western alliance.

According to Genscher it is important that Europeans and Americans, with common interests, jointly face major challenges. It is one of the great assets of Western politics that close cooperation with America is firmly anchored in the consciousness of the FRG population. German-American relations are based on self-reliance and mutual trust, the foreign minister said.

Further Remarks

[Text] Bonn--FDP Chairman and Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher, in a statement marking 17 June, has called Bonn's membership in the European Community and the Western defense alliance as indispensible for any realistic policy of detente and balance, as well as for the security of the Federal Republic. In a statement published in Bonn on Sunday, Genscher added that without the Western alliance and German-American friendship there would be in Europe neither political nor military equilibrium as a precondition for detente and security.

The FDP politician underlined the support given by the United States, France and Great Britain and the other Western allies concerning the German national question. The responsibilities taken on by the Allies and their solidarity with Germany and Berlin, shown and proven over decades, have disproved "irresponsible talk" of alleged contradictory interests between the German question and European unification, as well as between German interests and cooperation and friendship within the Alliance and with the United States.

In particular, during difficult times everything had to be done, Genscher went on to say, to safeguard what has been achieved so far in establishing cohesion in the West and to take steps that will lead to closer union. He demanded positive action to safeguard peace in Europe, to overcome German division, and to strengthen the ties between the Germans in West and East.

SCHMIDT INTERVIEWED ON VENICE EC SUMMIT RESULTS

DW161112 Mainz ZDF Television Network in German 1730 GMT 13 Jun 80

[Rudolf Radtke interview with Chancellor Helmut Schmidt in Venice; date not given--recorded]

[Text] [Question] Mr Chancellor, what is the message that the heads of state and government wish to convey to Europe from this monastic seclusion? Specifically, is Europe better capable of acting after this summit meeting than it seemed to be after the two preceding summit meetings?

[Answer] I believe that this question can be answered in the affirmative without any reservations. The danger to the ability of the European Community to act lies in its internal financial difficulties. These were eliminated in Brussels a month and a half ago, that is to say, with the required approval of the governments.

This approval was granted last week by our government as well. Consequently, it was no longer necessary to grapple here again with problems which had become chronic following the Dublin summit. Consequently--in keeping with the mission of the European Council--we were able to concentrate on a general exchange of views concerning economic and financial issues, on the one hand, and concerning the world political, the international situation on the other. I am extremely satisfied with these two exchanges of views because, first, I have learned some things and, second, a rather considerable degree of internal conformity of views among the nine governments has emerged.

[Question] You advocated the view here quite expressly that you will demand a restructuring of the financial mechanisms of the European Community next year. What is your aim in this regard?

[Answer] I am not the only one advocating this although I emphasized this point with particular clarity. I think all nine heads of government have come to realize that the over-proportional increase in agricultural expenditures within the Community's overall budget just cannot be allowed to continue. They also agree that, in general, it is necessary to ensure more balance in the Community budget but also a better balance with respect to the three states which make large net payments to the Community and the six states which, in sum total, receive more from the Community than they contribute. I was the one who said that quite plainly. There is also agreement with respect to the Community's intention to adhere to the ceiling, that is to say, the provision that the Community should not receive more than 1 percent of the computation basis of the value added tax in all nine states.

[Question] At this summit, too, the nine states issued a statement on the Middle East problem, a statement which must be considered particularly significant since it comes from this body. What does it mean? In this statement the right to self-determination was stressed once again.

[Answer] Correct.

[Question] What does it mean for future U.S. treatment in the United Nations?

[Answer] It is a joint description of position by nine states. It is in line with what Irish Foreign Minister O'Kennedy stated a year ago in the United Nations on behalf of the then incumbent presidency of the European Community. This joint commitment by nine states will have its effects in many spheres, surely also in the United Nations which was not specifically mentioned therein, however. An important point is that exploratory talks and the establishment of contacts are envisaged by the European Community with the eligible states, the parties, in the Middle East.

[Question] Is there any common assessment among the heads of state and government with respect to the role of the PLO?

[Answer] That is the case, yes.

[Question] The PLO is accepted as a negotiating partner?

[Answer] It will be included in necessary exploratory talks.

On PLO Role, Moscow Talks

DW161113 Cologne Westdeutscher Rundfunk Network in German 0507 GMT 14 Jun 80

[H.J. Stehle interview with Chancellor Helmut Schmidt on the EC Venice summit date, place not given--recorded]

[Excerpt] [Question] May we proceed from the assumption that the Community has thereby recognized the Palestinian Liberation Organization?

[Answer] No, you may not proceed from that premise at all. What the Community has said is that the Palestinian people and also the PLO must be included in the exploratory talks and in the establishment of contacts which we are planning.

[Question] But talking with this organization at least means de facto recognition.

[Answer] No, this is an error! You would not get confirmation of that from any diplomat.

[Question] Just like the federal foreign minister you reported here on your planned trip to Moscow. Did you meet here with the approval of your interlocutors for the plans you have for your talks in Moscow?

[Answer] We did not ask for approval, nor was this a subject to be discussed here. We discussed rather the contents of the talks, and in that respect we did find broad consensus indeed. To begin with, President Giscard d'Estaing reported on the contents of his talks with General Secretary Brezhnev. An extended discussion on this followed and it was only natural that ideas came up in this discussion which Mr Genscher and I plan to advance in Moscow in the near future. Especially with regard to Afghanistan we may, in so doing, fully follow in the footsteps which began in the exchange between President Giscard d'Estaing and the Soviet leadership.

[Question] Will you advocate in Moscow a moratorium on the stationing of medium-range missiles?

[Answer] Not at all.

[Question] You will not. May I, in conclusion, return once more to the European Community? On 1 January next year the European Community will add Greece. It is planned to admit Spain and Portugal. Do you personally stand by this enlargement?

[Answer] Not only I personally but the Federal Government supports it. But I do believe that the restructuring of the financial mechanisms within the European Community is a highly necessary prerequisite for this enlargement. And this restructuring is to be started soon--the instruction to the Commission says that proposals must be submitted by next June. There will be extended transition periods for the new members; this is already in effect for Greece, which will become a member on 1 January. The transition member for Spain and Portugal will have to comprise a greater number of years as well.

SPOKESMAN WELCOMES SPAIN'S DESIRE TO JOIN NATO

LD161412 Hamburg DPA in German 1343 GMT 16 Jun 80

[Excerpt] Bonn--The Federal Government today welcomed Spain's wish to join NATO. Juergen Sudhoff, the Foreign Ministry spokesman, said in Bonn that the government viewed Spain's wish to join the Western defense alliance as a direct continuation of Madrid's entry into the community of Western democracies.

During his last visit to Madrid Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher had already emphasized that Spain could depend on the Federal Republic's support if it decided to take such a step at its own initiative.

Willi Weiskirch, the CDU's defense expert, also welcomed Spain's wish to join the Alliance.

STRAUSS CRITICIZES EUROPEAN MIDEAST DECLARATION

LD151411 Hamburg DPA in German 1338 GMT 15 Jun 80

[Text] Bonn--Franz Josef Strauss, the CDU's candidate for chancellor, has criticized the Middle East statement by the EC. In an interview with Second German Television, Strauss said on Sunday that this represented a "desperate attempt to try with verbal tricks to appear on the one hand to meet Arab wishes and, on the other, not to cross the Americans' plans." However, the hour of truth will come when the Europeans will have to admit "that they are not in a position politically to implement in practice promises and expectations produced earlier." The Europeans would be taking on too much in the attempt to play international politics in the Middle East, Strauss thought.

PRESS DISCUSSES EC MIDDLE EAST DECLARATION

[Press review]

[Text] FRANKFURTER RUNDSCHAU states: The European Community chiefs have pulled themselves together to produce a Middle East statement which is a clear product of their halfheartedness, resulting from the lack of a common security policy foundation. For the Israelis and Jimmy Carter the statement goes too far because it not only condemns Israeli settlement policy in Arab areas, but wants to "associate" the PLO with peace negotiations. For the Arabs it does not go far enough because it avoids the full recognition of the PLO. The fact that the nine states also announce a forthcoming initiative in case the Egyptian-Israeli separate peace negotiations fail is nothing less than an attempt to save face on the part of the West Europeans after having created great hopes in the Arab world. Despite the fact that an initiative of the nine states would have offered an opportunity for the North-South dialogue to develop and for the European Community and its leading role in development policy matters to become an effective world political element between the two big powers, the European Community's government chiefs missed this chance as well in Venice.

SCHWAEBISCHE ZEITUNG of Leutkirch writes: Initial reactions demonstrate that the formulation artists in Venice did not, in issuing their paper, succeed in avoiding irritating the Americans, in satisfying the Arabs or in creating understanding on the part of Israel. Prime Minister Begin probably does not speak for all of his compatriots in terming the Venice statement as a second Munich agreement, but they will share his mocking aversion to a European guarantee. Only As-Sadat stated clear satisfaction; he needs help and he can use the pressure of the Europeans for a global solution as a means of making the Israelis show some rapprochement.

RUHR-NACHRICHTEN of Dortmund notes: Reasonable considerations seem to have no effect in a dispute dominated by fear and hatred. The extreme reaction of Israeli Prime Minister Begin to the declaration of the European Community, charging the Europeans with preparing the soil for neo-Nazism in the form of the PLO, demonstrates this as clearly as the dogged indication of PLO leader 'Arafat with regard to the power of terror gangs. In view of this situation, together with Washington's not particularly friendly reactions, the chances for the Europeans are not very good to render effective aid in the Middle East. With an extraordinarily emotional thrust Egyptian President as-Sadat once created a small breach in the hardline front, but even that road seems at present to be ending in a blind alley. The European attempt contains only an appeal to reason which those involved obviously do not want to hear.

The editorial of the Oldenburg NORDWEST-ZEITUNG, in contrast, has this to say: Especially the negative reaction from the PLO in Damascus makes it clear that the EC states have managed to make everybody unhappy by their attempts to exert a decisive influence on the turn of events in the Middle East. Israel, too, is embittered. Jerusalem even feels betrayed by the EC even though the Middle East statement expressly demands the PLO's recognition of Israel's right to exist. Thus it turns out that, through its fundamentally well-meant Middle East statement, the EC has only caused more confusion instead of peace in a highly explosive region. By its rash demand for PLO participation it has also aggravated for the time being the efforts of Jimmy Carter toward gradually including Jordan's King Husayn in the peace process and thus simultaneously forcing Israeli concessions on the Palestinian issue.

BERLINER MORGENPOST stresses this point: Nevertheless, we may proceed from the assumption that the Venetian Middle East maneuver by the EC did not constitute a contribution toward American comfort. Naturally President Carter at the moment is not interested in looking for additional disharmony in the Euro-American sphere. He probably has had plenty of that. U.S. Secretary of State Muskie has noted that, for him, the effectiveness of the PLO for peace negotiations is unclear as long as it denies Israel's right to exist. Hence, we must term it careless for the Europe of the Nine to advocate a hurried general solution of the Israeli-Arab conflict. Have the gentlemen really comprehended that thereby they not only become carelessly involved in the conflict region which is excessively burdened anyway, but even provide access for the Soviet Union?

VAN WELL'S MOSCOW TRIP SHOWS CHANCES FOR MISSILE TALKS

DW161355 Hamburg DER SPIEGEL in German 16 Jun 80 p 14

[Unattributed article: "A Hint From Wehner"]

[Text] Nervousness is increasing in Bonn just prior to the Moscow visit by Chancellor Helmut Schmidt and Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher. Last week the chancellor's office and the Foreign Ministry endeavored to tone down expectations for the visit. Foreign Ministry State Secretary Guenther van Well said upon his return from his assessment mission to Moscow: "Some more talks are necessary."

SPD Bundestag floorleader Herbert Wehner, in contrast, disseminates cautious optimism. Wehner said he sees "a slight change" in the "most recent past." The Soviet Union, he said, "under certain condition" is now prepared after all to negotiate with the West on a limitation of nuclear medium-range missiles.

Wehner interprets the dual NATO decision of last December--the stationing of new missiles and cruise missiles with U.S. troops in Western Europe was linked with an offer of negotiations to Moscow--thusly: "It also includes the option that a moratorium will be achieved."

Wehner's reference to a moratorium, a limited suspension of the stationing of new medium-range weapons in East and West, is obviously intended as a signal to the Soviets who had demanded that the NATO decision be suspended prior to the opening of negotiations.

It was rather displeasure which Wehner's initiative elicited from Schmidt and Genscher. An aide to the chancellor said "this was not good." Washington and Moscow might now feel supported in their impression that Bonn gradually wants to soften up the NATO decision. [paragraph continues]

A Genscher confidant endorsed this by saying that such words are dangerous. The Soviet Union will be prepared to negotiate on medium-range weapons only when it realizes that the West is serious about its intention to arm.

The internal report by Moscow traveler Van Well shows that the chances for negotiations are not bad. High-ranking officials unofficially hinted to the diplomat that Moscow is interested in negotiating on medium-range weapons. In this connection it is necessary, however, to take into consideration all nuclear weapons regardless of range, as well as the potentials of China, France and Great Britain.

Van Well's most important interlocutors, Soviet Foreign Minister Andrey Gromyko and his deputy, Viktor Maltsev, refused to be committed. But they did declare their unrestricted agreement with the list of topics presented by Bonn for the Schmidt visit.

Besides, Gromyko promised that in phrasing the communique the Soviet side will be flexible and take Bonn's wishes into account as much as possible, said Gromyko to Van Well: Moscow, too, is interested in a "positive result" from the visit.

BUNDESTAG UNION OFFICIAL CRITICIZES 'YARDSTICK' FOR MOSCOW TALKS

LD161152 Hamburg DPA in German 1016 GMT 16 Jun 80

[Excerpts] Bonn--Government Spokesman Klaus Boelling today again denied any difference of opinion between the governments of Washington and Bonn with regard to Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt's visit to Moscow.

In radio interviews (WDR and Deutschlandfunk) Boelling said that in his letter, which was made public on Sunday, American President Jimmy Carter had come to the conclusion that both governments' positions on the implementation of the NATO decision to station new nuclear medium-range missiles in Europe were identical. There could be no question of differences of opinion or tensions.

Philipp Jenninger, parliamentary manager in the Bundestag, called on the chancellor today, on behalf of the CDU-CSU, to make public the contents of Carter's letter. Writing in the CDU's press service, Jenninger contended that Schmidt should not represent the interests of only the SPD during his Moscow visit but should make the FRG's interests as partner of the Western alliance the yardstick for his negotiations.

The Union politician added that only a few months ago the Federal Government had said the chancellor's Moscow trip would only come about under certain conditions and if specific results were assured. Now the trip was being viewed as being "of value for its own sake." The U.S. Government quite clearly shared CDU/CSU fears that the "yardstick" for the Moscow trip was continuously being adjusted downward. Should this be the case it would mark the beginning of the end of the NATO Decision, Jenninger claimed.

SAUDI KING KHALID ARRIVES FOR OFFICIAL 4-DAY VISIT

Exchange With Carstens

LD160002 Hamburg DPA in German 0943 GMT 16 Jun 80

[Text] Bonn--King Khalid ibn 'Abd al-'Aziz of Saudi Arabia arrived in the Federal Republic on Monday for a 4-day state visit. He was welcomed at Cologne-Bonn Airport by Federal President Karl Carstens. A guard of honor fired a 21-gun salute.

Carstens and the Arab monarch drove to the official Bonn residence of the president, Villa Hammerschmidt, where the official welcoming ceremony with military honors and the playing of the national anthems took place. Next on the agenda is a first exchange of views between Carstens and the 67-year-old king.

TECHNOLOGICAL 'LEAP' IN NEUTRON BOMB REPORTED

WA161300 Paris LE QUOTIDIEN DE PARIS in French 7/8 Jun 80 p 9

[Jean-Francois Mangibeaux report: "Neutron Superbomb Will Have a Range of 30 km"]

[Text] France is at the point of mastering the technology necessary for the manufacture of a very high yield neutron bomb, that is, of strategic capacity. These disclosures that come to us from an authorized source are occurring at a time when experimentation on the tactical neutron bomb has practically reached its end. In the course of these tests, carried out in the Pacific, French research scientists have concluded that the era of the third nuclear generation is well on its way. What it means is that France will be in a position, in the relatively near future, to exploit, militarily or non-militarily, one or the other effects of a nuclear explosion of the hydrogen bomb: the heat, the blast, or the radiation.

It is estimated that at an early date, when there is radiation control, it will be possible to produce a new weapon capable of scattering neutrons over an area of some 30 km in diameter, which means a weapon of strategic orientation and no longer just tactical. It also means a technological "leap" capable of upsetting the modernization choices for our nuclear arsenal.

The defense debate going on for several weeks in France revolves around two or three central themes. Among these, the neutron bomb occupies a privileged position. Should this weapon be produced or not, this weapon that the experts prefer to call an intensified radiation bomb? This question is constantly open to discussion in the highest political and military realms. Now according to the information that has been confirmed for us by specialist circles close to the research programs, the experimenting carried out in the Pacific opens new perspectives today that can be described as revolutionary. In fact, while the tests relative to the bomb are practically finished, permitting the mass production of this device, the research scientists have come to conclusions that allow them to affirm: "France will soon be able to pass into the third nuclear generation." This does not exclude the possibility of manufacturing a neutron device with a yield bearing no possible comparison with that which is already known.

From the A-Bomb to the H-Bomb

To get a good measure of the importance of this disclosure which has obvious political and military implications, it is necessary to place it in its scientific context.

France is currently in the second nuclear generation. The first generation corresponded to what is known as the atomic bomb. At this initial stage energy is released by atomic fission. It should be noted that present-day nuclear power plants always operate by the fission of an atomic core. Now some 10 years ago, practically at the same time as the United States, France passed into the second generation, namely, that of fusion. The H or thermonuclear bomb was born. Of what does it consist? Very simply, of an A-bomb surrounded by a bubble--liquid or gaseous--of lithium and deuterium. The explosion of the central atomic bomb causes the fusion of the atoms of deuterium and lithium. Result: the releasing of energy under the form of heat, blast, or radiation. These automatic diffusions cannot be controlled with the present level of knowledge. Under these conditions, one can count on an average of only 10 or 15 percent of the emission of various particles conveyed by the neutrons and composed in part of gamma rays.

The "Fratricide" Effect

At that time, Western scientists were of the opinion that they had reached the ne plus ultra of the utilization of the atom, particularly for its military purposes. The era of the H-bomb--that effectively equips the components of the nuclear deterrent forces--should be, save for unforeseen circumstances, a definitive era. It remains to perfect, to fine-tune, the charges.

That was to be done in three directions: their miniaturization, their hardening, and their precisioning. It is in these three areas that essential research has been carried out in the past few years. Without emphasizing the miniaturization and precisioning of thermonuclear devices, points on which French research scientists have attained considerable results, the research on the matter of hardening has culminated, surprisingly, in original discoveries. We return there to a subject that concerns us. The hardening of a nuclear device involves its resistance to hostile countermeasures. In fact, to simplify a highly technical subject to the extreme: The country against which a thermonuclear bomb is launched has the capability of defusing it in flight--what the experts call the "fratricide effect"--particularly by means of a cloud of neutrons that will neutralize the device. A parry: the preliminary emission of neutrons by the device itself that literally drowns the enemy neutrons! It was then necessary to work on the capability of releasing "on command" a certain quantity of neutrons. Clearly it was necessary to control the process of nuclear fusion scientifically in order to obtain at will a neutron flux as well, even before the emissions of heat and the blast. It is while working on this program that the concept of the intensified radiation bomb, better known as the neutron bomb, was born.

But at this stage, for unknown reasons, the scientists, for whom advancing remained empirical, it is true, "stumbled" upon an obstacle: the impossibility of controlling the fusion process beyond a charge of around 1 kiloton. Thus, research proceeded on relatively weak charges (the Hiroshima bomb amounted to about 20 kilotons), and ended recently, making France, with the United States and undoubtedly the Soviet Union, a power capable of producing the famous neutron bomb.

Death for 30 km

Matters officially stood there, feeding, as is known, the "platonic" debate over the adoption--or not--of this new weapon. The disclosures that we are in a position to make today fundamentally alter this debate. A fantastic technological "leap," with the prospect of rounding the famous cape of 1 kiloton, opens up the possibility of entering a third nuclear era: that of the megaton neutron bomb, or M-bomb. This bomb would have a considerable range--up to 30 km of territory affected by the radiation flux--but also an enormous yield, being capable of releasing tens of millions of neutrons. To get an idea of these achievements, we emphasize that the maximum tactical neutron bomb of the future that can be manufactured today has a range of only 600 meters and, according to the latest secret estimates, would release some 25 million neutrons. Improved further, the M bomb could be brought to a yield of 75, 150, even 200 kilotons, which means a strategic charge that enters straight into the deterrent realm.

Finally, according to the exclusive information at our disposal, this weapon would be exceptionally economical, 150 kilotons being capable of corresponding to the yield of 1 megaton released by an H-bomb.

These new capabilities, it must be made clear, open up an infinite field for utilization of nuclear fusion because they are only the premises for control of the heat and blast effects of a classic H-bomb. Hence the affirmation that we can soon--a matter of several years--have the third nuclear generation at our disposal.

Obviously, in order to do this research must continue at Mumuroa and in the Atomic Energy Commission. It can even be expanded if the political decisions are made to do so.

The experts whom we have consulted are of the opinion that this is a gateway to the future, as much strategic as energy related, and that, at this stage, it would be criminal to close this gateway that could assure us, on the horizon of the year 2000, of a deterrent force many times multiplied, as well as energy potentialities at a lower cost and with complete security.

'Political Debate' on Defense Affected

[Philippe Marcovici commentary]

[Text] The disclosures that we are in a position to make today regarding France's capacity to equip itself with a neutron superbomb of strategic range entirely upset the facts in the political debate opened up on the defense of France.

This debate was natural and necessary because on the question of armaments, which can amount to the question of the survival of the nation, the decision is political or it is not. This is why, in short, it is the chief of state and he alone who will settle it once and for all.

What can be said, however, from today on is that the controversy over the necessity of equipping France with the neutron "bomb" began on erroneous grounds because those who led it did not practice the virtue of patience which would bring them to settle it once and for all in full knowledge of the case, that is to say, in possession of all the information indispensable to the choice. Once again, and as is very often the case in anything that closely or distantly concerns defense, polemics triumphed over cold reason.

The essential element that we bring to bear today on the record of the neutron "bomb" is that it was only tactical because human science did not know how to make it strategic. Those days are now over. The neutron weapon is revealed to be a weapon that is anti-cities, and anti-concentrations on earth and sea. Thus, it joins the panoply of our deterrent force, rendering fruitless the whole debate on the "forward line battle," or rather bringing it back to its true extent, which is that of political choice.

Yesterday, there were "Plutons," that is, the possibility of a flexible response, in proportion to the threat or aggression sustained; there were strategic missiles, that is, a deterrent by terror, implying that the price to be paid would be, for any aggressor, disproportionate with respect to the gains from his aggression.

Nothing has changed today, at least fundamentally, and the possession of the neutron bomb would leave all possibilities of choice open: "forward line battle" as well as the lightning flash of final destruction.

Reasoning in a cynical fashion, one could say that the neutron "bomb" preserves intact the virtues of France's shield forces, but that it preserves them at a lesser price because it is that of weapons less expensive than others. Why not say it?

L'HUMANITE Reaction

LD161327 Paris L'HUMANITE in French 11 Jun 80 pp 1, 3

[Louis Baillot article: "Acceptable War?"]

[Text] As I am writing Giscard d'Estaing has just presided over a Defense Council meeting at the Elysee Palace devoted to, among other things, adopting new kinds of nuclear weapons.

It is within this context that a formidable campaign of misinformation has been orchestrated with the aid of all the mass media to secure public acceptance of the neutron bomb, which it would be more correct to call the neutron weapon or missile.

All arguments are being used, particularly the ones about the "clean bomb" or the "Christian bomb," according to one of its American inventors Samuel Cohen, on the pretext that the damage that it would cause would be allegedly restricted to human lives.

The latest of these arguments stems from a report published Saturday by LE QUOTIDIEN DE PARIS, according to which a strategic "neutron superbomb" has been tested at Mururoa. This new missile would be added to the range of deterrent weapons on the pretext of the "uncertainty" that its use would cause.

Hitherto the neutron missile has been presented, primarily by the people who created it, as an essentially tactical weapon. This is why the partisans of strategic deterrence oppose its deployment and manufacture.

By presenting the neutron missile as a "neutron superbomb," its partisans hope to remove the major obstacle to its manufacture.

How indeed could the partisans of deterrence still oppose a weapon both strategic and tactical?

But it is a clumsy maneuver.

Indeed, what would be the purpose of having a "strategic neutron superbomb"? Nuclear and thermonuclear devices already have considerable destructive power and the manufacture of a "neutron superbomb" would contribute nothing more except--and this is the essential point--to facilitate the arms race.

On the other hand, its strategic deployment is another matter entirely.

The document prepared by the French Democratic Union, the party of the president of the republic, which speaks out definitely for deploying the neutron missile, explains as follows:

"The choice is therefore clear: The organization of European defense must be conceived with a view to engaging battle with the support of numerous tactical nuclear weapons."

And within the framework of "forward battle" as defined in 1976 by the president of the republic and General Mery, the neutron missile gains its full significance. It implies abandoning the strategy of deterrence, that is, rejecting war for the sake of a conflict which the public must be made to accept at all costs.

The Communists, who reassert their desire to equip France with a real national defense, refuse to allow their country to be dragged along the path of the arms race behind Carter and NATO on the pretext of modernizing nuclear weaponry. They also reject the U.S. strategy which, with "neutron bombs," Pershing missiles and medium-range cruise missiles, aims to make Western Europe the future battlefield, thus once again excluding U.S. territory from the destruction.

To struggle for peace and disarmament and to work for real national defense are not conflicting tasks. They are the Communists' objectives.

LIBERIAN REQUEST TO RECALL ENVOY STILL NOT RECEIVED

AB161325 Paris AFP in French 1252 GMT 16 Jun 80

[Text] Paris, 16 Jun (AFP)--So far, the Liberian authorities have not officially notified France to recall its ambassador to Monrovia, Mr Louis Dollot, authorized sources announced on Monday in Paris. The request to recall the French ambassador was announced during a television address made by the Liberian foreign minister, Mr Gabriel Bacchus Matthews, on Sunday night. The move was a consequence of the intrusion of the Liberian Army into the French Embassy, on Saturday, to arrest the son of the late President Tolbert.

IRAQ'S HAMMADI ON EUROPEAN MIDEAST INITIATIVE

[Unattributed report: "Iraqi Foreign Minister Hammadi Believes That The Development of European Policy in the Near East Is 'Encouraging'"]

[Excerpt] On leaving the Elysee on 11 June, Iraqi Foreign Minister Sa'dun Hammadi confirmed that Mr Giscard d'Estaing will visit Iraq "next fall."

Following a talk with Mr Giscard d'Estaing, the minister further stated that they discussed "the situation in the Arab region, Iran and North Africa, the Afghan problem and bilateral relations."

He explained that he had asked the French president for additional information on the statement which the Nine intend to adopt in Venice. "We discussed this subject at great length," he said.

During a press conference held before his visit to the Elysee, the Iraqi foreign minister described the development of European policy with respect to the Near East as "encouraging" and paid special tribute to France, which " has made this development possible." Referring to bilateral Baghdad-Paris relations, he stated that his country is prepared to proceed further in this sphere with France, "especially as far as energy and oil are concerned." "There is no fundamental obstacle on the path of cooperation between our two countries," he stated. Mr Hammadi expressed his satisfaction with the fact that the "French Government has agreed that any European-Arab dialogue should henceforth deal with political problems as well."

Furthermore, the Iraqi foreign minister criticized Prince Fahd's recent statements which suggested that under certain conditions Saudi Arabia could participate in the Camp David process. "Such statements," he said, "are untimely and unwise." As for Iraq, it strictly abides by the resolutions adopted at the Baghdad summit which, he added, "made a big contribution to the failure of the Camp David accords." In conclusion, Mr Hammadi entirely blamed the Tehran regime's "expansionist policy" for the deterioration in his country's relations with Iran. He added, however, that Baghdad will not let any members of the Iranian opposition use "Iraqi national territory" as a springboard for any possible military intervention in Iran.

PSI OFFICIAL URGES U.S.-EUROPEAN COOPERATION ON MIDEAST

LD161257 Rome AVANTI in Italian 5 Jun 80 p 16

[Article by Italian Socialist Party Foreign Section Deputy Chief Giuseppe Scanni: "Serious Coordination Between Carter and Europeans for Mideast Peace"]

[Excerpts] The United States has, through President Carter, determinedly rejected the hypothesis of a European intervention in the Mideast crisis. This assumes a twofold significance in view of the imminence of the Venice summit: defense of the Camp David agreements and a renewed thrust--in the present crisis of relations within NATO--to a very active role for the United States which is, at the same time, confirming its desire not to "punish" the Allies by reducing its military contingent in continental Europe.

It would now seem opportune to analyze in greater detail the former point, namely the problem connected with the developments of the so-called Camp David agreement between Egypt and Israel.

European states as a whole have always been doubtful about the results of the spectacular agreement and they are convinced of the international range of the conflict--with some justification, in view of the fact that the State of Israel was created on the basis of a UN decision on Arab territory, but under the British protectorate. Frustrated by the (diplomatic) error of the U.S. failure to back Britain and France during the 1956 Suez crisis, which, by offending their prestige, forced those two powers to adopt a subordinate role in the area while the suspension of financing to Egypt for construction of the Aswan Dam drove An-Nasir to accentuate his pro-Soviet policy, the Europeans have always regarded U.S. policy in the region with suspicion.

Until 1973 the guarantee of oil supplies given by the major U.S. companies nevertheless permitted a lull in Western diplomatic activity, despite France's 1969 proposal.

Following the Yom Kippur War, rocketing oil prices, the growing balance of payments gap and the need for the Western states to recycle petrodollars with massive investments in the area, not to mention the need to continue enjoying oil supplies--still under consideration, thanks to a patient policy on the Arabs' part--made it necessary for the European states to become direct interlocutors in the conflict, being encouraged in this by the Arab states themselves.

Palestinian Issue the Focal Point

Furthermore, the forces of the European left have always regarded the Palestinian issue as the focal point for a solution to the conflict.

On the one hand invoking the "locality" of the conflict and on the other pointing out--fairly effectively--that the United States has shown itself to be the only credible mediator, since it is recognized as such by both Israel and Egypt, the Americans are continuing with their small-steps policy and reply that although Camp David has led to a separate peace, it does not however rule out an extension of the peace process, and they are the only power that has managed to make Israel return occupied territories.

If in fact the United States did accept a European mediation it would also be forced to accept an extension of the negotiations to the Soviet Union, which is something that it cannot do because of As-Sadat--who has proved to be a very subtle politician and a skillful diplomat--and because of the fears of Israel, which borders pro-Soviet Syria and the Palestinian "refugee camps" and which wants, by means of Begin's extremist policy, to maintain the peace which has been secured as a separate peace between Israel and Egypt, thus avoiding--for the sake of a broader peace--having to yield further territories to Jordan and Syria since, furthermore, it does not want a Palestinian state to be formed on its borders.

If under these conditions an extension of the mediation created a crisis in the agreement reached at Camp David, the United States would have to acknowledge the impossibility of achieving the U.S. political "primacy" which is often confirmed in intentions and proposals and which within the (Kissinger) concept of nuclear and strategic arms parity is considered to be the basis for the bipolar detente process.

The Europeans, on the other hand, stress that without Soviet involvement the USSR would intensify relations with certain Arab states,to regain the parity in the region which it has lost since 1973 by opposing the opening of naval bases, especially in Algeria and Libya, thus rendering the military situation even more precarious in the Mediterranean, which is being progressively transformed into a vast powder keg.

The Americans reproach the Europeans for refusing to commit themselves fully to their policy of a global "confrontation" with the USSR and of helping the latter power by presenting it with the spectacle of a lack of coordination in connection with the Western initiatives proposed by the Americans (the deployment of medium-range missiles in Europe, the Olympic boycott and economic sanctions on Iran). The Europeans retort to the Americans by pointing out the Alliance's regional commitments; the preeminent interests on the strategic and economic plane of East-West accords, especially with the Soviet Union; and the need to intervene in the Middle East in order to defend the energy requirements of the individual economies. A balance of interests must therefore be reestablished by means of new coordination between the European and American allies.

EEC and Unitary Foreign Policy

As for Europe, it would be opportune to define a unitary foreign policy and not to delegate responsibility for shared interests to a presumed French-German leadership--primarily because in the delicate time in which we are living, of transition from economic to greater political unity, the interests of individual states must not be sacrificed to the national policies of certain partners; second, because no individual European state has a credible mediation capacity in the eyes of both superpowers; and third, because the Arabs themselves would play on the diversity of European interests (as shown by Giscard's recent visit to the Arab world). Furthermore, Europe should guarantee to the State of Israel its unflinching determination to defend its existence and security and it should guarantee to the United States its equally unflinching determination not to involve the Soviet Union in the international mediation.

The United States should understand the pressure under which the Europeans are acting. A further absence from Mideast initiative could damage their international prestige even more, thus negatively modifying what they have gained in economic terms over the past 7 years and threatening to extend still further the area of strategic-military "insecurity" with a possible greater Soviet involvement in the Mediterranean, thus--in the final analysis--restricting their autonomy and increasing their dependence on the United States.

The United States should use its own diplomatic resources to secure recognition of the Palestinians' right to their own sovereign state and the Europeans should press for the PLO's recognition of Israel's right to existence and security.

The European left--not all of it though, and despite many differences in the socialist camp--tends to favor a theory of "fluctuation" in U.S. foreign policy, which is, however, sufficiently consistent in its underlying aims despite the succession of differing administrations, and the left is tempted to ideologize the Mideast conflict, confusing the interests of the individual working classes--energy, industry, employment--with the Palestinians' irredentist struggle and forgetting Israel's equally legitimate interests.

Consequences of Afghan Invasion

This means deliberately forgetting the significance of the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan and Islamic fundamentalism--the basis of the Iran Revolution--in its collateral effects on the world balance and on the policy of the other Arab countries. Furthermore, it implies forgetting the past and present importance of some Arab countries, starting with South Yemen, in arming and training European terrorists, in collaboration with the extremist Palestinian fringes.

One's own interests are not always immediately apparent and in foreign policy mirages often assume momentary form and substance, and while Europe legitimately aspires to a leading role this role should be coordinated honestly and steadfastly with the United States. If the European left rightly wants to insure that its peace struggle is not merely diplomatic but that it observes the peoples' human destinies, it must tackle the problem of not uncritically espousing theses; of transcending the old (Leninist) concept of imperialism as the final phase of capitalism and therefore--since the United States is the world's greatest capitalist power--of making the United States the only subject of the anti-imperialist struggle; and of transcending the traditional concept of Zionism and facilitating the work of Israel's labor and socialist forces (the Israeli Workers Party and the United Workers Party.)

To this end the initiatives of the individual parties or representatives of the European and Italian left are not only lacking in humility, but also threaten to do damage to their generic improvisation.

So much for the trial of the United States: The danger is that the left will be put on trial. So let the government undertake--especially with a view to the bilateral meetings with Carter and the Venice summit--to open the way to serious coordination among the Allies and the forces wanting peace in the Middle East.

VENEZUELAN ENERGY MINISTER MEETS WITH SUAREZ

The Venezuelan minister met with Spanish Prime Minister Adolfo Suarez at Moncloa Palace. Calderon Berti reiterated Venezuela's willingness to maintain good relations as well as to provide energy assistance to Spain. He said that solid and traditional ties of friendship unite Spain and Venezuela.

PRC FOREIGN MINISTER RAPS USSR IN TALKS WITH OLESEN

OW170548 Hong Kong AFP in English 0538 GMT 17 Jun 80

[Text] Copenhagen, June 16 (AFP)--Chinese Foreign Minister Huang Hua today fiercely attacked Soviet policies towards Afghanistan and Cambodia during a four-hour-long meeting here with Danish Foreign Minister Kjeld Olesen, sources said. They added that the two ministers also discussed Sino-Soviet relations, North-South dialogue and relations between China and the nine-national European Community.

Mr.Huang warned that nations opposing Soviet policies toward Cambodia and Afghanistan must be more resolute, the sources said, adding that the minister warned that if the Soviet Union was given a little finger, it would grab the whole hand. Meanwhile, Mr. Olesen told Mr. Huang that the only acceptable means of resolving the crises was through a political solution, adding that it was possible to work for detente without showing signs of weakness, the sources said.

Mr. Huang, the first Chinese minister to visit Denmark, also said that industrialized countries must do more to aid developing nations. But Mr. Olesen said that the issue was complicated by the politics of oil-producing nations and indicated that the Soviet Union was making only a small contribution to developing countries.

The talks came on the first day of Mr. Huang's three-day official visit to Denmark and follows his stops in Norway and Sweden. His spokesman has said he will go to West Germany Thursday for a visit of two or three days and talks with German Chancellor Helmut Schmidt.

UAE MINISTER CRITICIZES OPEC PRICING IN OIL TALKS

LD161015 Copenhagen AKTUELT in Danish 12 Jun 80 p 4

[Unattributed report: "Nielson Discusses New Oil Deal"]

[Text] United Arab Emirates Oil Minister Dr Mani' ibn Sa'id al-'Utaybah arrived in Copenhagen Wednesday afternoon for meetings with Energy Minister Poul Nielson for discussions of a possible interstate oil deal between the Emirates and Denmark.

The visit will last 3 days and is a response to Poul Nielson's visit to the United Arab Emirates during his tour of the Middle East some 6 weeks ago.

Dr al-'Utaybah came directly from Algeria, where the OPEC nations' meeting ended on Wednesday morning. The oil minister is dissatisfied with the new joint oil prices, which allow the possibility of prices rising to $32-$37 a barrel of crude.

"We still want to keep the price at $28 a barrel. We are not interested in increasing prices which create greater tension on the market. We would rather see the gap between supply and demand narrowed somewhat," the oil minister said at a meeting with the press at Copenhagen Airport.

Dr al-'Utaybah expressed his interest in interstate oil trade with Denmark and other peaceable European countries. He believes that the international oil companies are a link in the chain of supply that forces up oil prices and that in the longer term they can be eliminated.

Dr al-'Utaybah did not want to say anything at present about the size of possible state oil supplies to Denmark. It is one of the "details" that he and Poul Nielson will discuss now and at future meetings. He did, however, state that if a direct state deal did come about, it would be under the terms of standard contracts which do not contain special political clauses.

In 1980 Denmark will consume 16 million tons of crude oil, and only a fraction of this comes from the United Arab Emirates.

VIGDIS FINNBOGADOTTIR CONTINUES TO LEAD IN PRESIDENTIAL RACE

WA171945 Helsinki HELSINGIN SANOMAT in Finnish 1 Jun 80 p 32

[Jorma Korhonen report: "Will Iceland Have A Woman President?"]

[Excerpts] Regarded by conservative voters as a completely impossible candidate, a divorced, self-supporting woman leads in the race for the June presidential election. And Vigdis Finnbogadottir continues to win favor.

Kristjan Eldjarn, who has piloted the country for 12 years, is leaving office for retirement and his former activities as a scholar. Alongside three men running for president is a tenacious woman, Vigdis Finnbogadottir. She is leading in the most recent poll, and it is estimated that her favor with the voters will continue to grow.

The Icelanders will elect a new president by direct vote on 29 June. The president's 4-year term begins on 1 August.

The new president will be the fourth since the birth of the republic in 1944.

The President Must Understand the People and Culture

The June presidential race will be carried on among four candidates. Many believe the most competent is Iceland's ambassador to the PRC, Japan and other countries in the Far East, Petur Thorsteinsson. Previously he has been ambassador to Moscow and Washington.

But although Thorsteinsson's performance as a diplomat indicates that he would be a competent president, his chances of becoming president are considered small. "He understands ethics, but not sufficiently Icelandic people and culture," said a Reykjavik observer.

Nor are the chances of Albert Gudmundsson considered good for moving from the Althing to the presidency, although he also has had many careers and has support from many areas. Aside from being an experienced politician and the twenty-first honorary mayor of Nice, Gudmundsson is Iceland's first professional soccer player. The London Arsenals plan to come this summer to his village to play a match against the Iceland national team in his honour.

Gudlaugur Thorvaldsson, national labor mediator, enjoys favor in wide circles, but the youth are not his unreserved supporters. According to them Thorvadlsson already has a high post--he is quite simply the highest ranking civil servant: "What would we do with a man of the system as president?"

Thorvaldsson and Gudmundsson are conducting their election campaigns openly and, in the American style, with their spouses along. For some reason many Icelanders want their president to again be a cultural personality, as well as someone politically deserving.

The director of the Reykjavik Municipal Theatre, Vigdis Finnbogadottir, is the youngest of the candidates, just 50. In the opinion of conservatives, Vigdis Finnbogadottir is completely impossible for the office of president: She is a woman, even divorced and self-supporting. She lacks the necessary support of a husband.

Someone once tested her by asking who would sit at the other head of the banquet table at Bessastadir (the presidential residence). Without blinking an eyelash, Vigdis Finnbogadottir answered:" I'll have a round table there."

Eldjarn, Vigdis Finnbogadottir has never belonged to any political party. Both of their world views are liberal, somewhat a little to the left of center.

The nonpolitical nature of Icelandic presidential races means that support for candidates dissolves all party boundaries.

Backing labor mediator Thorvaldsson are the chairman of the conservative Independence Party, the chairman of the communist People's Alliance, a former Progressive Party minister, etc.

Member of Althing Gudmundsson's supporters are traditional business circles and the national labor union's communist chairman.

Writer Halldor Laxness supports Ambassador Thorsteinsson. Additionally among his supporters are the chairman of the chamber of commerce and the vice chairman of the communists [People Alliance].

Among the supporters of Vigdis Finnbogadottir are many womens' organization leaders, wives of rural clergy, farmers and teachers. She is supported by the young voters and the preponderant element of the intellectuals. In this situation Iceland's largest newspaper, the conservative MORGUNBLADID has not come out decisively for any candidate. However, the Icelanders are enthusiastic about the presidential election. Judging from experience of earlier elections the younger voters will have a decisive role in the election. At the same time it is recognized that Reykjavik can not alone elect a president, although 84,000 of Iceland's 220,000 inhabitants live in the capital. The provinces are an open question as to the vote. The most recent opinion polls show that 30 percent of the voters have not yet decided whom to support in the presidential race. In this poll Vigdis Finnbogadottir received the largest support, with labor mediator Thorvaldsson second.

Bitter Criticism Over Finnbogadottir

Vigdis Finnbogadottir is astonished at how in the course of the campaign her person has given rise to such bitter criticism. "My rival candidates are not at all subjected to the kinds of questions in public I am subjected to."

Naturally Vigdis Finnbogadottir also speaks on the position of women and deplores the fact that in the country's parliament women are represented very poorly.

Vigdis Finnbogadottir's opponents have tried to brand her as a communist at every opportunity. She rejects the charge by asserting that the Icelanders generally call anyone who behaves differently than others and regards matters in a way which is deviating by that name.

If Vigdis Finnbogadottir does not become president of Iceland, she will become unemployed in the fall. Her term as director of the Reykjavik Municipal Theatre is ending. Regulations specify that the theatre director be elected for 4 years and the contract can be renewed only once. Finnbogadottir has now completed 8 years.

AFGHANISTAN 'PROBABLY' DISCUSSED BY QOTBZADEH, HUANG HUA

[Morten Fyhn report: "Hostage Crisis Still Unresolved"]

[Excerpt] The hostage crisis in Tehran is still no nearer a solution after Iranian Foreign Minister Sadeq Qotbzadeh's visit to Oslo. There is no question of release before the United States shows willingness to understand Iran and examines its actions in the country under the shah. He had also an unexpected secret meeting with Chinese Foreign Minister Huang Hua at which the invasion of Afghanistan was probably the main topic for discussion.

Earlier in the day in coarse words Qotbzadeh expressed strong criticism of the Soviet Union because of the invasion of Afghanistan. The Iranian foreign minister urged the West to aid the Afghan guerrilla forces, or "freedom fighters" as he called them. He stated that the Iranian Government is actively considering giving direct military help to the guerrilla forces. Qotbzadeh compared the Soviet Union's position in Afghanistan with that of the United States in Vietnam and said that the behavior of both the superpowers was equally reprehensible. "We cannot tolerate the domination of one country by another," declared Qotbzadeh, who also drew a parallel with U.S. activities in Iran under the shah.

After the meeting at Parkveien 45, the government hospitality apartment, the Chinese foreign minister was only prepared to tell AFTENPOSTEN that the two foreign ministers had talked about the international situation. In light of the hardline Chinese attitude toward the Soviet Union there is every reason to suppose that they devoted their attention to Afghanistan. It is probable that the meeting was mediated by Foreign Minister Knut Frydenlund who earlier in the day welcomed both his Chinese guests at Fornebu [Oslo airport] and had a further meeting with Qotbzadeh at the Scandinavia Hotel.

NORDLI TALKS WITH PRC'S HUANG HUA CENTER ON AFGHANISTAN

[Unattributed report: "Huang Hua Warns Norway of Soviet Union and Vietnam"]

[Text] Chinese Foreign Minister Huang Hua put foward Beijing's views on a number of foreign policy problems in talks with his Norwegian counterpart Knut Frydenlund that lasted 2 hours and 10 minutes. The topics which dominated the discussions were Afghanistan, Korea and Vietnam--plus the Soviet Union's role in these areas of conflict.

In agreement with international etiquette it was principally the guest who spoke at this the first round of talks. Frydenlund's turn will come Saturday morning when the talks will continue at the Hefye Villa at Frognersetaren. There is reason to believe that the talks will not be completed before lunch, for which Oslo City Chairman Albert Nordengen is host, so that some hours in the afternoon will also be necessary.

It is expected that the situations in Europe and the Middle East will be discussed during tomorrow's conversations.

Because Vice Premier Kang Shien was in Norway last week and discussed a large number of joint projects between China and Norway the two foreign ministers will concentrate on the international situation. Huang warned Norway of the Soviet Union even before he left Beijing, and there can be no doubt that he is taking the opportunity to repeat his warnings. In China's estimation the Soviet Union wants to use Afghanistan and Vietnam as springboards for new military actions.

After a morning audience at the Royal Palace earlier in the day Foreign Minister Huang had a half-hour meeting with Prime Minister Odvar Nordli, who is to visit China in the fall, at the prime minister's office in the government quarter.

Time was so short that the traditional visit to the government building's roof to look at the view and for photographs was dispensed with and the two leaders sat down to talks immediately.

The talks chiefly concerned the situation in Afghanistan. Huang gave a briefing on Beijing's view on the motives behind and the objectives of the Soviet Afghanistan invasion, which he linked to the Soviet presence in Vietnam and the Vietnamese expansion in Southeast Asia.

China's leaders hold the view that while the Soviet intervention in Afghanistan represents a push towards the strategically extremely important Strait of Hormuz at the mouth of the Persian Gulf. Vietnamese power politics in Southeast Asia amount to a comparable threat to the Straits of Malacca. Thus, in the Chinese view, two transport routes of the greatest importance for the world economy are endangered.

Norway is possibly more cautious in drawing conclusions from its analyses of events in Afghanistan. But Prime Minister Nordli told his guest that Norway finds the Soviet armed intervention in Afghanistan completely unacceptable and that Norway does not want to take any steps that--directly or indirectly--could contribute to the legalization of the Soviet action.

PRIME MINISTER TO VISIT PRC 'THIS WINTER'

LD161003 Stockholm DAGENS NYHETER in Swedish 11 Jun 80 p 8

[Kaa Eneberg report: "Falldin for China This Winter"]

[Excerpt] Prime Minister Thorbjorn Falldin (Center Party) will visit China this winter, according to information received by DAGENS NYHETER. Falldin has already received an invitation from Beijing. It was renewed on Tuesday by visiting Chinese Foreign Minister Huang Hua and has been described by Swedish sources as timely.

This means that Falldin's advisors will now set to work to try to fit plans for a visit to China into his bulging timetable. Falldin's party colleagues, Karin Soder, the then foreign minister, and industry minister Nils Asling have paid earlier visits to China.

Huang Hua had an hour-long consultation on Tuesday with Thorbjorn Falldin in the chancellery chiefly on questions of economic and industrial policy. According to information received by DAGENS NYHETER Huang Hua stressed that this exchange ought to be supplemented by more cultural and sporting exchanges.

Security policy was discussed only briefly. Falldin chose to take the opportunity to stress the party political agreement that exists with regard to the Swedish policy of neutrality. Questions of security policy had dominated the first day's deliberations on Monday when Huang Hua discussed the question in greater detail with Foreign Minister Ola Ullsten.

LORD CARRINGTON COMMENTS ON EC ISSUES

LD160957 Brussels LE SOIR in French 12 Jun 80 p 7

[Marc Rozen interview with Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs Lord Carrington in London "48 hours before the European Council meeting in Venice": "Europe Cannot Sit Back While the Situation Is So Serious in the Middle East and in Afghanistan"]

[Text] [Question] The question of EEC expansion will be raised at the forthcoming European Council meeting in Venice. However, last week President Giscard d'Estaing proposed a "pause" in the process of expanding the Community to include Spain and Portugal. Chancellor Schmidt echoed these concerns on Monday. Are we moving toward a new European crisis on this question?

[Answer] On the political plane the Europeans have all welcomed the return of Spain, Portugal and Greece to parliamentary democracy. The general feeling which prevailed in Europe was that these countries, sharing the same ideals as ours, should be encouraged to become full members of the Community. Politically speaking there was no doubt that we would all be prepared to welcome Spain and Portugal. I do not think that President Giscard d'Estaing, and certainly not Chancellor Schmidt, disputes this point.

However, expansion causes an economic problem, especially Spain's entry, for French farmers which will not affect British farmers. Under the terms of the Brussels agreement France is worried about having to pay a substantial net contribution to the Community budget for the first time and West Germany is worried at seeing its share considerably increased. Furthermore, the ceiling of 1 percent of the value added tax product could be exceeded as early as next year. Hence, Bonn and Paris think it is necessary, and it is easy to understand them, to review the structures of the Community budget and its whole financial administration. In our opinion this is the most important section of the Brussels agreement.

[Question] Does Britain still hope that Spain and Portugal might be able to join the Community by 1983?

[Answer] This should not pose any problem since there is no proposal advocating that these countries should join before 1983. However, we have pledged to restructure budgetary mechanisms by 1981. During these talks we will obviously take account of the financial consequences of expansion. In my opinion the timetable for negotiations should be respected.

The "Brussels Compromise"

[Question] Let us return to the Brussels agreement. Many people think that it is an outright victory for the British ideas.

[Answer] This problem should certainly not be considered in terms of a triumph for Britain or disaster for the European partners. It is a reasonable compromise. Indeed everybody made concessions. Britain has made concessions by becoming the second largest net contributor, well ahead of France, although it is still the third poorest country in the EEC, and our partners by accepting an increase in their share of the contributions. It is in this spirit that Europe should function.

[Question] Some newspapers have stated that Mrs Thatcher wanted to reject the Brussels compromise and that you persuaded her to accept it.

[Answer] We carefully examined the Brussels proposals which did not fully correspond to our demands. However, the prime minister and the Cabinet considered that it was time to accept a compromise. However, it is important not to think that becoming the second largest contributor is a good deal.

[Question] There is a strong nationalist and anti-Community upsurge in Britain at the moment. Is Mrs Thatcher not responsible to some extent for this state of mind by her intransigent attitude in the budget affair?

[Answer] Suggesting that the government is partly responsible for this current of opinion would be putting the cart before the horse. The public rightly thought that our partners were not behaving very fairly toward us. Just compare the Brussels figures--which France and Germany already regard as heavy burdens--with the amount of our net contribution before the compromise. For instance, we were forced to reduce our aid to the Third World following the reduction of public spending. This year our development aid budget was far lower than the net contribution we were making to industrialized countries which are richer than us. In the public's view that was certainly not a fair way of administering a Community which claims to be fraternal.

This feeling of injustice was strengthened at the European Council meeting in Strasbourg a year ago when our partners refused even to contemplate that there was a British budget problem. In Dublin their offer seemed derisory. The proposals made by our partners at the Luxembourg summit in April made it possible to considerably reconcile different viewpoints. Now that the problem has been settled and even if some people are not fully satisfied I hope that a new attitude will develop in Britain toward the EEC.

North Sea Oil

[Question] Nonetheless the partners are now demanding concessions in other outstanding spheres such as energy, which Britain has so far refused to make.

[Answer] None of our partners has ever suggested that a resource belonging to a member country be sold to the Community at less than market price. What some of them would like to see is a promise on our part to sell them our oil as a priority. However, it is vital not to cherish illusions; North Sea oil is a drop in the ocean compared with European energy needs. The European Community, which already absorbs more than 50 percent of our oil exports, benefits from the principle of Community preference. One thing is certain: In case of emergency we will try to help our partners as much as we can.

[Question] All the indications are that there will be no real European initiative on the Middle East at the European Council meeting in Venice but rather a statement of principle by the Nine. What positive contribution can such an approach make in reviving tripartite negotiations on autonomy for the Palestinians?

[Answer] First, it is important to know what is meant by "initiative." In my opinion it is not very likely that the Community will submit a draft resolution to the United Nations. Indeed, the United States has hinted that it would use its veto and that would considerably reduce the scope of such an approach. We want to avoid undermining or complicating the American efforts at all costs. The EEC's objective is to encourage the peace process and not to put wrenches in the U.S. works.

I do not think that a resolution or statement of principle is the only possibility which can be envisaged. Let us wait and see what emerges from the European Council meeting in Venice. [paragraph continues]

However, the situation in the region is too serious for us to be able to sit back and do nothing. If there is any way in which Europe can help to defuse the situation and find a solution it is worth trying. I repeat that right from the start there was no question of launching an initiative like a rocket to the moon but of acting at a time when the Americans are experiencing political difficulties owing to the presidential elections.

Afghanistan

[Question] Were you behind the European proposal for Afghanistan's neutralization and nonalignment?

[Answer] Not neutralization, neutrality....

[Question] What is the difference?

[Answer] The concept of neutralization implies coercion whereas neutrality is based on free choice.

[Question] I concede that point. However, how can this idea be put into practice given the lack of progress on the diplomatic plane and the continuation of the Soviet occupation?

[Answer] Nobody ever thought that the situation would be settled overnight. However, the idea of a neutral and nonaligned Afghanistan is progressing, especially in the Third World and the Muslim countries. Indeed, it is important that the USSR realizes that it is the whole world and not just the West which is condemning the invasion of Afghanistan, as was shown by the vote of the 104 countries which condemned this attack at the UN General Assembly.

Progress is possible but we must be patient. The advantages of the solution of neutrality and nonalignment will become more obvious to the USSR as the problems facing the Soviets in Afghanistan increase.

[Question] Westminster's rejection of retroactive sanctions against Iran was regarded by the eight as a lack of European solidarity toward an ally in difficulties.

[Answer] The House of Commons' refusal is an unfortunate incident. However, our country is a parliamentary democracy and under our legal system the concept of retroactivity is very unpopular aside from exceptional cases. The psychological effect of this vote was negative but in practice it makes little difference. Only one major contract was concerned.

[Question] Despite the settlement of the British budget question and substantial progress made on the plane of political solidarity, the European Community does not really seem to have emerged from the atmosphere of constant crisis. Would it not be better, as some people advocate, to set up a two-speed confederal system in which Britain could refrain from taking part in the Common Agricultural Policy?

[Answer] If Britain were to withdraw from Green Europe the other partners would have to divide the equivalent of our share and that would certainly complicate the Community's present financial imbroglio. Even after the Brussels agreement our net contribution will amount to over 600 million units of account, of which more than two-thirds will go to finance the Common Agricultural Policy. Would it not be wiser to review the consequences of the development of Green Europe without damaging its principles? It is possible to ask, without risk of being accused of being anti-Community, whether it is appropriate to spend precious public funds for subsidize products which nobody wants and which are then sold at a loss to the Soviets.

The problem will remain with or without the British so it is better to tackle it now and build a more rational policy in the future.

OBJECTIVES OF CARTER'S EUROPE VISIT PREVIEWED

[Richard Beeston dispatch: "Carter's Mission to Reunite Allies"]

[Text] Washington--President Carter is making final preparations for his Thursday trip to Europe, where he hopes to restore unity to the Western alliance under his leadership.

The mission might prove crucial to his chances of re-election.

Highlight of his eight-day visit will be the seven-nation free world "summit" in Venice, a conference reserved in the past for economic matters but this time heavily involved in political issues as well.

Despite Allied disarray on a variety of issues, including Iranian sanctions, the Moscow Olympics, and relations with Russia after the Afghanistan invasion, Mr Carter believes the face-to-face talks will help to clear the air, say American officials.

The seven nations taking part are the United States, Britain, Canada, France, Italy, Japan and West Germany.

A major American objective at the "summit," says the State Department is to "re-assert Allied solidarity" against the Soviet presence in Afghanistan.

But the Carter administration is acutely aware of Allied unhappiness over Mr Carter's leadership during the past six months and in particular over his handling of the issue of the Americans held captive in Iran.

At the same time there is a considerable feeling of relief in Washington over what Mr Muskie, secretary of state, called the "restraint" shown last week by the EEC in its statement on the Middle East.

Middle East peace efforts will be one of the big issues at the "summit" and the Americans are bracing themselves for demands by the European allies for a policy-making role.

Mr Carter will also be seeing the pope in Rome, will try to make amends for not appearing at President Tito's funeral by placing a belated wreath on Tito's grave in Belgrade, and will visit Madrid and Lisbon before returning home next week.

LEFTWING OF LABOR PARTY SCORES 'VICTORIES' OVER CALLAGHAN

[James Wightman reports: "Callaghan Suffers Twin Blow"]

He was forced to concede that the party's leader in future should be chosen by an electoral college, rather than by the parliamentary Labour Party as at present. And he lost his fight against the left-wing campaign for the mandatory re-selection of Labour MPs. But the left failed for the time being in its attempt to have the National Executive Committee compile the party's general election manifesto.

It is not yet clear what the proposed reform in the leadership elections will have in the contest to succeed 68-year-old Mr Callaghan, who is not saying when he will retire. The present system, with only Labour MPs voting, is likely to benefit Mr Healey, shadow chancellor. But a new electoral college system could be to the advantage of a left-wing candidate, particularly Mr Wedgwood Benn, who was one of Mr Callaghan's principal foes at the weekend commission.

The proposed reform would have to be ratified by the party's annual conference--which has twice already voted against it--so the next immediate Labour leader could be chosen under the present system.

Mr Foot, deputy leader, and Mr Callaghan argued yesterday in favour of the present system being maintained. But they were heavily out-voted.

Later Mr Foot and Mr Callaghan conceded the principle of an electoral college when they voted for a motion proposing that a college should consist of 50 percent, drawn from the parliamentary Labour Party, 25 percent from the affiliated unions, 20 percent from the constituency Labour parties, and five percent from other affiliated bodies. But Mr Callaghan and his allies complicated the issue by inserting in the motion that the "rolling manifesto"--pushed by the left wing--should be subject to the endorsement of the electoral college.

Constitutional Problems Foreseen

[Editorial: "Near the Rubicon"]

[Text] It is not news that two opposite views of the British Constitution exist side by side to the Labour Party. According to one, the leader of that party, whether in office or in opposition, is chiefly responsible not to the Commons but to the Labour movement as embodied in the party conference and its organ, the National Executive. Similarly, Labour MP's are chiefly responsible to their constituency parties rather than to the whole body of the electorates which return them. According to the other, a Labour prime minister, like any other, is answerable to the Commons, and Labour MP's, like the rest, are the trustees of the legitimate interests of all their constituents. Labour's success in achieving recognition as a regular and respectable part of the British political system has been due mainly to the success of a series of Labour leaders in making the second constitutional theory prevail.

In recent years, it is true, this has been achieved by a highly dangerous tactic--that of keeping the left relatively quiescent over constitutional matters by conceding to it substantially on all others. Nevertheless, by maintaining the theoretical supremacy of the party leader and the parliamentary party, Labour governments have been able from time to time to pay some important tributes to reality--accepting for example International Monetary Fund money in order to stave off national bankruptcy. What now seems certain is that the left is more determined than ever before to carry its victories into the constitutional field; that is to say, to alter fundamentally and permanently the methods by which party policy is formulated.

If Mr Callaghan's rearguard action fails (and at Bishop's Storford he was plainly forced to take two steps backwards), the sober truth is that Britain and not just the Labour Party could prove to have crossed a constitutional Rubicon. Already, the left's mind is dwelling on means of perpetuating its triumph, ranging from the abolition of the Lords to the diverting of public money to the support of party funds. It is time the Tories took seriously Lord Hailsham's thoughts on the need for safeguards against elective dictatorship.

KIPRIANOU AGREES TO MEET WITH DENKTAS IN LIBYA IF 'USEFUL'

NC171206 Nicosia Domestic Service in Greek 1030 GMT 17 Jun 80

[Text of President Kiprianou's statement on Denktas' proposal to meet in Libya--read by announcer]

[Text] Based on our experience concerning the agreements of the late Ethnarch Makarios with Denktas on 12 February 1977, as well as from the 19 May 1979 agreement, and in light of the continuing Turkish intransigence--which reached its peak during Mr Perez de Cuellar's visit to Cyprus and can be seen in Mr Denktas' stand and statements as well as those of the Turkish Foreign Minister Erkmen--there is no justification for a meeting with Mr Denktas. However, if the UN secretary general deems that such a meeting would be useful at this stage, I am ready to meet Mr Denktas in the framework of the good services and under the auspices of Mr Waldheim, at any time and without advance commitments in order to lift the deadlock and resume the inter-Cypriot talks. Such a meeting must be within the 19 May 1979 agreement--which, among other things, includes the Makarios-Denktas agreement and the UN resolutions--and should seek to implement this agreement by holding a constructive and substantive inter-Cypriot dialogue.

GOVERNMENT REPLIES TO PAPANDREOU, DENIES REPORTS ON BASES

[Text] "Nimetz [U.S. Assistant Secretary of State for European Affairs] has neither the intention nor the potential to exert pressure or to blackmail Greece," stressed the government spokesman yesterday in answer to a statement by A. Papandreou. The government spokesman added: "What the chairman of PASOK stated about promises given by a prominent member of the government in reference to the U.S. bases in Greece has been officially denied."

Yesterday's Papandreou statement is based upon reports in two morning newspapers according to which:

1--The U.S. assistant secretary of state for European affairs has been authorized by the Department of State to stress to his interlocutors in Athens (23 June) that Washington sets the immediate signing of the Greek-U.S. defense agreement and the guaranteed operation of U.S. bases in Greece as prerequisites for U.S. "support" of the question of Greece's return to NATO's military wing.

2--The U.S. base at Ellinikon has been converted into an espionage base against the Soviet Union and Iran as well as a transport station for nuclear warheads.

Papandreou

In his statement the chairman of PASOK (based upon the above two publications) stressed, among other things:

--The attempt of the United States to blackmail Greece is based upon promises made in the past by a prominent member of the government to the Americans to the effect that, whether or not Greece does or does not return to NATO's military wing, the U.S. bases in our country will be maintained.

--Through its tolerance the government endangers not only Greek relations with friendly and neighboring countries but also the country's very survival in the event of a nuclear confrontation between the two superpowers.

--The government has a duty to state to Nimetz without reservations that Greek territory is not available for U.S. cold war adventurism.

In conclusion, Papandreou reiterated (he had also mentioned this in the chamber of deputies during the policy statement debate) that he is at the prime minister's disposal in order to reveal his sources of information.

The Government

The full text of the government spokesman's reply is as follows:

"Nimetz has neither the intention nor the potential to exercise pressure or to blackmail Greece.

"The position of the Greek Government on the return to NATO is well known. In reference to the statements made by the chairman of PASOK during the presentation of the government's policy statement about promises made by a prominent member of the government on U.S. bases, this was officially denied in the chamber."

Late last night PASOK's press office reiterated in a statement that Papandreou's offer to the prime minister (to prove to him that a prominent member of the government promises that the bases will remain irrespective of the country's return to NATO) remains in effect.

In reference to press reports on conversion of the military base at Ellinikon (by the Americans) into a base for espionage activities, the Ministry of National Defense emphatically denied these reports:

It is stressed in a ministry statement that primarily "published reports that nuclear warheads are being transported through Ellinikon and are being stored in the nearby U.S. base are far from the truth." It then added:

"Consequently there is absolutely no accuracy to the reports that there are sections at the U.S. base of Ellinikon to which access is even denied to the Greek commander, given the fact that this base as well as the others happen to be under Greek command and sovereignty.

"It is stressed that all activities originating at Greek airports are conducted under existing agreements, the future of which will depend upon the expected negotiations."

JORDANIAN TRADE MINISTER AN-NUSUR ARRIVES FOR ECONOMIC TALKS

TA141800 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1600 GMT 14 Jun 80

[Text] Jordanian Trade Minister 'Ali an-Nusur has arrived in Ankara for talks on economic and commercial issues. He was received at Esenboga Airport by Trade Minister Halil Basol who told reporters that the two countries' commercial relations were rapidly developing in accordance with the trade agreement signed in 1966. Basol expressed the hope that positive results would be achieved for both countries at the end of the 2 days of talks. Basol noted that trade worth $24 million was made between Turkey and Jordan during the first 3 months of this year. He added that the volume of trade would reach $100 million by the end of 1980. In a statement, 'Ali an-Nusur expressed the belief that Turkish-Jordanian relations would develop further as a result of the talks to be held in Ankara. The talks between the Turkish and Jordanian trade delegations will begin on Monday. Our correspondent has learned that a trade protocol will be signed at the end of the talks.

Discussion of Commercial Protocol

[Text] The talks on increasing the commercial relations between Turkey and Jordan began in Ankara today. In a statement before the meeting, the head of the Turkish delegation, Commerce Minister Halil Basol, expressed the belief that the new agreement to be signed between the two countries will contribute positively to the relations between Turkey and Jordan. Noting that Turkey is determined to supply the products needed by Jordan and to support future joint investments, Basol said that a Jordanian commercial representation to be opened in Ankara would assist in the development of relations. Basol added that Turkey welcomed Jordan's decision to participate in the international Izmir fair this year.

In his statement, Jordanian Minister of Industry and Trade 'Ali an-Nusur said that there is great potential for increased cooperation between the two countries in the technical and economic fields. Pointing out that Jordan will exert efforts to vary the products to be traded, An-Nusur noted that his country wishes to open the commercial representation to deal with this subject in Ankara in the near future. He added that this year's [trade] figures are very encouraging for the development of commercial relations between Turkey and Jordan. The new trake protocol between Turkey and Jordan will be signed tomorrow.

ECEVIT SUBMITS RPP INTERPELLATION AGAINST DEMIREL GOVERNMENT

[Text] An interpellation has been submitted against the Demirel government. The interpellation signed by Republican People's Party [RPP] leader Bulent Ecevit and his colleagues was submitted to the National Assembly chairman's office today. Its contents will be disclosed tomorrow. Ecevit proposed the establishment of a broad-based 1-year restoration government to eliminate the extreme polarization of the nation.

The issue of the interpellation, which is aimed at toppling the government, was discussed at the 5 ½-hour joint meeting of the RPP Senate and National Assembly groups today. The meeting began at 1000. There was a break at 1400 when the Administrative Councils of the RPP Senate and National Assembly groups convened and made a general assessment. The joint group reconvened at 1600 until 1730. Addressing the joint group, leader Bulent Ecevit said that efforts were being made in the country to change not only the regime but the system as well. He said: I do not know whether the regime can remain intact if we wait for this government to become weaker, for the people to suffer more and for the RPP to score more points in opposition.

Ecevit said he was doubtful whether safe elections could then be held.

The RPP leader pointed out that all the brakes on the economy were removed when all the controls on prices and the rate of interest were lifted. He added the aim behind that move was to take Turkey to a point of no return.

Noting that it was impossible for the RPP to come to power alone and to implement its program after the present government was toppled, Ecevit said: If we have the opportunity to establish a new government or to contribute to the establishment of a new government, I cannot guarantee that it will be more successful than the government that was in power for 21 months in 1978 and 1979. The conditions that can enable me to guarantee that realistically and sincerely do not exist in Turkey today. Knowing this and accepting it, are we going to try to establish a new government with our contributions or participation? Those who say yes to that will vote in favor of the interpellation at the Assembly. Those who cannot say yes, those who do not feel it is necessary, will not vote.

Bulent Ecevit stressed that he was not concerned about party leadership or the premiership. He explained that given the present situation in Turkey, no one had the right to think only of himself, of his election and, after a certain point, of his party. Ecevit said: It is true that once we submit the interpellation and topple the government we will be faced with certain problems, the solutions of which we cannot know yet. However, the present situation is known clearly and where it is taking Turkey is also known clearly. Should certain risks be taken in order to save the country from the present situation? The issue is to decide on this point.

Ecevit said that he had never claimed the problems would be solved once the RPP came to power again. He added that what was important was to move step by step toward solving the problems and to choose between the exacerbation of the problems and the destruction of democracy.

Ecevit said that he was proposing a restoration government that would eliminate the extreme polarization of the nation. He added: I am aware that we cannot implement our program in such a government, but we can at least have the opportunity, to a large extent, to prevent others from implementing their programs and policies that are dragging the country and the system toward a disaster.

Ecevit said: Can we fall into Demirel's trap of early elections? It is not only up to us whether we can or not. The conditions which will arise after this government is toppled might lead us to consider early elections too one day, even if we do not think it is right. Even if we do not make the move we are thinking of making today [submitting interpellation], the National Salvation Party might agree to early elections if it is offered a government formula that gives it more guarantees than it has at present. If early elections cannot be prevented there are two alternatives: Either early elections with a government which will be established with our contributions and which will certainly ensure more security than is insured today, or early elections with a government to be established completely outside us and capable of causing great harm. We must take those points into consideration too. If you ask me what my personal choice is, it is not early elections.

It is not early elections because early elections might delay efforts to solve Turkey's problems for 2 or 3 months and thus exacerbate them. My choice and proposal is the one I announced at the minicongress: if possible, a broad-based 1-year restoration government.

Bulent Ecevit pointed out that the RPP had to take a very difficult decision, keeping in mind certain unknown factors. He said that he did not think he had the right to force any member to take such a decision and therefore was leaving the members free to decide during the voting on the interpellation.

The RPP Senate and National Assembly groups' Administrative Councils convened under Ecevit's after the joint meeting of the groups ended. In a statement he made following the Administrative Councils' meeting, Ecevit said that they had decided that the hesitations within the joint group were not of a dimension that would prevent the submission of an interpellation and that therefore they had decided to submit the interpellation. He added that the contents of the interpellation would be disclosed to the public tomorrow. He said: We hope that this interpellation will be an encourating step in the process to save our country from the great dangers that are worrying the majority of our citizens and that it will open a new era in which Turkey's problems will be solved within the democratic system. Ecevit noted that it was the duty of all the political parties to restore security of life in the country as soon as possible, to guarantee the democratic system and to save Turkey from the present crises in a way the people yearn for.

Ecevit concluded by saying: If this interpellation yields the results we expect, we hope that all the political parties and legislators loyal to democracy will exert efforts unanimously to solve our country's problems within the democratic system and within democratic rules and that a new period in our country will begin in which the present problems of the Turkish nation will be eliminated and our national unity strengthened. We will give the interpellation to the National Assembly president with these wishes.

Following Ecevit's statement, Metin Tuzum and Coskun Karagozoglu, deputy leaders of the RPP National Assembly Group, submitted the interpellation to National Assembly President Cahit Karakas at 1815. Karakas said that he would convene the Consultative Council tomorrow to fix the date of the debates to determine whether the interpellation is placed on the agenda or not.

According to the Constitution, these debates must be held in one of the three sessions that follow the submission of the interpellation. If the Assembly decides to place it on the agenda it must also decide the date on which the interpellation will be held--which must be at least 2 days after the decision is taken, but not later than 7 days. During the interpellation debates the legislators can submit a motion of no confidence in the government or the Council of Ministers can apply for a vote of confidence. In that case, a vote of confidence is held 1 full day after the motion of no-confidence is submitted. The Council of Ministers or one of the ministers can be toppled through an interpellation with a simple majority.

CUMHURIYET BLAMES UNSTABLE DEMIREL GOVERNMENT ON IMF

NC160831 Istanbul CUMHURIYET in Turkish 15 Jun 80 pp 1, 9

["The Truth Behind the Events" column: "IMF: The Machine That Devours Governments"]

[Excerpts] An interpellation is being drafted in the parliament. The main opposition party is trying to topple the government. Following the recent decisions of the National Salvation Party the government is now in suspense. Its fall in the near future would not be unexpected.

We wish, however, to emphasize that the factor that will truly cause the government to fall is neither the withdrawal of the National Salvation Party's support nor the Republican People's Party's interpellation. These are merely the outward signs. All the examples of our recent history and daily life have proved that governments trying to implement the prescriptions of IMF have fallen in a short time. In the developing countries, there are those who turn to "military coups" as a remedy against "instability." In many underdeveloped countries, which seek to surmount economic crisis through IMF methods, military juntas replace governments so that the IMF prescriptions can be implemented without the fear of the government being overthrown.

The minority government in Turkey has identified itself with the formula of "continual price increases, continual devaluation" and has devalued the currency twice in 6 months, overburdening the public with price increases unprecedented in the history of our republic. It is impossible for such a government to survive in a multiparty system.

We hope that Prime Minister Demirel has learned that rules of the game by now, for he is experienced in this respect. After the 1970 devaluation, when Demirel tried to implement the IMF program, he was removed from office through the 12 March memorandum. This did not bring him or his party any credit and it harmed our democracy in many ways.

Turkey's Office of the Prime Minister, which has been in the grip of the IMF since 1977, is preparing to change hands for the fourth time. This cannot be considered a coincidence.

SA CARNEIRO TO VISIT THE HAGUE, BRUSSELS, PARIS

LD161328 Lisbon Domestic Service in Portuguese 1200 GMT 16 Jun 80

[Text] Prime Minister Sa Carneiro is going on a tour of several EEC capitals. Tomorrow he will be leaving for The Hague, and thence to Brussels. It has also been announced that he will pay a visit to Paris on 1 July at the invitation of French Premier Raymond Barre. On that occasion he will be received by President Giscard d'Estaing. This visit acquires particular importance in view of the French president's recent statements openly favoring an internal in the admission of new members into the EEC--specifically the admission of Spain, Greece and Portugal.

FINANCE MINISTER ANNOUNCES CHANGES IN DEVALUATION RATE

LD170136 Lisbon Domestic Service in Portuguese 2300 GMT 16 Jun 80

[Text] The Democratic Alliance government yesterday announced changes in the gradual devaluation rate of the escudo through Finance Minister Cavaco e Silva. [Begin Cavaco e Silva recording] In the first 4 months of 1980, the rate of price increases in Portugal was lower than the average rate both in the OECD and the Common Market and only nine countries recorded lower rates than ours. In April the rate of price increases in Portugal was half the average rate for OECD countries and only 6 countries out of 24 recorded lower rates. In May the rate of price increases in Portugal must have been the lowest throughout the OECD countries. In effect, the consumer price index in Portugal in May recorded a negative growth rate of minus 0.2 percent, that is to say, prices fell in May. In view of these results, which bear out a strong drop in the rate of price increases in the first 5 months of the year, it has been decided to lower the rate of devaluation of the escudo to 0.5 percent per month to take immediate effect in June. [end recording]

The value of the country's foreign exchange reserves was another valuable piece of information which Minister Cavaco e Silva gave. He said non-liquid reserves, with the gold valued at the Bank of Portugal's price-fixing system, amounted to $7.3 billion. He further said: [begin Cavaco e Silva recording] From the beginning of the year the country repaid $180.5 million in external loans acquired in 1975 and up to 1977 with gold security. Thus, today, 16 June, the part of the Bank of Portugal's gold reserves standing as security against external loans represented only 4 percent of the total, as opposed to 9.3 percent on 31 December 1979. COSTA RICA'S CARAZO URGES CLOSER EUROPE-LATIN AMERICA TIES

[Jean-Paul Marthoz report: "President Carazo Asks Europe To Support Democracy in Central America"]

[Text] "Cuban activism in the Caribbean islands? Are you referring to the activities of Cuban refugees?" Skillful in defusing questions inconsistent with diplomatic usage, Costa Rican President Rodrigo Carazo Odio, who is now paying an official visit to Belgium, is like the country which he governs--quiet, conciliatory and self-assured.

In fact, the Costa Rican Republic is one of the rare exceptions to the rule of Latin American dictatorships. Grafted onto a Central American which is either tending its wounds or preparing for civil war, the country of the "Ticos" [diminutive] is one of the few countries in the area where a Western-type democratic system prevails. Since the 1948 civil war social democrats have alternated with moderate conservatives and vice versa.

Even though social inequalities are still extant they have been cushioned by the importance of the middle class, and even though trade unionism is hardly approved of by the government's most rightist elements, the country's democratic institutions are strong, the press is free and political alternation is unchallenged.

This country, which is proud of its pluralism, its social security system, its public education system and the political circumspection of its national guard, has long been one of the most overcrowded places of refuge throughout the Latin American continent. Anti-Castro Cubans, Chilean Socialists and Argentinian Peronists jostle in San Jose "sodas" (cafes). "Peace and security cannot be exclusive prerogatives of one nation," Mr Carazo told us. "We have the duty to offer them to those who need them at a given moment."

The political uncertainties hovering over Central America have been the main topic of the talks which Mr Carazo has had in Brussels with King Baudouin , Messrs Martens, Nothomb and Eyskens and representatives of the EC Commission.

In fact, the Costa Rican head of state, who recalled the "political, cultural and romantic ties" between Europe and Latin America, would like to see Community countries--and Spain--strengthen their presence in the new Latin American world. "Europe could play the role of mediator there. Any triangular relationship makes it possible to eliminate polarization which reveals the big powers' desire for hegemony." Even though Costa Rica is a pro-Western country, it claims to be nonaligned and, furthermore, "nonaligned on nonaligned countries."

"We are opposed to anything that helps to increase tension in the world," Mr Carazo explained. "And this is why we have advised President Carter not to organize naval maneuvers in the Caribbean Sea."

And the Costa Rican president, who delivered the opening speech at the UNESCO conference on disarmament in Paris, added: "I cannot agree to our region being used by the big powers for settling their quarrels."

Mr Carazo does not conceal his dislikes--"Cuba has long been represented as paradise on earth. Since 100,000 Cubans have left their country, this picture should be reconsidered." And he added with a mischievous glint in his eyes: "If a certain inhabitant of Cuba were to leave the country, 10 million Cubans would not think about leaving their fatherland."

In the present conflict between the Salvadoran junta and the leftist opposition, the Costa Rican president has openly chosen one side: "We maintain very close relations with the junta, which represents the only possible alternative," he said, "and we will ensure that our territory is not used as a transit route for arms taken into that country." A statement which indeed shows that Mr Carazo's government has no intention of playing into the hands of the Salvadoran revolutionaries, whereas 1 year earlier it supported the Nicaraguan insurgents in their struggle against Anastasio Somoza's dictatorship.

President Carazo, who presides over a coalition government composed of social Christians and conservatives, knows that the hands of the clock are moving and that the economic crisis and the social changes introduced as a result of the country's modernization could well eventually undermine the bases of Costa Rican democracy. Economic growth is of essential importance for propping up the regime.

It is in this context that Mr Carazo's talks with Messrs Jenkins and Haferkamp have taken place. Costa Rica, which would like to become Central America's spokesman as far as the EEC is concerned, does not expect Europe to reconsider its relations with its former colonies since "everything that promotes Europe's relations with developing countries is a good thing." In fact the Costa Rican president hopes to ensure for Central America terms similar to those granted to the Andean Pact countries which are now negotiation an economic cooperation agreement with the EEC. An increase in exports to the Common Market is thus seen as the key to Costa Rica's economic revival and as a guarantee for the stability of its democracy.

BUNDESTAG MEETS ON GERMAN UNITY DAY; EC ISSUES, OSTPOLITIK REVIEWED

Government Statement

DW170830 Cologne ARD Television Network in German 0700 GMT 17 Jun 80

[Government statement to the Bundestag in Bonn by Chancellor Helmut Schmidt--live]

[Text] Mr President, ladies and gentlemen, let me say a word about German Unity Day before I report on the European Council meeting in Venice and discuss forthcoming meetings.

There have been many attempts in German history to break away from economic and political compulsion, and to obtain more freedom and more justice. The great attempted revolution of 1848 failed, and the German democracy of 1919 was lost after more than a dozen years. Yet a people's revolt never remains without effect.

The 17th of June 1953 was a revolt against economic and political compulsion. At first it was a labor conflict; then it was a spontaneous manifestation of the German people's will to be citizens who make their own decisions. We observe German Unity Day each year to commemorate this in the Federal Republic. But I hope we do so not so much in the spirit of a day which is on the calendar to mark a day (?of destiny) and a holiday, but in the spirit of a day of reflection.

Walter Scheel, in an important speech given here 2 years ago, said that the pursuit of unity is not obsolete Reich romanticism turned backwards; rather unity is a goal of peace directed toward the future. We want unity in order to serve world peace as an equal member in a unified Europe. This is how it is written in our basic law. But we cannot wait to serve peace until German unity has been completed because peace in Europe is also the prerequisite for our people's achievement of unity with free self-determination. We Germans need peace, we want peace, and we are capable of attaining peace.

It has become undeniable and clear to everyone during the crisis of the past 6 months how important the will and capability for peace are, not only for the Germans but for the community of nations as a whole. This is why we will do everything in our power to live up to our special responsibility for peace as Germans, with all our hearts and with prudent circumspection.

Last December Erich Honecker, Chairman of the Council of State of the German Democratic Republic and I said in Berlin, independent of each other and with the same words, that never again must war emanate from German soil. [applause] This avowal had already been included in one of Kassel's 20 points issued 10 years ago today--the German policy program of the social-liberal coalition whose implementation I accounted for to the Bundestag earlier this year in the annual report on the state of the nation.

June 17th at that time, 27 years ago, not only made visible the will for freedom, justice and unity, but also showed painfully and quite clearly to everybody the limits of our action in divided Germany, the limits for the people and governments over there in the German Democratic Republic and here in the Federal Republic of Germany. The realization of a limited ability to act did not lead us into resignation, but we did comprehend that German unity cannot be enforced by means of a revolt against existing power conditions. This is the reality on which our policy on Germany is based, with which today the cohesion of the Germans is preserved, the hardships of partition are reduced, and the cooperation between the Germans on both sides is consolidated and enhanced. Those coming after us will still have to work on the task of making the unity and freedom of Germany complete, as the basic law prescribes. For this reason, too, it is important to impart historical knowledge to the youth, knowledge which will not end between the Werra and Elbe rivers. We Germans, after all, have special cause to digest history critically and to establish a proper relationship with it, not with a downcast glance but with eyes alert to the present and the future. As Gustav Heinemann put it, we Germans have been born into a difficult fatherland. Preserving peace despite German difficulties is a particular requirement for us.

At the moment we are experiencing a serious phase in international relations. The 17th European Council meeting in Venice provided the heads of government and the foreign ministers of the EC states an opportunity for an extremely profitable exchange of ideas about the situation of the Community, and the situation of its member states in a world of serious political and economic convulsions. We succeeded in drawing nearer to the original mission of the European Council again, namely, to jointly clarify, without long papers and without the pressure of detailed decisions, in trustful discussion what is at stake for Europe and for the member states and what must be done.

At this point I would like to thank Italian Prime Minister Cossiga and Italian Foreign Minister Colombo who, with extraordinary efforts and with great circumspection, successfully steered the European Community through a particularly difficult half year in their capacity of the so-called presidency. [applause]

The result of Venice was that we were agreed, and I quote from the German-French statement of February early this year, that the European powers, under present circumstances, must assume special responsibilities. What matters in the Community is to ensure the internal and external ability to act through the indispensable adaptation of agricultural policy and through a more balanced distribution of financial burdens.

What matters in world economy is to find a new world economic balance--following profound disturbances as a result of the oil price explosions and their consequences--through joint efforts by the industrial countries including those of the East, the oil-producing countries, and the developing, non oil-producing countries.

What matters in world politics is an appropriate European contribution by the Community and its member states toward a common Western policy of containing and managing crises which have been acutely jeopardizing the world political balance and peace especially since the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan.

The quarrel over the amount of the British contribution to the European budget over the past several months increasingly paralyzed the Community and threatened its internal and external ability to act. The settlement of this quarrel thus became an urgent foreign policy and an urgent security policy task. The preservation of the European balance and the strengthening of Europe's role in safeguarding peace in the world made a compromise to the advantage of Great Britain necessary. This compromise was imperative also because the fixing of the agricultural prices for the 1980-81 economic year, the safeguarding of trade in mutton, the establishment of guidelines for joint fishing policy, and so forth, depended on the solution of the budget problem.

For all these reasons, but above all for the reason first mentioned, namely, the need to preserve the external ability to act on the part of the Community and the need to preserve the European balance, the Federal Government approved the package that was negotiated. I welcome the fact that the leadership of the opposition, too, whom we have kept posted on these negotiations in the course of the past half year, has shown understanding for this necessary decision which, however, was not easy for us to make. It was not easy.

In 1980 and 1981 Great Britain's payments to the Community will be cut by a total of DM6.5 billion. The inevitable consequence is a greater burden on the rest of the member states, on the German share, automatically resulting from the financing system of the Community which has been in force for the past 9 years now. According to present Brussels estimates this means that our share in this additional financial contribution for the benefit of relieving the British budget in 1980-81 will be DM2.5 billion in 1980 and 1981; the French contribution will be almost DM2 billion, and the Italian one almost DM1 billion, just to name the largest contributors.

These additional burdens resulting from the decisions of the Community were not previously envisaged. Therefore they are not fully covered by the 1980 federal budget and even less by the medium-term financial planning for 1981. The Federal Government made the necessary decisions for covering this sum early this month. The resulting additional burdens on the federal budget in 1981 will amount, from today's point of view, to about DM1.8 billion. About DM0.5 billion will result from our payments to Great Britain postponed from 1980 to the first quarter of 1981.

These additional payments are just as necessary and unavoidable in the general interests of the FRG as the increase in our defense expenditures of 3 percent in real terms, decided on in 1980; they are just as necessary as the defense aid for Turkey and Greece, and as the enormous increase in developmental assistance. Thus the overproportional increase in international tasks and commitments and supranational expenditures for the FRG continues. In this field, by the way, also belong expenditures within the framework of the policy on Germany, particularly expenditures connected with assistance to Berlin.

All these rapidly increasing expenditures involve only the federal budget and not the laender and communities. Moreover, the federal budget must bear the main burden of economic and structural policy. This development was not envisaged in 1969 or when the financial constitution [as heard] was passed in 1970. Now the laender must make their contributions to solid financing of the German contribution so as to maintain and strengthen the European ability to act. [applause]

The Federal Government therefore calls upon the laender to agree to a proper distribution of the turnover tax revenue to the advantage of the Federal Government as of 1 January 1981, thus eventually taking into consideration article 106 of the basic law, a demand of the Constitution. [shouts, applause]

Stable financial policy is a cornerstone of our responsibility for peace in Europe. [applause] Reestablishment of a financial balance between the government and the laender is part of a stable financial policy. [applause, shouts] Everyone must approve this. In contrast with those who are shouting, I have seen statements indicating agreement from a number of CDU minister presidents, ladies and gentlemen. Everyone who bears political responsibility for safeguarding the central state's ability to act must approve this. [applause]

Naturally one must also discuss in this connection the current mixed financial procedures and the division of tasks. If the laender should refuse to do so, the Federal Government, immediately after the convocation of the newly elected Bundestag, will present a draft safeguarding the financing of additional burdens resulting from the Brussels decision, financing them by increasing the oil tax and the alcohol tax and by altering the assistance for farmers with regard to retroactive payment. [shouts]

Ladies and gentlemen, the quarrel about the British budget contribution has made it clear that imbalances in the budget of the Community--I do not understand the unrest; if this is supposed to be a parliamentary workday then there ought to be talk about the actual work of parliament. [applause] I speak of the tasks of the future parliament, and I think you ought to listen carefully so that you will be able to come up with an answer later on, ladies and gentlemen of the CDU/CSU. [applause]

The quarrel about the British budget contribution has made it clear that the imbalances in the budget of the Community can be corrected only by structural adaptations. Agreement exists in the European Council in this respect. The Community has gained time through the Brussels decisions to permanently eliminate the imbalances.

The Brussels commission will present suggestions by mid-1981, that is, 12 months from now. In agreement with the Bundestag the Federal Government maintains its position that, in the future, the value added tax revenue passed to the Community should not exceed 1 percent of the basis of valuation. [applause]. This results in the need to curtail the increase in the European Community's agricultural expenditures because, otherwise, in a short time the agricultural expenditures would amount to the total of the Community's income, and later on even surpass it.

In 1980 and 1981 our state will be the largest net payer into the Community by far. The German national economy will contribute DM4.8 billion more than we get back in 1980; in 1981 this net sum will even amount to DM5 billion. Besides us, only Great Britain and France will have a negative net balance.

I made it very clear in Venice that there are limits to the financial strain to which the FRG can be subjected. [applause]. Other states of the Community with per capita incomes that are as high or almost as high as ours are at present net recipients to a great extent. If the planned structural adaptations do not suffice to avoid the appearance of new unacceptable net payment positions for individual member states, the question will arise as to whether the establishment of a ceiling for the net payments of a member state will be generalized, and whether a similar principle should be set up also for those member states which are net recipients.

I found quite a bit of understanding for this approach in Venice, an approach which, by the way, is maintained not only by the FRG. It is indispensable that the reasons for the existing imbalances in the Community be eliminated by 1982.

We also owe this to such future partners as Greece, Portugal and Spain. We can be successful in this great political task of extending the Community, which we have taken upon ourselves in order to strengthen democracy in Europe--and we are determined to do it--only if the Community itself is strong and secure, and if the already difficult and complicated adaptation processes are not burdened with unsolved internal structural Community problems. [applause] The Federal Government, at any rate, has no intention of again supporting a decision 2 years from now which follows the pattern of the Brussels decisions.

The European Council also offered an opportunity to discuss questions which will be on the agenda next week at the conference of the seven biggest industrial states of the Western world which, it happens, will take place in Venice as well. The major points of our preparatory discussion were inflation, the energy problem, and the world economic situation at large, especially North-South relations. The nine heads of government consider the latest oil price hikes unjust. In any event, they will even intensify the inflationary tendencies in the world. But world political topics commanded more attention during these talks than they did at the previous meetings of the European Council. This will be the case again in Venice next week.

We are agreed that a special danger consists in the possibility of the crises in Afghanistan, in U.S.-Iranian relations and in Arab-Israeli relations merging into a single conflict. As a result, a direct threat also increases toward Europe. Our citizens, our friends and our allies--especially the United States--but also the states of the region I am talking about and the Soviet Union and its allies must know what the European governments think in this situation and how they propose to contribute toward the containment and management of this dangerous complex, crisis.

Part of our discussions, therefore, were distilled into statements in which the common positions of the European states have been adjusted to the current status. Concerning Afghanistan, the EC states on 19 February took an initiative for an independent, non-aligned Afghanistan and outlined a political solution designed to do justice to the wishes of the Afghan people and to the interests of Afghanistan's neighbors.

On the basis of this common stance we have now dealt with the 11th foreign ministers' conference of the Islamic states in Islamabad and declared our readiness to support corresponding initiatives toward a solution.

As for the Middle East, the European positions were continued on the basis of former statements which refer to Security Council Resolutions 242 and 338--amendments of which the EC states have not proposed, contrary to some assumptions voiced in public--as well as to the current Egyptian-Israeli negotiations. By their avowal of the right to self-determination for the Palestinian people, the EC states underscore their conviction that the solution of the Palestinian problem is a central factor in the Middle East peace process. The nine EC states will elucidate their position and their proposal concerning a renunciation of force for all parties involved and, in light of these contacts and consultations, they will determine their further course of action. In this respect the European-Arab dialogue will also play an important part.

At this point I would like to insert a personal remark: It is my impression that this very balanced statement by the Europeans will have a helpful effect on the complex endeavors for peace in the Middle East. I am gratified to note that the U.S. and Egyptian governments also shared this assessment. Our Israeli friends will be assured that we understand their anxieties and predicaments as they were described to me shortly before Venice by the president of the Knesset and his delegation. We included them in our discussions.

An essential part of the confidential exchange of ideas of the heads of government naturally dealt with East-West relations. President Giscard d'Estaing reported in detail on his talks with Soviet General Secretary Brezhnev. It was important to me to consult our European friends prior to the talks which Foreign Minister Genscher and I will conduct in Moscow in the near future--in the near future meaning after the meeting with President Jimmy Carter and Secretary of State Muskie next weekend.

It goes without saying that we will be able to talk with the Soviet leadership only on behalf of the Federal Republic of Germany. Yet we will do so along lines we have thoroughly coordinated and deepened jointly with our friends and allies. We know we enjoy support.

During our working visit in Moscow we will continue bilateral consultations on a high level. After the meetings in Belgrade, in Vienna and in Warsaw we want to make our contribution toward the East and West continuing their dialogue, especially in times of crisis. [applause] We will speak clearly and in no uncertain terms about the dangers to world peace and their causes, naturally about Afghanistan but also especially with regard to Soviet Eurostrategic missile armament.

In a good and frank discussion with Soviet Deputy Premier Tikhonov, who recently headed the Soviet delegation at the meeting of the German-Soviet economic commission here in Bonn, both sides were aware that the chances for further intensification of economic cooperation depend on whether a defusing of international crises is possible. What matters above all is to find out how roads can be cleared toward solving these crises.

I do not know whether this will be possible in the forthcoming talks. But I do know that all Germans would have to suffer like no other people in Europe if international tensions were aggravated. [applause] For this reason I am sure that the Federl Government is obligated to exploit any change to make its contribution toward safeguarding peace. [applause]

Kohl Response

DW171651 Cologne ARD Television Network in German 0730 GMT 17 Jun 80

[Speech by CDU Chairman and Bundestag Deputy Dr Helmut Kohl in the Bundestag debate in Bonn following the 17 June government statement--live]

[Excerpts] To begin, let me say a word about your statements on the Venice EC summit. Mr Federal Chancellor, the summit meeting of the European heads of government has obviously aggravated European-American disagreement and has not really made preparedness for understanding within the European Community easier. Regrettably we must state that summit meetings of the European heads of government have been merely routine affairs for years. Steps advancing closer cooperation in Europe have remained lipservice. Important issues on which no agreement can be reached in the meetings of the ministerial council are postponed for the next summit where they are discussed and then, after nothing has been agreed on or resolved formally, they are returned to the consultative bodies. The documents which are submitted regularly to the summit meetings are convincing proof of this thesis.

Ladies and gentlemen, the crisis of the European Community therefore is not primarily a crisis of the agricultural market or of the European budget. The real reason for the paralysis of the Community lies primarily in the fact that the European institutions have proved unable to equip Europe with a functioning decision mechanism. That is Europe's problem. [applause]

Whenever the European heads of government are supposed to grant the European Parliament more codetermination, they back out. Strictly speaking, ladies and gentlemen, it ought to be a concern of all parties in the Bundestag that 1 year following the election of the first freely elected European Parliament we jointly support the demands of our colleagues in the European Parliament for more codetermination in this freely elected European Parliament. This ought to be the tradition of the German parliament. [applause] Cooperation for achieving the common goals of economic, financial, budget and monetary policies, which has been overdue for years, now--like so often before--again culminates in the urgent appeal to make inflation, which is rising in the countries of the Community, the main target of the common struggle. Mr Federal Chancellor, I would have liked to have seen you make those magical statements there which you made again today on the relationship between the Federal Government and the laender governments as a result of your misunderstanding of the federal state structure. [applause]

A common energy policy as a challenge to the worldwide crisis has manifested itself in the grave concern expressed by the heads of government over the recent oil price decisions by the OPEC countries as well as in the expectation that it will have to be discussed at the world economic summit. If I understand it correctly, Mr Federal Chancellor, the chance was left unused to develop, together with the developing countries which are particularly affected, a common European strategy and policy toward the OPEC states.

The common agricultural market as a link for cooperation in trade policy and the basis for financing the EC budget is open for discussion through a reform of the EC agricultural policy and financing. But the truth is, ladies and gentlemen, that for election reasons initiatives in this direction will not be taken at present, because the voters must not be alarmed by future events. Mr Federal Chancellor, I agree and I appreciate it that after years of inactivity you have realized now that the pent-up problems in the agricultural budget necessitate a decisive policy. We, the CDU/CSU, are also convinced that the existing imbalance in the EC budget should be revised and structural improvements in the agricultural market effected in order not to undermine the tested principle of the common agricultural market as a link for European integration and in order to guarantee a relatively balanced development of the EC states, as difficult as that will be.

In discussions we had prior to and following the compromise, we as the opposition signaled to you and the Federal Government, Mr Federal Chancellor, that on this point we agree on principle, that we are prepared to share in the responsibility to enable you to finally overcome your paralyzing quarrel over Alliance commitments, solidarity statements, EC agricultural prices and budget financing problems. I also am particularly grateful for the work and negotiating skill of our friend, the acting president of the Council, Emilio Colombo. [applause]

Now a word, Mr Federal Chancellor, about the second part: your government statement on the EC Middle East declaration. First, international reaction to the European Council's Middle East declaration has called the wisdom of the timing and the contents of this diplomatic initiative into question. The EC initiative is rejected definitely and toughly by Israel. It is termed halfhearted by the Arab states and it is observed by the U.S. ally with obvious distrust and even disapproval. I ask myself, Mr Federal Chancellor, where is the wisdom in this declaration? The nine EC states have declared their willingness, I quote, to participate within the framework of a comprehensive solution in a system of concrete and binding international guarantees--and now comes the important phrase--including those in the area [zu lande].

Mr Federal Chancellor, you owe us an explanation. What does it mean, guarantees in the area? Does it mean German soldiers, Mr Federal Chancellor? Your political friends in the past weeks made cheap policy by distorting quotations. [applause] I asked a question about the guarantees in the area. You should answer the question, Mr Federal Chancellor, of whether it could mean that German troops will be stationed shortly on the Arab-Israeli borders. What qualifications do the EC states have at all to be able to give concrete guarantees for peace in the Middle East? Given the deplorable state of the Europeans in the past 6 months, does anyone really believe that we, the Europeans in our present state, can give any concrete, credible guarantees?

Ladies and gentlemen, isn't the security of Israel and today also of Egypt really based above all and perhaps even exclusively on the guarantees by the United States? It was so in the past, by the way, and I think this also holds true for the future. But, Mr Federal Chancellor, if this is so, we Europeans should be very much concerned about strengthening U.S. peace policy in the Middle East [applause] and not to weaken it through initiatives of our own at the wrong time--through problematic promises and against the warnings, wishes and lectures by the U.S. Government.

Ladies and gentlemen, let me return to the main part of what we must discuss here today, the day of German unity. The point was and still is that we Germans in the free part of our fatherland, who fortunately live on the sunny side of German history, remain aware of the obligation to work for the freedom and unity of all Germans. [applause] This is and remains the essence of every Germany policy. To some it is a matter of course; somehave long banished it from their memory. But I call it to mind above all because the relations which have developed between the two German states must not divert our attention from the proper concern of our Germany policy.

Negotiations are conducted. They have led to improvements in the fields of traffic, water protection and in other fields. I say expressly: That's all right. Who would be against it, even though the financial contributions by the Federal Republic are rising higher and higher. Ministers of both governments meet and talk about the extraordinarily good phase of relations and about the GDR's interest in advancing the policy of detente. It was almost with euphoria that a member of the Federal Government said recently that the relationship between both German states had become an important pillar for the preservation of peace between East and West.

All this conveys a picture of relations intended to make us believe that the world is in order. But, ladies and gentlemen, they only mirror part of the reality, because reality in Germany still means the refusal of human rights in the GDR [applause]. It still means the continual perfecting of border installations and shooting devices which can only be aimed at killing those who try to flee. Those, ladies and gentlemen, who state this fact are not cold warriors, but only are doing their duty to tell the truth in the German parliament. [applause] We do not take pleasure in having to state this negative finding, but we refuse to submit to the opportunist zeitgeist which has never done any good in the history of nations. [applause]

I will mention another reality. Up to now the GDR has not been willing to lower the age limit for visitors to the West by 3 or 5 years. We all know that our list of wishes could be enlarged indefinitely. Ladies and gentlemen, relations cannot be accepted by us as normal as long as there is no progress for the people concerned. Therefore, Mr Chancellor, we see with growing concern that more and more often you term talks you announce as a value per se, thus signaling from the beginning to the other side, be it Moscow or East Berlin, that concessions do not have to be made because you do not expect any concessions yourself. [applause] But you cannot say or have your spokesman state, as you did on 24 January, that talks with the GDR at the top government level will have to bring substantial progress and then, when the date of the talks is forthcoming, you forget this prerequisite. Ladies and gentlemen, the gauge of normal relations is and remains the extent of alleviations achieved for the people in the GDR, and nothing else. But the substance of this memorial day reaches beyond this very topical and very urgent obligation.

What do we do, ladies and gentlemen, to recognize and implement the vital interests of the Germans and the German nation? It is the task of a politician to recognize and work for the vital interests of the nation. This requires a sense of proportion, knowledge of the world situation, the ability to act realistically, a sense of moral qualities and of the connection between the orientation of our policy toward Atlantic partnership and the free bases of our body politic.

The way German interests are to be defined is obviously an open question not only in the federal chancellor's office. It is discussed within the SPD as if it were not the Godesberg program which is on the agenda but again the Atlantic community, the integration of the West, the ties with the United States and the question of rearmament. This has been your contribution to this discussion in these months.

You see, Mr Federal Chancellor, this is your foundation which is so fragile in terms of domestic policy, and it is in this situation that you go to Moscow. It is correct and we agree that talks with the Soviet Union must go on. But, ladies and gentlemen, --and this is important, Mr Wehner--what matters is the timing and the content of the talks, because it is even more important than the trip per se that this trip be made under clear Alliance policy and domestic policy conditions. A trip as an end in itself or as a shopping trip for statesmanship cannot be repeated at will. [commotion, applause].

Too many hopes are set on this trip, and even if it ends without any result it will have consequences. I say clearly: Such a trip as an end in itself is unthinkable for us. You see, Mr Federal Chancellor, I should be permitted to address you in your own words. I remind you of the joint statement you signed together with the CPSU Central Committee general secretary and Soviet head of state, Leonid Brezhnev, in Bonn on 6 May 1978. It says, first of all, and I quote: With respect to the indivisibility of peace and security in all parts of the world they--the signatories--will use their political and economic possibilities for this goal--meaning detente--unilaterally, bilaterally and multilaterally.

Ladies and gentlemen, the Soviet invasion in Afghanistan is clearly at variance with this statement. The Soviet Union talks about detente and disarmament in Europe and wages a hot war in Afghanistan. It is a scandal that it has been accepted almost like a command we had been looking for that we talk about everything except human rights solidarity with a poor country which at present is being invaded with extreme determination by the Soviet Union [applause]. Those who put up with this will make peace, detente and security dievisible. It was the premise of German policy in this house for many years, recognized by all at least verbally, that peace, detente and security are indivisible.

The statement says, secondly, and I quote: Both sides consider it important that no one strive for military superiority. They assume that an approximate balance and parity are sufficient for guaranteeing defense. Since this statement, Mr Federal Chancellor, the Soviet Union has produced and stationed new medium-range missiles every month. It has thereby incontestably changed the balance and parity in Europe to its advantage. Moreover, it demands, I quote PRAVDA of 13 June, that NATO suspend or at least postpone the implementation of its measures for the restoration of the balance, its decision on the production and stationing of new U.S. nuclear missile systems.

The NATO decision can only be implemented in 3 years because of the time needed for production. So there is enough time for negotiations on the reduction or renunciation of medium-range missiles. But the Soviet Union, ladies and gentlemen, not only steps up armament, it has also rejected all negotiations. At this point and in this situation you, Mr Federal Chancellor, and colleague Wehner proposed a moratorium. In your speeches in Hamburg and Essen you deliberately failed to mention a time limit for such a moratorium, and Mr Wehner repeated it in an interview on 13 June. You, Mr Federal Chancellor, announced this proposal evidently without prior consultation with your foreign minister and our NATO allies. You reprimanded every critic of this policy in an extremely rude form unprecedented in the history of the Federal Republic [applause]. I am afraid it was not your insight but the reaction by our Western allies which forced you to return, verbally at least, to the common NATO policy.

You gave the impression to the Soviet Union that the Federal Republic might be prepared to reconsider the NATO decision, thereby doing harm to the security policy of the West. [applause] If the Soviet Union is really interested in disarmament, balance and parity, it must first of all give up its negative attitude to the negotiating offer by NATO. Mr Wehner, who has a specially sensitive understanding of these things, already noted a small change in the Soviet attitude--I quote him verbatim. I state if the Soviet Union is not prepared to make concrete arrangements within the next 3 years, our security and peace in Europe will require the stationing of the U.S. medium-range missiles in Europe and also in the Federal Republic.

The statement says thirdly, and I quote: Both sides confirm the goal of the Vienna talks to arrive at a more stable state of their military level, on the basis of undiminished security of the parties concerned. Several days ago the Soviet Union decisively and resolutely rejected all Western proposals on troop reductions in Central Europe.

Mr Federal Chancellor, I have given only three examples from this statement signed 2 years ago. We expect you to remind Mr Brezhnev in Moscow of his signature on this joint statement and to demand the implementation of this statement. Then there would be some sense in your Moscow trip [applause]. I say this so clearly because Mr Wehner has already taken preventive measures. He agrees that if it comes to a confirmation of this statement again, what is the paper worth at all if the Soviets do not adhere to it? This must be said on the eve of this trip.

We expect you to also talk about a fourth topic in Moscow: the topic of human rights. I am optimistic that you understand it. I noted with great interest when the Argentinian foreign minister was here in Bonn that all government authorities hurried to announce to the public that they had duscussed with him the question of human rights in his country. I agree with that. But, ladies and gentlemen, they should be able to see not only out of the right but also out of the left eye. [applause] When you discuss human rights with representatives of South American governments we fully back you, and we also have the desire, for the sake of the credibility of your statements, that you have equally clear talks with Soviet politicians, politicians from the GDR, Poland, the CSSR and other countries. In the eulogy of Mr Hauff on the occasion of his visit to the GDR I heard nothing of the kind. [applause]

There is one more subject that must be discussed in this house on the day of German unity. Mr Federal Chancellor, I speak of the depressing figures signaling the decline of family reunifications among people from the Soviet Union. I think that in your Moscow talks with Soviet leaders you should make this question an essential point, not only for human rights reasons, but above all for philanthropic reasons.

In summary I would say that we agree to trips, but only if the terms are clarified--if they are all right, as it were. But these terms have been interpreted to the extent that almost nobody understands them any more, with many of your SPD members having completely lost sight of the priorities of German policy. In domestic policy in particular much has gone downhill. Because of too much hope for detente, the reality of detente, the reality of the Soviet Union stepping up armament beyond all proportion and its preparedness to use this superiority as an instrument of blackmail and even attack has largely been forgotten.

Ladies and gentlemen, the Soviet Union today much more than 30 years ago has the opportunity to drive a wedge between the countries of the West because it operates extremely successfully with the carrot of detente and the stick of its tank divisions, because it offers trade agreements and at the same time nurtures hopes that he who does business well will also act moderately and sensibly. Those calling the bases of the Alliance into question, those calling our partnership with the United States into question--as large sections of German Social Democracy do to a growing extent--and those calling the vital interests of our country into question, offer no solid bases for your travel diplomacy, Mr Federal Chancellor. Those considering it wiser to spare the citizens the inconveniences of international politics, in order not to shock them on the eve of the elections, may act cunningly at present, but do not act wisely in terms of statemanship.

Genscher Speech

DW171253 Cologne ARD Television Network in German 0829 GMT 17 Jun 80

[Speech by Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher in the Bundestag debate following the 17 June government statement--live]

[Text] Esteemed ladies and gentlemen, 17 June must be a cause every year for all of us to again assess developments in divided Germany, considering it a standard for measuring our policy by, and drawing the consequences from this for further policy. Indeed, our fellow citizens in the GDR as well as our citizens here in the FRG look to the discussion in the Bundestag with the expectation that the parties in the Bundestag and the Federal Government will outline their ideas as to how we can act to bring about something in our divided country that will benefit the citizens on this as well as the other side. [applause]

Ladies and gentlemen, we must have a frank discussion about the right ways to do things and about possibilities. This year has seen every fellow citizen become more concerned about peace on our continent than has been the case in the past. This is due to events in other parts of the world. And we know that this concern does not stop at the dividing line running through Germany. In apartments, plants, canteens and schools in the GDR the concern for peace and hopes for preserving it are no different than ours. [applause] Our fellow citizens, therefore, expect this debate to provide information on what we want to do to safeguard peace in divided Germany, in divided Europe and in the whole world.

June 17 1953 is the day of one German nation which is indivisible. The continuing division, the continuing demand for self-determination, for human rights for all Germans and the continuing dangers to world peace do not permit us to devote this day only to retrospection. It is particularly in difficult times that everything must be done to preserve what has been achieved for the cohesion of the nation and to look for possibilities to take new steps for the benefit of our divided nation. [applause]

Ladies and gentlemen, activity is demanded now for safeguarding peace in Europe which is indivisibly linked with peace in the world. Activity is demanded for overcoming the partition, for strengthening the ties between the Germans in the West and in the East. Every one of these aims, like the letter on German unity, is documented by and embedded in our detente policy. Therefore none of these aims can be denounced as being directed against the targets of detente. This also pertains to the commemoration of 17 June 1973. [as heard]

If it is correct that we as Germans--and that is our common aim--want to act for a state of peace in Europe, in which the German nation with free self-determination will be able to decide on on its unity, then peace policy in a far-reaching sense will be the topic of this day. It was correct, therefore, for the federal chancellor to report here on an important conference of the European Community where new prerequisites were created to enable a united Europe to act in political matters. [applause]

It was therefore necessary for him to give a preview with regard to a meeting of the seven most important industrial nations in the world, where not only economic but also political problems will be discussed. Safeguarding peace is the world in a contribution to overcoming the problems weighing on our nation. One must, therefore, talk about the forthcoming NATO ministerial meeting in Ankara where prerequisites for our security and our defense will be discussed together with disarmament and arms control policy.

Ladies and gentlemen, none of the goals set for us, the Federal Republic of Germany, can be achieved by us alone. Our affiliation with the European Community and the Western defense alliance is required for any realistic policy of detente and conciliation of interests; it is required for our security.

Without the European Community, without the Western alliance, without German-American friendship there would be no balance in Europe either politically or militarily, and without this balance in turn there would be no detente or security either.

In this connection we must keep in mind, and this needs to be said on 17 June, that all progress in divided Germany has been possible and will be possible only together with our partners and allies. [applause]

Ladies and gentlemen, it was a few days ago, in May of this year, that we observed the 25th anniversary of the enactment of the treaty on Germany. In this treaty the three powers--the United States, France and the United Kingdom--identify themselves with the objectives of our policy on Germany and set forth their responsibilities. Many documents of the Alliance in the subsequent period have supported this very task.

Being aware of this inclusion of our national goals in the policy of our partners in the European Community and in the Western Alliance, we will have to decide what steps we propose to take in the future in the divided country. On a day like 17 June, ladies and gentlemen, we must answer the question of whether detente policy as initiated during the past decade was a correct decision or not. Today, looking back on more than a decade of social-liberal detente policy, we can say that we answer this question in the affirmative without any reservations. [applause]

Detente policy has made an essential contribution toward mitigating the causes of conflict in Europe, toward localizing conflicts and also toward strengthening East-West contacts. The treaty policy of the Federal Republic of Germany, the Quadripartite Agreement on Berlin, the Helsinki Final Act, the basic treaty which today should actually be a central topic for our country, what with its options, are visible proof of the fact, after all, that important and durable results have been achieved in this respect. [applause]

Ladies and gentlemen, we also know that nowhere in the world will any conflict be brought closer to solution if we on our part maliciously start up a cold war again here in Europe. [shouts, applause] Anyone who approves can make it known here, I am not saying that you want cold war. Still, ladies and gentlemen, Europe and detente policy here on this continent will have a durable basis only if the will for a peaceful conciliation of interests proves its worth in other parts of the world as well. This is what we understand by the significant statement in the German-Soviet declaration of 6 May 1978 which referred to the respect for the indivisibility of peace and security in all parts of the world. This is the introduction of the principle of the indivisibility of detente policy into the East-West relationship. This declaration has a great significance similar to the concept of equal security, to the requirement that nobody should aspire to military superiority. What now matters is that, proceeding from these principles, we endeavor to implement also for other parts of the world what we have accomplished in Europe.

Ladies and gentlemen, if we preserve peace in Europe we also create the preconditions for our contributions toward the peaceful solution of conflicts in other parts of the world. And in this connection it is, after all, absolutely incontestable that to this day the crisis existing worldwide has not had its effect on Central Europe or on the inter-German relationship. This is indeed indicative of the durability of the agreements that have been concluded and does not speak against them. [applause]

Now, if this is true, then this constitutes a demand on those responsible for political action in this country to continue on this course. It is a demand to create new, durable agreements in parts of other fields so that the network will become more tightly knit, preserving a bit of cooperation at least in this small part of the world, in a divided country, even if the weather outside is stormy. [applause]

Treaties and agreements within the framework of detente policy, it turns out in the present periods, are not unilateral advance concessions by one side or the other, but balanced treaties in whose continued existence both sides are interested even in critical times. This is why we must defend with tooth and nail what has been accomplished through detente policy and, for this reason, we intend to do everything to create the preconditions for making further headway.

In this connection we must never forget that no people would suffer more from a relapse into cold war than the German people. Europe, which in the past so often was the starting point and the theater of bloody wars, this Europe must preserve the course here and promote peaceful solutions in other parts of the world through a policy of actively safeguarding peace.

This means for us, first of all, preserving peace and safeguarding all that has been achieved to date for the cohesion of the nation. This means, ladies and gentlemen, that we make our contribution in the Western alliance toward the security of Europe, toward the security of the member states of this alliance, that jointly with out Alliance partners and with our partners in the European Community we do everything in our power to overcome conflicts in other parts of the world as well.

Esteemed ladies and gentlemen, this is why this meeting of the European Council, concluded in Venice a few days ago, was so highly significant. This European Council dealt with the difficult problem for international security and for detente policy resulting from the Soviet intervention in Afghanistan. The statement of the European Council has taken note of the intensified military operations of the Soviet troops in Afghanistan. These dramatic events ever increase the suffering of the Afghan populace. They stress the truly national character of the resistance of an entire nation. They threaten to endanger the climate of international relations in the long run.

But the European Council did not limit its activity to issuing a statement, to criticizing and complaining. The Council much rather stressed once again its ideas that we should cooperate with regard to an independent and nonaligned status for Afghanistan. It is even more important that the European Council has backed the conclusions made by the foreign ministers' conference of the Islamic states. They want to act for a withdrawal of Soviet troops in accordance with our aims and in accordance with the aims of 104 states in the United Nations.

Ladies and gentlemen, from the very beginning the Federal Government has upheld the position in the Bundestag that we may not intentionally make the Soviet intervention in Afghanistan just a West-East problem. We must much rather recognize the grave East-South character of this conflict. The nonaligned states, the Islamic states, are trying by making an active contribution to safeguarding peace to overcome this grave crisis. They are worthy of our support, and the more this is discussed here in the Bundestag, the greater will be the weight carried by the support of the Federal Government in favor of peacefully overcoming the grave international crisis. [applause]

Ladies and gentlemen, since the European Council is making its contribution here with an active political decision, and because it wants to make this contribution also in the future with regard to overcoming the crisis which weighs all of us down, a crisis emanating from Afghanistan, I find that it is not justified to charge that the European Community is unable to act.

Ladies and gentlemen, what in this world is free of problems? But despite the problems we have in the European Community we will not forget that this European Community has become more and more an instrument of joint foreign policy action by all the European partner states. [applause]

This is something we as Germans must state over and over again in a special way, because how should we have implemented our efforts aimed at detente, at improving the situation in Germany, if we could not trust in every phase to the agreement of the European states regarding the necessity of pursuing the course and the aims of our policy of detente and conciliation of interests. Thus we did not have to take steps alone and in isolation. We could take these steps within the framework of the European Community, within the framework of the Western defense alliance, thus being certain of the support of the United States.

Esteemed ladies and gentlemen, the same applies to the efforts of the European Council to make a contribution toward solving the grave crisis in the Middle East. The Middle East is not a distant region for us Europeans. The Middle East is a neighboring area, and one can say with good reason that peace in the Middle East is also our peace.

As Germans our relations with Israel will always be of special importance in all discussions on solving Middle Eastern problem. In connection with our responsibility for safeguarding peace everywhere in the world, we have made suggestions together with our European partners in the final communique of the European Council that we believe will bring into accord the right of Israel to exist within secure borders along with the fulfillment of the Palestinian people's right to self-determination.

Colleague Kohl has asked the Federal Government here how the sentence about international guarantees should be understood. He asked in this connection whether the Federal Government intends to appoint German soldiers to safeguard peace in the Middle East. This question can and must be fully answered with a no. This is not our intention. [shouts]

I would first like to have the official translation of the document, Colleague Kohl, because it differs somewhat from the quotation you have obviously taken from a tentative translation: The Nine state their preparedness to take part in the framework of a far-reaching settlement in a concrete and binding system of international guarantees, including those on the spot [an ort und stelle].

Ladies and gentlemen, these international guarantees are not inventions of the last session of the European Council. These international guarantees can be found much rather in Resolution 242 of the UN Security Council. It is quite obvious that the Federal Republic of Germany not only at present but also in the past has taken part in a number of UN actions aimed at safeguarding peace. This did not mean that German soldiers would be appointed to act on the spot, it meant that we have facilitated with financial means, for example, in difficult crisis zones of this world the taking of measures aimed at safeguarding peace--control measures, measures aimed at creating confidence. That was not only our right, it was our duty. And we must also fulfill that duty in the Middle East. [applause]

[Genscher] Yes.

[Kohl] Mr Federal Foreign Minister, the sentence reads: The Nine state that they are prepared, within the framework of a far-reaching solution, to take part in a system of concrete and binding international guarantees, including such guarantees on the ground--you interpret it as saying "on the spot." I fail to see the difference. My first question is: Don't you think it would have made sense if the government chief in his government statement on this matter had interpreted that somewhat unusual suggestion? Second, Mr Federal Foreign Minister, why did you as one of the Nine make that statement--I agree with the statement very much otherwise--if you now dissociate yourself from the statement you made there? I do not understand that. [applause]

[Genscher] Esteemed ladies and gentlemen, it is hard to understand how somebody would be dissociating himself from this statement if he outlines various possibilities regarding taking part in actions aimed at safeguarding peace--in this case in international guarantees. I want to say again: As a member of the United Nations we have made financial contributions and assisted in other ways on a number of UN measures aimed at safeguarding peace without a German soldier ever having to appear in such a region. It will remain like that in the future as well. [applause]

Ladies and gentlemen, I cannot rule out, however, that there may be individual states among the Nine which, because of their completely different international position, might be prepared to take part in such actions with soldiers.

It was during the first discussion here in the Bundestag after the Afghanistan crisis that we, under the aspect of the division of labor in the Alliance, talked about the sundry options states of the Western alliance had. And here, with respect to a statement by the European Council, an explanation by the chancellor was really not required. It would have been required if such a statement had been issued by the Western alliance. But, ladies and gentlemen, the European Community is not a defense alliance, it is not a military alliance but a political and economic community. When it acts as a whole it always acts only politically and economically. [applause]

Esteemed ladies and gentlemen, [Bundestag president interrupts] Will you permit another question from Deputy Dr Kohl?

[Genscher] Go ahead please.

[Kohl] Mr Federal Foreign Minister, if it is true that the Nine are not competent, as you have said, why did they put it in? [laughter, applause]

[Genscher] Colleague Kohl, I think that all those who listened to me failed to hear the phrase about not being competent. But possibly your misunderstanding and error is based on the fact that whenever you talk of security you can only think in military categories and not in political and economic categories. [commotion, applause]

Esteemed ladies and gentlemen, if we wish to make our contribution toward solving hotbeds of conflict in this world in the awareness that peace in Europe is indivisible and in the awareness that peace in the world is indivisible and that, therefore, detente policy is indivisible as well, then we also make a contribution toward establishing conditions of peace in Europe in which we hope to some day exercise our right to self-determination as Germans in toto. For this reason, all aspects of international policy for safeguarding peace constitute a topic for 17 June and for a debate on the options of our policy for the solution of the German problem and for the mitigation of misery during partition.

Such a reflection should also include our chance, as Germans, to contribute toward a stabilization in the Third World beyond the topical hotbeds of crisis--the Middle East, Iran, Afghanistan, southern Africa. The West would make a mistake if it replied to a Soviet policy aimed at expanding power with a policy constituting a reflection of the same. No, the Western democracies should be partners in the Third World for a policy of independence and sovereignty for the states of the Third World. We should contribute toward the political stability in these states through economic and social development. We should give them an opportunity to realize their own identities. The better they are enabled to do just that the more immune they will grow to concepts and political efforts which seek to create new kinds of dependencies.

For this reason our policy toward the Third World not only is a policy of moral responsibility but also a worldwide peace policy, a worldwide policy of safeguarding peace. Hence, we as Western states must see all the more strongly the role of the nonaligned movement which, having overcome the colonial phase, is coming to realize more and more that the maintenance and security of their independence is of essential significance for world peace.

Somebody shouted Fidel Castro here. Well, ladies and gentlemen, I would have wished that all of us had much more strongly emphasized the role which the late Yugoslav President Tito played at the last summit conference of the nonaligned countries in Havana when he defended for the nonaligned countries the independent character of this movement against forces which want to make the movement a natural partner of the Soviet Union. [applause]

But we can be a credible partner for these countries only if we do not immediately suspect as a fellow traveler with the Soviet Union and the other communist countries anyone who does not directly and loudly avow our social and political ideas. [applause]

All I can say is that I wish we could also finally achieve a conformity of views about our policy toward the Third World here in the Bundestag. When the Federal Government is accused of supporting pro-Soviet terrorist liberation movements throughout the world, and when criticism is voiced that the Foreign Ministry received the secretary general of the ANC, [African National Congress] a liberation movement in South Africa which is termed here a communist terror organization, of course, then I must say, ladies and gentlemen, that we have heard the same designations given to Robert Mugabe who today is the freely elected prime minister of Zimbabwe and with whose country we seek good, reasonable, and peace-ensuring relations. [applause]

Sometimes I have the feeling that bias on the part of the West, the rejection of people seeking a new orientation, contributes more to the shift of movements in the Third World toward the Soviet Union than the original will of these forces which fight for and advocate their national independence. [applause]

Thus, ladies and gentlemen, it is necessary for us to act in close harmony and concert with our partners in the European Community and in the Western defense alliance in all fields of our policy--in detente policy, in security policy and in our policy toward the Third World. It will also be in this close harmony and the awareness of the decisions jointly made that we while in Moscow will seek to utilize the options, also in a difficult international situation, to make our contribution to the safeguarding of peace, and thus also seek to utilize the options for new, constructive steps in the German problem and between the two German states.

And because this Federal Republic of Germany has supported all important decisions of the Western defense alliance from the very day of its accession up to the most recent period--let me just refer to the dual decision on closing the arms gap and extending an offer of negotiations--and because this is so, nobody in our country and elsewhere need worry that the chancellor and I will not advocate these positions of the Alliance with clarity and firmness. Ladies and gentlemen, it is necessary, however, to urge in talks with the other side the opening of negotiations on the medium-range weapons at long last, lest the world be plunged into another arms race. In this respect we continue to advocate the view that person-to-person talks are better and more effective than mere statements via television, radio and newspapers, ladies and gentlemen. [applause]

[Bundestag president] Will you permit a question?

[Genscher] Why, of course; gladly.

[CDU Deputy Woerner] Mr Minister, does your pledge mean that in your Moscow talks you will in no form--I repeat, in no form--accept the ideas of the Soviet Union regarding the consolidation of the nuclear and conventional imbalance in Europe?

[Genscher] Yes. Ladies and gentlemen, the safeguarding of peace in Europe and the world means that on the basis of the Western alliance and the European Community we make efforts for further steps in detente, we make efforts to achieve progress in arms control and disarmament. This applies not only to the field of medium-range weapons; it equally applies to the preparation of the Madrid CSCE followup conference, it applies to the necessity of convoking a European disarmament confidence-building measures in all of Europe--meaning to the Urals--beyond the scope of the measures agreed upon, because distrust in the enemy of all understanding.

Therefore, the building of confidence through concrete measures is a decisive step toward reducing such distrust. [unintelligible comment from the floor]

My God, Colleague Damm, in my policy I have always aimed to try and carry out the ideas we consider correct, and I am fully aware of the fact that I need the other side. But I am not prepared to remain inactive and passive in the expectation that the other side will reject a proposal. That would be the end of every foreign policy. [applause] We hold the view that we must make every effort, that we can make progress also in this field.

So these matters are interdependent: efforts for new and further accords between the FRG and the GDR; efforts for the continuation of the CSCE process; efforts for arms control and disarmament; our determination to safeguard the balance in the field of defense through necessary measures and not to accept superiority of the other side, and, with the awareness of the indivisibility of detente policy, our will to contribute to overcoming hotbeds of crisis in other parts of the world. All these are contributions toward preserving and safeguarding peace in Europe. They are steps toward a state of peace in Europe through which we want and wish to give our people the possibility of deciding in free self-determination on their unity and their fate as a nation.

All this should be discussed and must be discussed on 17 June. Here the government and Bundestag parties have to expound their goals and their contributions toward achieving the common goal of this state of peace in Europe. Here we have to answer the questions asked by Germans in the FRG and the GDR, questions about safeguarding peace, overcoming the division and about concrete steps to bring people more closely together as long as the division cannot be overcome. If we give concrete answers to these questions, if we confirm the conviction of our citizens here and in the GDR that we are doing everything in our power to come closer to these goals, we fulfill the obligation assigned to us by those who on 17 June 1953 rose up for freedom and unity. Thank you. [applause]

DER SPIEGEL SEES TRADE WITH GDR AS DEVELOPING BRISKLY

DW180858 Hamburg DER SPIEGEL in German 16 Jun 80 pp 55-58

[Text] Inter-German trade is developing better than ever before--on both sides.

When business was growing worse and worse last year and debts increased, the East German trade experts recalled a good old capitalist custom: They spent more money on advertising. The GDR presented itself in FRG newspapers as a "strong and reliable trade partner." Full-page advertisements said that peace and trade belong together; "They are one and flourish best in a climate of mutual trust and security."

But business flourished probably only as peace became less safe: Inter-German trade has been flourishing to the satisfaction of both sides since the beginning of 1980.

During the first 4 months the inter-German trade increased by almost DM1 billion to a total of DM3.5 billion in comparison to the same period of the preceding year. The Federal Republic increased its deliveries to the East by roughly 1/3, while the GDR raised its Western sales by nearly ½.

By way of explaining the boom which so suddenly came along with the crisis, the experts peddle political run of the mill wisdom. The GDR, says Klaus Bolz, the expert on trade with the East in the HWWA (Institute for Economic Research in Hamburg), after Afghanistan "has been demonstratively intent on a good climate with the Federal Republic."

"Now they are pushing anything that can be pushed," said Bolz, even if "will and capability are still far apart."

Not once in the past decade have the East Berlin foreign exchanges succeeded in selling as much in the West as they bought there.

By the end of 1979 the "cumulative passive balance for the GDR," as experts paraphrase the accumulated deficits, finally went up to DM3.9 billion.

Horst Lambrecht of the German Institute for Economic Research in Berlin primarily held "the discrimination against goods from the East" responsible for "this problem of latent deficits." Some GDR products continue to be hard to sell in the West.

This may be due to their quality but is, above all, attributable to the type of goods the GDR can deliver. During the first quarter of 1980 the following goods, among others, were shipped to the Federal Republic: 3,855 coal stoves, 8,358 doll buggies, 65,360 shovels, 113,200 shaving brushes and 481,709 rolls of wallpaper.

These are predominantly plain articles whose origin is hard to determine. "Often they smell funny," a department store buyer claims. "If they were to bear the seal 'made in the GDR' to boot, I might as well send half the shipment back again."

The trade is being slowed down on the West German side: The import of many goods has been limited by quantity and value for the protection of agriculture, the steel industry and the textile industry.

Consequently, the GDR has only one field left in which it can considerably step up its exports to the West: Basic materials such as wood, rock, metals or chemical products are in demand in the West. As a result, these products account for more than 50 percent of all the goods delivered.

Foreign trade strategists in East Berlin have now discovered their best source of income in this sector: They deliver oil products even though their republic has no real surplus of it.

In 1980 some 2.5 million tons of gasoline, diesel fuel and fuel oil will flow from the GDR to the West, mostly to West Berlin. Every other West Berliner refuels his automobile with Eastern gasoline or feeds his furnace with Eastern oil.

However, this business cannot be done totally without fraternal aid. Of the crude oil refined in the GDR, 50 percent is supplied by the Federal Republic from its imports; the other 50 percent is supplied by the Soviet Union.

Franz Roesch, the head of the supervisory agency for interzonal trade, is satisfied with the miraculous oil increase: "We deliver 1 ton and receive 2 in return--this happens nowhere else in the world."

The result is that since the delivery quantities as well as the world market prices for oil products are heavily increasing, the GDR scores tangible gains.

The oil business, showing a surplus of more than 100 percent, is proceeding so well at the moment that the GDR has reversed the trend in inter-German trade: For the first time since 1968 it has succeeded in scoring a surplus this year.

This amounted to as much as DM204 million during the first 4 months of the year. Council of State Chairman Erich Honecker welcomed the success with subdued pride. "Small, but nice."

TERRORIST ORGANIZATION DECLARES DISSOLUTION, JOINS RAF

DW131458 Frankfurt FRANKFURTER RUNDSCHAU in German 11 Jun 80 p 4

[Anonymous letter to FRANKFURTER RUNDSCHAU by the "2 June Movement"]

[Text] After 10 years of armed struggle we want to critically review our history and explain why today we are saying: We dissolve the 2 June Movement as an organization and continue the anti-imperialist struggle in the RAF [Red Army Faction] as part of the RAF. The 2 June Movement was founded in opposition to the RAF with the unclear mission of making "spontaneous proletarian policy." We deemed revolutionary theory to be unimportant--from which only the strategy and tactics, the continuity and the prospects of the struggle can be developed--and "fought on" with the goal of inspiring young people. Thus our methods were determined by the question of what inspires people and not by the question of where the real conflicts and frictions in the imperialist strategy lie, which we must attack.

The movement was a putative alternative to the RAF as an option for those comrades who felt the uncompromising struggle was going too far.

For 10 years this produced splits, competition and disorientation among the leftists and among the guerrillas and also impeded our own revolutionary process. Consequently, we operated along a populistic line in our actions without providing political orientation, without creating a mobilization against the strategy of the pigs.

The task of the guerrilla is to never yield to the people in order to obtain their acclamation, but--in a country in which Nazi fascism and the Social Democracy, which is wrapped up by U.S. imperialism, have deprived the working class of any proletarian organization--to be the foremost front, and to escalate the central political contradictions by means of armed attack so as to drive the state into political crisis.

What the guerrilla can be in the metropolis is this: the political explosive in the imperialist structure and the attack which develops the rift between state and society into disruption--meaning developing revolutionary policy--by means of mobilization which becomes proletarian, anti-imperialist organization and a shift of the political power ratio to our advantage.

Political attack, brought about by the weapon, always remains a victory even where the operation is militarily defeated, because it anticipates and initiates this process. The continuity of the guerrilla is to be found in his strategy, despite serious military defeats. This also constitutes the difference between Schleyer and Lorenz. Today we may safely criticize our most important action. It reflects all the mistakes which we have made in 10 years and from which we have learned our lesson.

The '75 liberation action in Berlin took place in a politically aggravated situation. The struggle of the Stammheim comrades had created a national and international mobilization which had been brought to a climax by the HS [expansion unknown, possibly meaning "hochschulstreik", the lecture boycott at FRG universities]--and which Schmidt could hardly digest. We not only completely ignored this situation, but also politically fouled it up by our choice of prisoners.

The calculation, instead of a strategy, consisted of this and the method--of a party that is only of secondary importance to the imperialist strategy. [sentence as published] In our propagandistic work and after PL [expansion unknown, possibly Peter Lorenz kidnapping]--the achievement of our short-term victory--the consummable ritual--was more important to us than achieving a political-military level that would break imperialist strategy. In this one can also find the root of the perverted fun guerrilla actions [spassguerilla] of Reinders, Teufel and so on. The offensive of RAF 77 and the reaction of the state eventually made us face the problem of political strategy again.

RAF 77 is of decisive importance for developing a strategy regarding imperialists as well as for determining the aims of metropolitan guerrillas. Since the massacres in Mogadishu and Stammheim, Schmidt has set the following political target for Western Europe, with the leading role being played by the FRG:

To be a project and model of imperialism in the crisis of liberation struggles in the Third World and in the metropolis--Western Europe. The unconditional inclusion of Western Europe in U.S. military strategy and the inner militarization of metropolitan states via a tendentiously uniform apparatus is the reaction of the imperialists to the increasing simultaneousness of worldwide revolutionary struggles.

Revolutionary strategy is becoming internationalized, with the anti-imperialist groups recognizing the United States and the Western European project as the main enemy. The United States and its accomplices know that their next strategic defeat in some region of the world will bring them to the track of final defeat.

The "post-Vietnam era"--the attempt to formulate a political-economic strategy from a defensive posture which was a result of the political-military defeat of U.S. imperialism in Vietnam--has collapsed following the chain of events leading from Angola to Kampuchea. Imperialist policy is looking now for a military solution it cannot achieve, thus coming to the bare conception of its contents in preparation for total annihilation. The new and then probably last strategic-military defeat in the Third World is supposed to be prevented by unleashing a war in Europe, which is from the very beginning planned to be a nuclear war. The theory of "limited war" in this perversion receives a new variant.

The war preparations do not plan for a division of the world among the contracting imperialist parties. It includes a revolution or counterrevolution--and thus the confrontation phase in which the decisions will be made.

This decision in the international confrontation will eventually take place in the metropolises, because the victorious Third World liberation movements which have formed states must necessarily consolidate within the East-West antagonism as long as the imperialist headquarters can blackmail them militarily and via their dependence on the world market.

It is the contents of the entire world revolutionary process--destruction of the state, self-determination, identity--which have achieved their special ripeness and explosiveness during the past years of fighting in the metropolises for communism; they will materialize now or never.

This is the question to be put to the entire left in Western Europe, namely, whether, in this escalated situation in which a decision will be made one way or another, it will live up to its historical task or betray it.

Unity in the anti-imperialist armed fight. 2 June 1980.

For the last time: 2 June Movement.

LIBERIA NOT EXPECTED TO CONFIRM REQUEST FOR ENVOY RECALL

AB171611 Paris AFP in French 1443 GMT 17 Jun 80

[Excerpt] It was confirmed by official sources in Paris on Tuesday that France has not received written notice from the Liberian authorities demanding the recall of the French ambassador in Monrovia, Mr Louis Dollot.

The French Government also considers that it is likely that the meetings between France and Liberia will resume in a more serene atmosphere and that the demand for the recall of the ambassador will not be confirmed.

The Liberian minister of foreign affairs announced Sunday evening in a televised speech that the French Government had been asked to withdraw its ambassador because the French Embassy had sheltered the son of ex-President Tolbert, Mr Adolphus Tolbert, who sought refuge there 3 days after the coup d'etat in April during which his father was killed.

MARCHAIS OPPOSES EEC ENLARGEMENT, HITS GISCARD 'BLUFF'

LD171245 Paris L'HUMANITE in French 10 Jun 80 p 1

[Georges Marchais article: "We Must Say 'No'"]

[Text] Last Thursday Mr Giscard d'Estaing stated that he would like to see a "pause" observed in negotiations over the enlargement of the Common Market with a view to including Greece, Spain and Portugal. This immediately created a big stir in the politicians' small world. An "upheaval," a "volte-face" and an "agonizing reappraisal" of the president's position have been mentioned.

What are the facts?

Is it a question of stopping any preparations for the enlargement of the Community? Have any concrete decisions been made to stop it or at least slow it down? Absolutely not.

Greece's membership, which Mr Giscard d'Estaing personally supported by visiting Athens last year, will become effective as early as July. No time was lost in official circles in confirming that the president's statements would in no way alter this timetable.

As for Spain and Portugal, the date for their joining the Common Market has not yet been officially determined. In any case, this will not occur for several years. Talking in these conditions of a "pause" or "time lag" is merely an attempt to present as a political decision something which is only a continuation of efforts to enlarge the Common Market which, in any case, is to be enlarged only in the medium term, that is, after the presidential election.

All these factors reduce Mr Giscard d'Estaing's resounding statement to its true proportions--it is merely a piece of bluff.

In any case, if this remained to be proved it would be sufficient to study the reactions which these statements have aroused among advocates of an enlarged Europe.

Jacques Chirac's Rally for the Republic [RPR], which had been calling for "Greece's, Spain's and Portugal's immediate acceptance as members of the European Council," has now expressed its satisfaction at the president's "clearsightedness." [paragraph continues]

The Socialist Party, whose First Secretary Francois Mitterrand asserted that "the Socialist Party intends and is determined to contribute toward the enlargement of the EEC," is pleased with the "caution" which Mr Giscard d'Estaing has "at last" shown. As for the ultra-Europeans, Bonn's and Washington's fanatical supporters--that is, Lecanuet's "centrists"--they have maintained an Olympian calm. During a meeting which they held last Saturday they called in question "neither their membership of the majority nor their support for Mr Giscard d'Estaing," quite simply because they know that the president's speeches are one thing and his political practices are something else.

They have especially good reasons for trusting him because, by signing an act of unconditional surrender to Mrs Thatcher a few days before he made his statements, Mr Giscard d'Estaing clearly showed his real intentions and made clear his real policy: sacrificing France's interests on the altar of European integration as he has always done since the beginning of his 7-year term of office.

Therefore, the president's initiative must be exposed--it is a political operation aimed at catching votes and hoodwinking the French people once again. Mr Giscard d'Estaing has realized that the tireless efforts made by our party--the only party as such to make such efforts--to throw light on the immense dangers inherent in an enlargement have now borne fruit. At a time when the Common Market is creating an increasingly disastrous situation, many French people say that our country and our economy would have not found themselves in this kind of situation if the Commonists had been heeded either when the EEC was being created or when it was enlarged to include Britain. Mr Giscard d'Estaing is aware of all this. The only aim of his little maneuver is to try to defuse the worker and peasant world's growing protest while preserving his electoral position as far as possible. However, the intention sticks out like a sore thumb, as they say.

The French people have had their fill of promises, solemn undertakings, delays and warnings not only on Mr Giscard d'Estaing's part. And when it is a question of a problem as grave and as fraught with consequences as that of the enlargement of the Common Market there can be no "yes, if...," "yes, but...," or "yes, later...." It must be "no."

We must say "no!" because the aim of this plan is to reduce the French workers' purchasing power even further by aligning it with that of the people of candidate countries.

We must say "no!" because the plan's aim is to transfer more capital abroad and make new cuts in agricultural and industrial production.

We must say "no!" because it is a question of sacrificing hundreds of thousands of jobs in industry and tens of thousands of farms and destroying whole regions of our country.

This is our party's firm and unambiguous attitude. In a way, this Giscardian venture has revealed the growing scale of the people's opposition to our country's integration in an enlarged Europe. The Communists can only find in it additional reasons for continuing and intensifying their struggle for a definitive rejection of this plan. As for the workers and peasants who are firmly opposed to an enlargements of the EEC to include Greece, Portugal and Spain, they have no choice--they must resolutely support the PCF's action.

L'HUMANITE: EC MIDEAST INITIATIVE 'DISAPPOINTING'

[Yves Moreau commentary: "Abortive Initiative"]

[Text] After all the uproar in recent weeks about a possible "European initiative" for a Near East peace settlement, the statement adopted by the Venice summit seems extraordinarily disappointing.

In fact this document merely restates the principles accepted by everyone apart from the present Israeli Government--the right to exist and to security of all states in the region, justice for all the peoples and therefore for the Palestinian people's self-determination.

We learn that in Venice the Nine discussed whether the PLO should be participants in negotiations for a settlement. In fact all they granted was that the PLO should be "associated" with them, which is the very least they could say, since on 25 September 1979 a speech delivered on the Nine's behalf to the UN General Assembly specifically recognized the PLO as one of the parties concerned in a peaceful settlement.

The Venice summit declined to specify that the Palestinians have the right to build their own independent national state.

In this connection the Venice statement backtracks on the statement issued by the European Council on 29 June 1977 and also the recommendation adopted in Paris on 3 June this year by the Assembly of the Western European Union, which voiced the need to "guarantee the Palestinians their inalienable right to self-determination on the West Bank and Gaza to establish their own homeland there."

Finally and above all, not only did the European summit fail to take absolutely any initiative but it did no more than conditionally refer to the possibility of one, subordinating it to "contacts" aimed at "securing information" (sic) with a view to be in a position eventually "to determine the form" of action that might be envisaged.

The explanation is obvious. Before lifting a finger Giscard d'Estaing, it will be remembered, sent his foreign minister to Washington to seek the U.S. administration's approval. The latter's reply was a brusque and public veto from Mr Carter. The Common Market countries bowed their heads and so too did Giscard d'Estaing.

The lamentable spectacle which they have just provided in Venice emphasizes the heavy pressures which govern French diplomacy, thanks to Giscard's form of government.

U.S. pressures: Why seek prior U.S. approval?

European pressures: Thanks to an excessive desire that Europe speak "with a single voice," it has been condemned to silence.

In the name of the mythical "independent Europe," Mr Carter's injunctions have been obeyed and Carter now openly congratulates himself on having managed to prevent Europe from acting.

However praiseworthy and legitimate the quest for other countries' agreement with French initiatives, it is equally damaging to make our diplomats' decisions dependent on such agreement and such authorization. It implies diminishing France's freedom of action. [paragraph continues]

It means preventing it from performing the major world role that it should perform.

Thus the much-discussed Near East initiative has remained in the realm of vague hopes. In any case it has been extremely vague from the outset. So much so that yesterday Mr Cossiga did not hesitate to describe it at a press conference as a "parallel" effort to the Camp David agreement, that is as an effort that turns its back on a global peace settlement.

Following the Venice summit specific and independent initiatives are still needed to extinguish the flames of war in the Near East and to make the national rights and security of all peoples of the region prevail. But undoubtedly it is essential that public pressure on the Giscard government increase to make it turn vague aspirations into an independent determination.

ITINERARY, SECURITY PLANS FINALIZED FOR CARTER VISIT

[Text] Rome, June 17 (ANSA)--The final touches are being put on tight security measures and the general organization of the itinerary for the visit to Italy of United States President Jimmy Carter, scheduled to arrive in Rome Thursday evening accompanied by his wife and a large government delegation. During their visit to Rome, until the weekend, America's first couple will stay in the Quirinale Presidential Palace. The president will confer with Italian head of state Sandro Pertini and Premier Francesco Cossiga, who will be accompanied by Foreign Minister Emilio Colombo.

On Saturday, Carter will be received in the Vatican by Pope John Paul II in private audience and in the afternoon the chief executive and his delegation will travel on to Venice for the Sunday and Monday economic summit of the heads of state and government from the world's seven most industrialized nations. The Italian weekly, IL MONDO, is scheduled to publish in its next issue a draft of the Venice summit final document which contains an agreement on cutting back the seven's dependence on petroleum for their overall energy requirements from 53 percent to 40 percent. According to the IL MONDO account, the heads of state and government from the United States, Canada, Japan, Great Britain, West Germany, France and Italy will also discuss a compromise proposal for earmarking International Monetary Fund resources for affecting "structural adjustments" in those countries reporting heavy balance of payments deficits.

PSI OFFICIALS COMMENT ON REGIONAL ELECTION RESULTS

LD171013 Rome AVANTI in Italian 11 Jun 80 pp 1, 7

[Unattributed report: "Results Confirm Italian Socialist Party's (PSI) Policy"]

[Text] PSI Secretary Comrade Craxi has released the following statement on the election results:

"The strong Socialist success in the regional elections is confirmed by an equally significant success in the municipal and provincial elections. The PSI lists have achieved significant successes everywhere--in the north, center and south of the country.

"Our votes, our seats and our political influence have increased. We are advancing and gaining seats in the major cities and in several provinces we have gained quite extraordinary results in many smaller municipalities.

"The Socialist administrators' contribution to public life and good government by the local administrations has been judged very positively by the voters. Our general line of conduct, its clearly socialist and independent inspiration and its sense of responsibility to the institutions and requirements of democratic life and of the labor world have secured the electoral confirmation which they needed.

"In southern Italy, the Socialist Party has gained very significant results which were echoed in the north by the great victory of the Milan comrades, who have restored greater representative strength to one of Italian socialism's most noble traditions."

Comments and statements have been released by several other representatives of our party.

Comrade Mancini has said: "The election results indicate a general success for the Socialist Party which, in the south, especially in Calabria, gains a significant dimension from both the numerical and the political viewpoint. In Calabria the PSI's results are clearly and definitely above the national average. The Socialists' election campaign was based on a policy of vigorous polemics with respect to the Christian Democratic Party [DC], on a strong commitment to the south, on an attempt to surmount the causes of conflict within the left and, therefore, on the defense of the leftwing councils, and on a challenge to DC hegemony. The Socialists' success in Calabria and more generally in the south does not provide a pointer in the direction of immobility and conservation, still less in the direction of accepting recent government actions or shelving the disturbing issues raised a few days before the elections. Within the government the Socialist component has been strengthened and is thus authorized to undertake the correction of erroneous actions and to urge political and program interventions which reflect the needs and problems for which they party is spokesman.

"The PSI must take into account the dynamic components which contribute to its major success and must also bear in mind that its success reflects--in contrast to some current interpretations--a major demand for change and regeneration. The PSI's success must not be swallowed up by the thesis of those who maintain that nothing must change on the political level."

Scientific Research Minister Vincenzo Balzamo has released a comment on the election results for CRITICA SOCIALE in which he says that "the first political consideration that emerges from these results is that the voters took up the appeal which the PSI made during the election campaign for a vote aimed in the direction of the country's stability and governability.

"If, therefore," Balzamo continues, "as the Communists and oppositionists wanted, the election results were to be interpreted as a referendum for or against the government, we would have to deduce that a strengthened government emerges from the election test and it can now apply itself more calmly to continuing the work that it has undertaken." Having replied to the verdict of some Communist leaders that there has been a rightwing shift to the political axis, Balzamo concludes by stressing that the PSI's increased strength "should not be kept in cold storage but used to guarantee the governability of municipalities, provinces and regions on the basis of programs and commitments reflecting the citizens' real needs."

The fidelity to the commitments made by the PSI during the election campaign was also confirmed by party Directorate member Comrade Claudio Martelli in a statement to Television Newsreel 1. He spoke of the "not automatic extension of the national formula to the periphery" and of the "preference shown for bringing back leftwing administrations where they have worked well--and," he added,"this applies to the majority of cases." "We must," he said,"eliminate the factious approach to the election campaign with respect to both the PSI and the other secular forces."

Directorate press and propaganda section chief Comrade Francesco Tempestini said in an interview granted to Television Newsreel 2 that "it is opportune to proceed from assessments made during the election campaign--a positive verdict on the work of councils including the PSI and the objective confirmation of a political will aimed at confirming the commitment made during the previous legislature. In some cases, however, there is an objective numerical factor which seems difficult to improve upon. The vote consolidates and strengthens the government and the Socialists' experience, but one cannot expect from the PSI any automatic transfers of national formulas to the local level.

Commenting on the election results, PSI Directorate member Comrade Covatta said: "The voters have quite clearly backed the PSI policy line which was offered for their judgement--the defense and development of leftwing councils in local government and commitments against radicalization and for the resumption of democratic solidarity within the national political framework.

"In this way the PSI's autonomous role within the left has been encouraged, while it is entirely unjustified for the DC to appropriate the Socialists' success as if to compensate for the mass consensus for the preamble line which failed to materialize. Following the elections, the government balance can only be consolidated on the PSI's stances, that is, by developing in the most frank and open manner the dialogue among the political forces with a view to solidarity.

"As for the PCI," Covatta continued, "it should correct certain hasty assessments of the alleged rightward shift in the country's political order and take note that its crisis of strategic orientation, due to the exhaustion of the historical compromise strategy, can only be resolved by resuming the dialogue with the PSI."

"The country's governability," [PSI Directorate member] Comrade Capria said, "has emerged strengthened by the elections and the great Socialist success helps to further characterize the present political framework as a balance open to a broader form of convergence on the major problems, in the spirit of national solidarity.

"The plan of those who were making insinuations about the PSI's internal crisis is therefore thwarted. It is now up to those aiming at the country's immediate ungovernability, especially the PCI, to clarify their strategic plan in light of the election results."

"The election results," Comrade Valdo Spini said, "reward the election campaign conducted by the PSI which, despite the harsh attack unleashed by the PCI over the issue of the government, clearly confirmed its stances on the subject of the leftwing councils.

"This factor, together with the PCI's disappointing returns, demonstrates that there is no Communist veto of the Socialist options. This is a very important factor for those who, in the wake of the Turin congress, believe that a strategic plan for an alternative cannot stem from Socialist subordination to the historical compromise policy, but only from a central and decisive role for the PSI in the political alignment."

ADDITIONAL ARREST WARRANT ISSUED FOR YOUNG DONAT-CATTIN

[Text] Florence, June 13 (ANSA)--A third arrest warrant was issued Thursday against Marco Donat-Cattin, 28-year old son of the former deputy secretary of the Christian Democrat Party, Carlo Donat-Cattin. The younger Donat-Cattin, suspected member of the Front Line urban guerrilla organization, is wanted by police in Turin and Milan on charges ranging from homicide to membership in an armed gang.

The Florence arrest warrant, issued also against suspected Front Line members Nicola Solimano and Maurice Bignami, is on charges of armed robbery at the Pisa Savings Bank. Investigations into the Pisa robbery are linked to the attempted assault on Florence's Murate Prison in January 1978 for which ten arrest warrants have already been issued. One was against Nicola Solimano.

UCD SCORES PCE'S STANCE ON NATO APPLICATION

[Text] The statement made by Foreign Minister Marcelino Oreja to EL PAIS, in which he affirms that Spain will join NATO by 1983 and that it will make its application in 1981, has already provoked political reactions both at home and abroad. The first adverse reactions to the government's timetable for joining the Atlantic bloc have come from the PSOE and the PCE, parties which have both declared their indignation at this policy announcement.

Yesterday evening the Union of Democratic Center [UCD] issued a note in which it contests a resolution adopted yesterday by the PCE Central Committee in connection with Minister Oreja's statements, which the Communists yesterday described as "irresponsible". The UCD maintains that these statements were made within the framework of what is permitted by the Constitution and in full accordance with the intentions expressed by the UCD in its election program. By its attitude, which in its reasoning and consequences follows so faithfully the interests of the Soviet Union, the UCD note continues, the PCE is demonstrating once again its scorn for the most elementary democratic norms, and its ardent wish that Spain should not play its part as a member with full rights in the community of free and democratic nations to which the Spanish people belong.

The UCD response points out further that the Communist Party is forgetting the urgent need to overcome the isolation brought on by Francoist foreign policy. It is also forgetting the imbalance in our present relations with the United States and the need to redress this through our presence in NATO. Further still, the UCD note points out that the Communist Party is faithfully repeating Soviet arguments about an alleged disturbance of the balance should we join the Atlantic Alliance and is churning out a whole string of misconceptions which Moscow propaganda has drummed into us in order to dissuade us from an option which would have only favorable effects for the real interests and needs of the Spanish people.

Having said that the PCE is arrogating to itself [word indistinct] the right to describe matters as important or unimportant in an attempt to demand qualified majorities or referenda, thereby distorting the basic rules of democracy, the UCD note concludes: It is fitting and laudable that the government, through its foreign minister, should have raised the subject of NATO in the manner in which it has done so, even if this were only to get the Spanish Communist Party to discard its mask and display its real face of continuing obedience to foreign interests wholly at variance with those of the Spanish people.

Constitutional Issues Involved

[Excerpts] The war between the government party and the opposition groups--basically the Spanish Socialist Workers Party [PSOE]--over the pace and negotiations for our joining the European Community and the confirmation that the Suarez government wants to submit Spain's application for NATO membership next year are injecting more tension than usual into Spain's foreign relations and are having repercussions on the political balance at home. This comes down to battles over questions of principle--membership in NATO--and over questions of form--whether this should be decided by referendum or by a simple majority in the Cortes. Following the meeting of the PCE Central Committee, Simon Sanchez Montero [of the party's Executive Committee] gave us his view of the spirit of the Constitution on such matters:

[Begin Sanchez recording] Article 92-1 of the Constitution says that political decisions of exceptional importance may be put to a consultative referendum of all citizens. When we call for a referendum as the only way of authorizing a decision to be taken, this is in keeping with democracy and in keeping with our Constitution. [end recording]

The counterplay of ideas among the parties goes on, for instance, as Luis Yanez, secretary for foreign relations on the PSOE Federal Executive Committee, says the debate and decision on whether Spain should join NATO cannot be reduced to the parliamentary level and certainly should not be taken on the basis of a simple majority. This is a matter of such importance, Yanez said, that what is needed is a broad national debate followed by a referendum.

MILITARY AGREEMENT WITH ITALY SIGNED

LD171750 Madrid in Spanish to Europe 1130 GMT 17 Jun 80

[Text] An agreement on military industrial cooperation with special emphasis on military electronics was signed yesterday between the Spanish and Italian defense ministers, Rodriguez Sahagun and Lelio Lagorio. At a ceremony at the Ministry of Defense, the two ministers made speeches in which they hailed the importance of this framework agreement, the first of its type between the two countries. Spanish Minister Agustin Rodriguez Sahagun said conditions exist for intensive cooperation with Italy, and that this agreement will make it possible to be more ambitious in the future in the sphere of military industry, especially in the area of joint manufacturing. For his part, Lelio Lagorio spoke of the importance of this agreement in connection with a Spanish-Italian joint effort vis-a-vis third countries.

URUGUAYAN REFUGEES START FAST TO DEMAND AMNESTY

PY170254 Paris AFP in Spanish 2353 GMT 13 Jun 80

[Text] Madrid, 13 June (AFP)--Several dozen Uruguayan refugees who live in Spain today started in Madrid and Barcelona self-isolation and fasting, answering the call issued by the single Uruguayan Workers Union to demand amnesty in Uruguay. It was reported that the call is being obeyed in 29 cities in 19 countries throughout Europe and America. It was further reported that those who have isolated themselves also demand the release of the 30,000 political prisoners in Uruguay, the reappearance of those who are missing, the restoration of political and union freedoms and the return of refugees.

During a press conference in Barcelona, Felix Diaz, leader of the Uruguayan National Workers Convention, expressed his satisfaction with the support he found in Spain for the Uruguayan refugee movement. He stated: "To get rid of the dictatorship we will need three things: the struggle of the people, the unity of all antifascists and international solidarity." Representatives of political parties, unions and cultural sectors signed a declaration in support of the demands of those who are in self-isolation.

NORWAY

HUANG HUA MEETS WITH FRYDENLUND, PARLIAMENTARIANS

LD180921 Oslo AFTENPOSTEN in Norwegian 14 Jun 80 p 8

[Bjarte Botnen report: "Huang Hua: Very Good Relations Between Norway and China"]

[Text] Relations and cooperation between China and Norway have undergone extremely positive developments since Foreign Minister Knut Frydenlund visited China 2 years ago. This was the assertion made by Foreign Minister Huang Hua yesterday morning in his talks with his Norwegian counterpart, and he repeated it when he met with the Storting Foreign Affairs Committee later in the day. The atmosphere during the talks has been most cordial and the first visit by a Chinese foreign minister has been described as a great success.

Foreign Minister Frydenlund opened the meeting yesterday by presenting the Norwegian view of the situation in the Middle East, southern Africa and Southeast Asia. It is safe to assume that the Norwegian decision to reduce development aid to Vietnam by the end of 1981 was received with satisfaction by the Chinese delegation.

Frydenlund also mentioned the Soviet occupation of Afghanistan, which he described as a serious backward step in relations between East and West. Frydenlund made it clear that Norway, together with other Western European nations, is following a dual policy: At the same time that a firm stand against Soviet aggression in Afghanistan has been adopted, efforts are being made to see that the doors to negotiation are left ajar.

Foreign Minister Huang Hua's meeting with Iranian Foreign Minister Sadeq Qotbzadeh was not mentioned, but in the summing-up the hostage crisis in Tehran was mentioned as one of the problems that must now be solved.

To the Storting Foreign Affairs Committee, with whom Huang Hua met after a short conversation with Storting President Guttorm Hansen, the guest from Beijing gave an account of China's foreign policy. Huang Hua placed a considerable part of the responsibility for the deterioration in the international situation on the Soviet Union, but the attacks were not particularly strident, committee Chairman Arvid Johanson told AFTENPOSTEN.

The foreign minister will travel today to Bergen and after a day of rest in Oslo he will travel to Copenhagen on Monday. On 19 June he will begin talks with Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher in Bonn. The announcement of the visit to West Germany was unexpected, and is especially interesting since it takes place barely a fortnight before Federal Chancellor Schmidt travels to Moscow for talks with President Leonid Brezhnev.

SWEDEN

QOTBZADEH CONTINUES MEETINGS WITH LEADERS

Meets Industrialists

LD180915 Stockholm DAGENS NYHETER in Swedish 15 Jun 80 p 5

[Dick Ljungberg report: "Qotbzadeh Praises Swedish Companies; Good Prospects for Increased Trade"]

[Text] "Sweden is not participating in the hostile trade sanctions against Iran and the Swedish companies in Iran have acted honorably during the revolution. [paragraph continues]

"They have not withdrawn their money like other European and American companies. Therefore there are good prospects for increased trade between our countries."

Iranian Foreign Minister Sadeq Qotbzadeh said this at a press conference at Roenneberga Manor on Saturday. At the Iranian ambassador's home, a few kilometers from Roenneberga on Lidingoe, he had met in the morning with representatives of Swedish industry, among them the Johnson Concern (Nynaes) and Volvo.

Before the press conference he had also had a further hour of talks with Olof Palme, his his host.

It became clear that the two discussed the situation of the Kurds in Iran. Outside the police barriers around Roenneberga around 25 Kurdish demonstrators had gathered.

They were proteting against Sweden's warm welcome for Qotbzadeh, which could be interpreted as approval of the massacre of Kurds in Iran.

Qotbzadeh denied that his regime is guilty of massacring Kurds.

In an Italian television interview on Friday evening President Jimmy Carter said that he is not considering any military action against Iran or any new attempt to rescue the hostages.

"This is a welcome statement," Qotbzadeh said. "Now we must wait and see what it means in practice."

"My own personal view is that the question must be solved as soon as possible, but this must be done in an honorable way. You must also take into consideration the fact that Iran has been subject to 25 years of American domination," Qotbzadeh said.

Olof Palme explained that the Swedish Social Democratic Party feels sympathy with the Iranian Revolution because it put an end to the brutal and corrupt regime of the shah.

It also feels sympathy for the Iranian Revolution's attempts to win international understanding for an independent policy.

"But this is not to say that we agree with everything that has happened in Iran. I have said that the holding of hostages is against international law, and it is especially important for small- and medium-sized states that such laws are kept. But the hostages must not be allowed to overshadow the legitimacy of the Iranian Revolution," Palme said. "This is why we must keep a dialogue going and not isolate Iran."

Qotbzadeh and his companions were then taken by police helicopter to Haga Palace for lunch with Foreign Minister Ola Ullsten and, later, talks.

Ullsten stated that Sweden cannot accept the holding of diplomatic personnel as hostages. It is easy to understand the Iranians' feelings against the shah's regime and the U.S. role at that time, but holding hostages goes against international law and jeopardizes world peace.

Ullsten also raised the question of the summary trials and death sentences in Iran, as well as the situation of the Kurds.

Talks With Ullsten

LD180911 Stockholm SVENSKA DAGBLADET in Swedish 15 Jun 80 p 4

[Per Forslind report: "Ullsten Tells Iranian Foreign Minister: 'Hostage Problem Contributes to Worsening World Situation'"]

[Text] And so he came to Stockholm, the Iranian foreign minister, who in the last few days had flown round Europe at full tilt seemingly without a planned itinerary.

He arrived in Haga Park, filled with sunbathers with picnic baskets, by helicopter and disappeared into Haga Palace where Foreign Minister Ola Ullsten was waiting with lunch.

Sadeq Qotbzadeh and the Swedish foreign minister were together for 3 hours. Ullsten, who has been criticized from various quarters in the nonsocialist camp for receiving a government representative of Tehran's revolutionary hierarchy, was careful with his words and reticent when reporting what had been discussed.

The two foreign ministers were able to find a more or less common denominator in their views of what is happening in Afghanistan, but that seems to have been about as far as their agreement went.

Even though the Swedish Government shows sympathy with the Iranian Revolution and the attitude which the Iranians today display towards the United States, it does not accept that human beings should be held hostage.

Ola Ullsten took a firm stand on the view that the taking of hostages cannot be excused. It is clearly a crime against international law and destroys the foundations of diplomatic intercourse. For this reason the hostages must be released.

The hostage problem--like the war in Afghanistan--also contributes to the worsening of the international situation. Sweden also put forward the view that it would like to see the United Nations once again playing a major role in the Iranian conflict with the United States.

The role of the United Nations has been overshadowed during the talks which Qotbzadeh has had in Oslo and Stockholm in the last few days. The Socialist International often voices the view that the world organization has now grown too cumbersome and in addition runs the risk of being paralyzed by veto decisions. Therefore they see the International as a new instrument through which to bring about dialogues in badly deadlocked conflict situations.

At the talks at Haga, Swedish-Iranian trade contacts were also discussed. But rather than discussing future trade, Ola Ullsten seems to have attached greater importance to reminding his Iranian guest that there are a number of Swedish companies that have outstanding claims in Iran and this is a problem that needs a swift solution.

Earlier in the day the Iranian foreign minister met with representatives of Swedish companies active in Iran. Some 18 Swedish industrialists were said to have taken part in these talks, which had been arranged by the Argentinian lawyer Hector Villalon.

The Argentinian seems today to be Iran's chief mediator in international contacts. He has been an important but anonymous link in contacts between the United States and revolutionary Iran. He works quietly in the wings and very little is known about him.

He was also present when the Socialist International held its meeting in Oslo, and there he arranged a lunch for Qotbzadeh with all the ambassadors from Latin America present in the Norwegian capital.

According to Hector Villalon, Iran is interesting in importing Swedish goods throughout the whole of the technical sector.

Swedish businessmen already established in Iran, however, should at present be more interested in information on the prospects of normal conditions returning to Iran so that work can be resumed. Frozen assets were also discussed in this context.

Before Qotbzadeh met with Swedish industrialists he had a lengthy private talk with Olof Palme. The two have already had many opportunities for lengthy talks in private. For this reason it was possible for Palme to give a more detailed description of how Sweden sees the Iranian Revolution.

Olof Palme has a more positive view of what is happening in Iran today than Ola Ullsten. But he too now had the opportunity to offer some criticism. It concerned chiefly the Kurdish question and the persecution of other minorities, and the way in which justice is done in Iran today.

And Qotbzadeh was given a clear reminder of the Kurdish problem when he arrived at and left Roenneberga Manor. Outside the barriers Kurds were demonstrating against the Iranian minister.

Qotbzadeh himself did not seem to be affected to any great extent. At a press conference he accused the Kurdish guerrillas and neighboring Iraq of being responsible for the bloodshed in Kordestan.

PARLIAMENT DECIDES TO PHASE OUT NUCLEAR POWER BY 2010

LD101900 Stockholm Domestic Service in Swedish 1600 GMT 10 Jun 80

[Text] Nuclear power is to be phased out in Sweden by the year 2010 at the latest. This was decided by the Riksdag today in its decision on energy policy. The Riksdag rejected by 307 votes to 20 the proposal of the party of the left (Communists) that reactors Nos 11 and 12 should not be built and that the nuclear powerplant in Barsebaeck be closed. Today's decision therefore means that 12 reactors are to be built and used, but it also means that so-called breeder reactors and small thermal reactors for producing district heating are not to be used in Sweden. The Riksdag rejected a Center Party proposal to oppose the plan to transfer hot water from nuclear powerplants to the district heating networks of big cities. Hot water pipes must be considered, according to the Riksdag decision.

PYM STATEMENT ON STATIONING OF CRUISE MISSILES

[By PA parliamentary staff]

[Text] The 160 cruise missiles to be sited in Britain will be at Greenham Common, the U.S. standby base in Berkshire and at Molesworth, a disused RAF airfield in Cambridgeshire defence secretary, Mr Francis Pym announced today.

In a Commons statement he said Greenham Common would be the main operating base, with six flights of missiles, and there would be four at Moesworth.

But he made it clear that no live missiles or warheads would be carried on exercises and no missile test flying would take place in Britain.

Shadow defence minister, Mr William Rodgers, said there would be natural anxiety about the decision, and urged the government use the period up to 1983--when the first missiles will be deployed--for further arms control negotiations.

Mr Rodgers also wanted assurances on responsibility for the security and control of the missiles.

Mr Pym told him that on security the responsibility would lie with the United States, but when it came to deployment this would require a joint decision by the two governments.

And he said that it was necessary to go into any negotiations from a position of strength, because "there is now one new SS20 with three warheads coming into service (in Russia) every week."

In his statement Mr Pym said factors affecting the decision on deployment stemmed from th. need to bring the first missiles into service as soon as possible.

He pledged: "No live missiles or warheads will be carried on exercises at any time and no missile test-flying will take place in this country."

The missiles would be stored in purpose-built shelters, and "as part of the security arrangements, we shall be contributing 200 British personnel towards the guard forces for the bases and dispersal deployments."

Mr Pym said the total cost to the UK of the whole modernisation programme throughout the Alliance would be about found sterling 16 million.

The 160 cruise missiles to be based in the United Kingdom are an integral part of a programme to deploy 371 U.S. missiles in a number of European countries. Mr Pym said: "The Alliance-wide support for the new system and its widely-spread deployment throughout Europe is a clear expression of the determination of NATO as a whole to preserve its security.

"The Soviet Union has developed a large and expanding capability in long-range theatre nuclear forces which directly threatens the whole of Western Europe.

"In view of the markedly increasing threat we face, the Alliance has decided that it is essential to modernise its own theatre nuclear forces which are ageing and becoming increasingly vulnerable."

Mr Pym added: "The Soviet Union has rejected repeated offers by the United States to negotiate, and has maintained its obviously unacceptable demand that NATO should abandon its modernisation programme as a precondition for negotiation.

"However, we shall continue to try and persuade the Russians to come to the table and play their part in a genuine negotiation."

FOREIGN OFFICE PROTESTS 'HARASSMENT' OF VISITORS TO USSR

LD171241 London PRESS ASSOCIATION in English 1220 GMT 17 Jun 80

[By PA diplomatic correspondent Tom McMullan]

[Text] Soviet Ambassador Mr Nikolay Lunkov was called to the Foreign Office today to be told of Britain's "deep concern" at incidents involving British citizens visiting the Soviet Union, including assault, intimidation and harassment.

Details of at least 10 cases since last November were given to the ambassador. The Foreign Office chose to release details of the meeting only two hours before Foreign Secretary Lord Carrington was making a last-minute appeal to British Olympic officials not to send a team to the Moscow Olympics.

Observers saw this as an attempt to strengthen the pressure on the officials and to warn British citizens about visiting Moscow for the games. But the Foreign Office said: "We are not offering any formal advice to British citizens."

Mr Lunkov saw Foreign Office Minister Mr Peter Blaker, who referred to physical assaults on four British tourists since the beginning of this year. Mr Blaker said the incidents took place "in circumstances which suggested that the assaults were not unplanned."

According to the Foreign Office Mr Blaker referred to "the growing number of incidents of intimidation and harassment of British visitors, who on arrival and departure have been searched and interrogated, and sometimes photographed". Mr Blaker said that such incidents seemed to have occurred in particular to British visitors who had met Soviet citizens during their stay. And he said the government deplored the incidents and hoped that they would be fully investigated by the Soviet authorities.

According to the Foreign Office some of those involved were women, but it declined to give any details of their background or why they were visiting the Soviet Union. A spokesman said most of the incidents were at airports. The first was in November last year and the most recent was in May. Details of about 10 incidents were given to Mr Lunkov. The spokesman felt that they might be due to Britain's uneasy relationship with the Soviet Union over the Afghanistan invasion and the attempt to persuade athletes not to go to Moscow.

LIBYAN ENVOY DENIES TURKISH REPORTS OF AID, COOPERATION

According to a government spokesman's statement, the Libyan charge d'affaires has given these assurances to the foreign minister, Mr Rolandhis, who asked for an explanation after this information was reported. Mr az-Zabi told Mr Rolandhis that Libya does not intend to grant a $3 million loan to the so-called Turkish Cypriot state as the Turkish Cypriot press reports. He also stated that Mr Denktas was not received as president of the so-called Turkish Cypriot state but only as a representative of the Turkish Cypriot community. GDR MINISTER BEIL SIGNS COOPERATION AGREEMENT DURING VISIT

AT171840 Athens Armed Forces Radio in Greek 1800 GMT 17 Jun 80

[Text] A message from the prime minister of the German Democratic Republic to Prime Minister Rallis will be handed over by State Secretary and First Deputy Minister for Foreign Trade Gerhard Beil, who arrived in Athens this afternoon on a 2-day official visit. At Ellinikon Airport Beil was welcomed by Deputy Trade Minister Tataridhis and East German Ambassador to Greece Kubbe. This visit, the foreign guest told the Armed Forces Radio Network, is aimed at promoting trade exchanges between our two countries and at establishing further relations to the mutual interest of the two peoples.

On his arrival the East German official visited the Ministry of Trade where he conferred with Trade Minister Dhimas. The meeting, which was also attended by Deputy Minister Tataridhis, East German Ambassador Kubbe and other officials, examined development of trade and economic relations between the two countries and the prospects opening up after abolition of the clearing system in force today. The Greek side stressed the need for expansion of the export of traditional products purchased by East Germany to include other products such as industrial, handicraft and metal industry products. This evening Beil visited the Coordination Ministry where, on behalf of his country, he signed the interstate agreement for economic, industrial and technical cooperation with Greece. Minister Without Portfolio Paleokrasas signed the agreement on behalf of the Greek Government.

AVEROF ATTACKS PASOK'S INCONSISTENCY, ECONOMIC POLICY

AT161618 Athens APOYEVMATINI in Greek 16 Jun 80 p 16

[Text] Severe charges were leveled against PASOK by Evangelos Averof in his address yesterday to the seventh "New Democracy" congress. Averof leveled burning questions about inconsistencies in the declarations and policies of Papandreou.

In a speech which was impressive in its content and arguments and was enthusiastically applauded by the congress, the minister of national defense first reviewed at length the progress of the nation and then referred with convincing arguments to the nation's development "into a primarily concerted, unified and homogeneous nation in today's Greece". He stressed: "I have dealt with developments. I have not resorted to empty words and big-mouthed statements on the virtues of the Greeks. We want calm because without calm there can be no progress in our country. Within the established and healthy positions of the greatest majority of Greeks," he added, "there are now new opposition views which could endanger the calm which prevails in our fatherland."

Analyzing the meaning of his observation, Averof explained that he was referring to opposing views which emerge from the two larger parties of the opposition: PASOK and the KKE. Concentrating his criticism on PASOK, Averof continued that this party "confuses things so that it can appear to be both on one side and on the other. Is it a Marxist party or is it not?" he asked.

"Is it a party which aims for the cooperation of the greatest majority of Greeks or is it a party which looks to a continual, severe struggle between classes until it is able to enforce its own views which, in any case, are not so clear? Is it a party which wants a multiparty parliamentary democracy--as it recently declared--or is it a party which wants a one-party regime based upon a single class and upon militantly organized groups, as previously stated by its leader and as proved by its proclaimed close ties with foreign one-party regimes? Is it a strongly nationalistic party, nearly chauvinist, or does it endanger the fate of the nation through its proclamations on foreign policy? The questions are legitimate".

Militant Mobilizations

Averof then stressed: "In an effort to limit myself to one or two characteristic depictions I will state that the resolutions of PASOK's Central Committee, approved by panhellenic congresses, define militant mass mobilization and continual, yes, continual strike action as methods of operation.

"1--Where? In a country where there is a proper operation of parliamentarianism, through which nations express themselves; in a country where the press is free to write whatever it wants; and in a country where there is absolutely no need for militant mass mobilizations in order to have the peoples' will expressed.

"2--When? At a time when even the richest of countries are shaken by economic crises; at a time when our country is passing through a crisis with unknown consequences; and at a time when only work and law and order can save the Greek nation from deep economic rumblings.

"No, gentlemen of PASOK. You cannot tell us that you are a normal, smooth-functioning parliamentary party and at the same time declare the economy of this country--which has a difficult economic life as it is--must deteriorate further, perhaps incurably, in order to satisfy your political games. What can one expect, however, from a party within which its greatest majority believes that the picture of the great Ethnarch Elevtherios Venizelos ought to be replaced by that of Aris Veloukhiotis? [Communist leader during the civil war]

"Gentlemen of PASOK, you should not be in such haste. You should not prepare his pictures. Leave them hidden in your desk drawers. We stand here determined and we will win. We are the strong, we are the majority and we will win. These questions, however, are not sufficient. The situation has become extremely dangerous. From this important rostrum I am obliged to tell friends at this congress: Once more it is time for the majority to wake up; it must devote itself to a vital struggle for the restoration of the country through hard work and with economy by limiting imports. It must devote itself to an intensive struggle for education and it must undertake a vital political struggle." Averof then observed that the main political facts in our country have radically changed and they have become threatening. The time of 15 years ago when a communist minority was outside the regime within which two parties alternated but in which the foundations of the social and political life remained firm is gone. Today the facts have changed.

Referring specifically to PASOK, Averof said this party has presented changes in form which no other party in Greece, and, perhaps, in any other country in Europe, has ever presented. "We have a right to believe," he said, "that every move by PASOK is a trick so that it can approach authority. If the question of a political succession to 'New Democracy' presents itself today, this succession could be--and this is the least we can say--an indefinite semi-Marxist and possibly antidemocratic regime, with or without the picture of Aris Veloukhiotis. The danger is great and obvious. This danger will be dealt with through democratic means. The means with which we will deal with the great threatening danger is faithful implementation of democratic and parliamentary rules by drawing inexaustible strength from the will of the people. Thanks to the virtue of our people, thanks to our own faith and fighting spirit, I am certain that we shall win. We are the strongest."

Averof then concluded: "We must all work at educating those who have gone astray, in order to convince those who have been swept away by trickery and the confusing words of PASOK. If we conscript our fighting spirit and if we unfurl the banners of our political beliefs we will always win and we will march speedily toward our healthy, democratic and national visions."

GREEK AEGEAN POLICY CRITICIZED AS 'HOSTILE'

NC171116 Istanbul TERCUMAN in Turkish 16 Jun 80 p 4

[Article by Zafer Atay: "A Tempest in a Teapot"]

[Excerpt] Using the Seawolf exercises--which the Turkish Armed Forces have been carrying out for years in the Aegean--as subterfuge, Greece has begun to create an air of panic with various statements, speeches, threats and irresponsible newspaper headlines.... Will this do anyone any good? What does Greece stand to gain from this tumult? All it can do is satisfy, to some extent, the unending spite in the hearts of some malicious groups.

No one can argue that Turkey is not demonstrating good will toward the peaceful settlement of the Aegean dispute. The Ankara government has proved its good will by lifting the Notam--imposed in 1974--which restricted certain flights over the Aegean. The desire for the revival of the dialogue between the two countries emanates from Turkey. But Athens continually escalates the tension. Greece has recently brought up the issue of extending its airspace to 10 miles. In seas like the Aegean, which have special characteristics, neither the airspace nor the territorial waters can be arbitrarily determined. Every step in the Aegean should have the approval of both Greece and Turkey, which adjoin the Aegean. Otherwise, expanding the airspace to 10 miles and the territorial waters to 12 miles amounts to demolishing all lines of communication.

On the Aegean question, Turkey is open and straightforward. If Greece depends on either the Soviet Union or the United States for support and extends its territorial waters to 12 miles, Ankara will consider this a reason to go to war and will act accordingly.

Turkey has rejected Greece's decision to expand its airspace to 10 miles. Currently, Greece's airspace over the Aegean is only 6 miles. During the joint NATO exercises recently held over the Aegean, Greek jets interfered with Turkish planes. Thanks to the calm reaction of the Turkish pilots, unpleasant incidents were avoided. Before the Seawolf exercises began Turkey sent a warning note to the United States and NATO, stating that it would not be responsible for any incidents that might occur in the future if Greek jets interfered with Turkish planes.

Greek Government officials realize that the Aegean is neither a Greek nor a Turkish lake. Both nations possess equal rights in the Aegean. Closing the Aegean to each other by unilateral decisions are hostile actions. This is how Greece has been behaving, both in the air and at sea, for a long time.

JORDAN SIGNS COMMERCIAL AGREEMENT ON COMMODITIES, AIR SERVICE

TA171521 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1400 GMT 17 Jun 80

[Text] A commercial agreement has been signed between Turkey and Jordan in Ankara. The agreement was signed by Commerce Minister Halil Basol on behalf of Turkey and by Jordanian Minister of Industry and Trade 'Ali an-Nusur on behalf of Jordan.

In a speech after the agreement was signed, Halil Basol said:

[Begin Basol recording] We have signed a new commercial agreement with Jordan. Under this agreement our commercial relations with Jordan will develop further and will be diversified. The two countries have indicated in the lists appended to the agreement that they will buy and sell agricultural goods and foodstuffs as well as industrial and metallurgical products.

The lists envisage a barter of goods which consider the needs of the two countries and which complement their economies. Along with the commercial exchange of the goods envisaged in the agreement, work will be conducted continuously between the two countries both at the commercial and governmental levels. Efforts will be made to increase the trade volume of the goods listed in the agreement. [end recording]

The Jordanian minister replied:

[Begin An-Nusur recording in English with a Turkish translation superimposed] The lists, as his excellency pointed out, are short, but I am pleased to say they are only indicative. Both countries, I hope, will go beyond these lists. As I pointed out in my previous remarks, the trade volume was modest until 1979. Now 1980 shows very promising figures and I hope the 1980s will witness a very large volume of trade between Turkey and Jordan. I hope that in the very near future we shall see the Turkish Airlines landing in Jordan and the Alia Airline of Jordan also landing in Turkey. [end recording]

Details of Agreement

TA171728 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1600 GMT 17 Jun 80

[Text] An agreement and auxilary protocols envisaging the development of commercial relations between Turkey and Jordan were signed in Ankara today. They were signed by Commerce Minister Halil Basol in behalf of Turkey and by Jordanian Minister of Industry and Trade 'Ali an-Nusur on behalf of Jordan.

Speaking during the signing ceremony, Basol said that the 3-year agreement would diversify and develop the trade between the two countries. The Jordanian minister said that along with the agreement, Turkey and Jordan should promote economic and technical cooperation.

Under the 1 year trade protocol drawn up within the framework of the agreement, Turkey will sell 75,000 tons of wheat and approximately 20,000 tons of flour to Jordan. It will also export certain agricultural goods, meat and livestock. In return, it will buy from Jordan 500,000 tons of phosphate rock--raw material for fertilizer--in 1981 and 600,000 tons in 1982. The agreement also envisages mutual air services between Turkey and Jordan.

The visiting Jordanian minister called on Minister of Industry and Technology Nuri Bayar before signing the commercial agreement.

[Text] The National Security Council has decided to recommend the extension of martial law now in effect in 20 provinces by another 2 months in order to ensure peace and security.

The National Security Council met under the chairmanship of Acting President Ihsan Sabri Caglayangil at the Cankaya Mansion for 4 hours today. The council's Secretariat General then announced that the public order situation, the activities in the martial law regions, the measures taken and to be taken were reviewed and assessed at the meeting. A written statement issued by the Secretariat General in connection with the meeting says: The merciless and effective struggle being waged to prevent anarchy, terrorism, divisionism and robberies--that aim at the states's integrity and unity, at national unity and solidarity, at the country's peace and security, the citizens' security of life and property--and to uncover the organizations that perpetrate these acts will continue without interruption. The National Security Council assesses this situation within the country as a state of emergency and it considers it necessary to have all the relevant laws enacted as soon as possible both in connection with this situation as well as to facilitate the martial law security forces' discharge of their duties.

The statement concludes: The National Security Council has decided to recommend to the government the extension of the martial law--now in effect in 20 provinces--by another 2 months in order to ensure peace and security in the country by continuing to take effective measures against all kinds of illegal activities that are aimed against the free democratic system--stipulated by our Constitution--and against the unity of the country and the state.

The National Security Council meeting was attended by Prime Minister Suleyman Demirel, Chief of the General Staff Gen Kenan Evren, the ministers who are members of the council, the air, ground and navy commanders and the National Security Council secretary general. The Council of Ministers will meet at 1800 to discuss the National Security Council recommendation.

SCHMIDT 'ANNOYED' AT CARTER'S LETTER ON NATO SECURITY

[Text] Bonn/Washington--President Carter's letter to Chancellor Schmidt on NATO security policy has obviously, in contrast to official versions in Bonn and Washington, led to a souring of the atmosphere in relations between the two governments on the eve of Schmidt's Moscow visit. According to information in Bonn, the chancellor was most annoyed at Carter's letter in which, with a warning undertone, he stated his views with regard to adherence to the NATO decision on the deployment of nuclear medium-range missiles in West Europe.

The chancellor has replied to the President's letter, it was learned in Bonn today. He suggested that Carter and he should have a face-to-face talk on the topics of their correspondence when they meet at the Western economic summit in Venice in a few days' time. Schmidt's displeasure is understood to be due to the impression of U.S. mistrust about the chancellor's Moscow talks created by Carter's letter. In the Federal Government it is conceded that Carter's letter could be construed as a warning to the chancellor that his proposal for a 3-year moratorium on the deployment by East and West of new nuclear missiles in Europe could place a question mark over the introduction of these weapons.

Government Spokesman Klaus Boelling and U.S. State Department spokesman Hodding Carter, referring to press reports about the "harsh" tone of the President's letter, have denied any differences between Carter and Schmidt about the validity of the NATO decision: The chancellor told the Bundestag yesterday that he and Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher would conduct their talks with the Soviet leaders on 30 June and 1 July along the lines discussed with their Allies whose support they enjoyed.

Government Spokesman Armin Gruenewald told the press in Bonn today that Carter's letter was discussed by the Federal Cabinet today because some Cabinet members had asked the chancellor about it. He gave no details but referred to the chancellor's denial of press reports that Carter's "warning" had been harsh in tone.

When Carter's letter was first reported the President's move--coming shortly before the two men were due to meet in Venice--was not well received within the Bonn government and was described as "redundant." Since Schmidt had adopted a clear stand on the validity of the NATO decision, there appeared to be no reason for such a letter. In Bonn it is assumed that Carter's letter was initiated by his security adviser, Zbigniew Brzezinski, who is thought to be suspicious of the Federal Government's policy, particularly in relation to the Soviet Union.

The U.S. President's letter has evidently strengthened the Federal Government's impression that the U.S. leaders attach more importance to that part of the NATO decision which provides for the production and deployment of modern nuclear medium-range missiles than to its offer to the Soviet Union to negotiate on the limitation of these weapons. The Federal Government has repeatedly stressed that both elements of the NATO decision carry equal weight.

Bonn's difficulty in understanding Carter's letter is also due to the fact that U.S. Ambassador to Bonn Walter Stoessel in an extended conversation with the chancellor before the President's letter was sent, had discussed NATO'S security policy and the chancellor's journey to Moscow and that the ambassador had afterward spoken very positively about the Federal Government's policy. It is surmised that Carter was unaware of Stoessel's report when he wrote his letter. It was also said that the Federal Government had sent the government in Washington all the texts concerning Schmidt's proposals for a limited deployment moratorium by East and West, including his speech to the SPD congress in Essen.

Washington press reports today speak of a clear rejection by Carter of Schmidt's proposal. A State Department spokesman is quoted as commenting that putting the NATO decision on ice would perpetuate the Soviet lead in medium-range weapons in Europe. By contrast, the Federal Government has repeatedly said that the chancellor's proposal did not alter the NATO concept since the proposal was aimed at utilizing for negotiations the time needed by the Western alliance until its new weapons were ready for deployment.

SPD Chairman Willy Brandt said that he would be very surprised if there had been a warning letter from the President to Schmidt. As far as he knew, no warnings had been uttered. "They would also be misplaced."

Spokesman Denies Differences

DW181118 Hamburg ARD Television Network in German 1515 GMT 16 Jun 80

[Excerpts from 16 June press conference by Government Spokesman Klaus Boelling in Bonn--recorded]

[Text] [Announcer] The Federal Government today once again refuted the impression of differences of opinion between Bonn and Washington over the chancellor's trip to Moscow. According to Government Spokesman Boelling, there is not even a hint of differences in the question concerning the closure of the arms gap by NATO through medium-range missiles. Boelling stressed that the American side is not raising any objections whatsoever to the Moscow trip, nor does President Carter's letter to Chancellor Schmidt constitute anything out of the ordinary.

[Boelling] Indeed, this is a development which goes without saying and which has many parallels in the period leading up to a trip such as the one on which the chancellor and the foreign minister will embark 2 weeks from now. As a matter of course the chancellor had asked that, for the purpose of forming a judgment by the President and his aides, the passages of his Essen speech that would be important for President Carter be passed on to the ambassador. It has been pointed out on several occasions--and we also discussed this here--that we have been exchanging ideas for quite some time in which the chancellor's trip also plays an important part.

[Excerpt from 16 June press conference by Government Spokesman Klaus Boelling in Bonn on President Carter's letter to Chancellor Schmidt--recorded]

[Text] [Boelling] All I can do is repeat that none of us noted anything of a tough tone. Tough is good, but in this particular case there was no such thing as toughness. Since the U.S. President as well as the entire U.S. Government sanctions this trip and are perfectly aware of the chancellor's intentions, I can only assume that the U.S. political leadership approves of these intentions and properly appreciates the motives for the trip.

U.S. 'Belief' in Ambassador Doubted

[Unattributed article: "Why Does Carter Not Believe His Ambassador in Bonn?"]

[Text] (DW) Bonn--Irritation by the "hot and cold attitude from Washington" is increasing in circles around Chancellor Schmidt and also in the Foreign Ministry. Even though the Allies have been "kept posted on each phase" of Schmidt's Moscow visit, certain suspicions about the German position will not cease.

Bonn is wondering whether Washington fails to read the reports of its Ambassador Walter Stoessel or does not believe him. In an interview published by the paper BILD on Monday, Stoessel had answered the question "is there any crisis between the United States and the Federal Republic?" With a clear no, he added: "I am satisfied with the good state of relations between our two countries."

Stoessel also answered negatively to three other BILD questions:

1. President Carter has no objection to the chancellor's Moscow trip.

2. The ambassador is not afraid that it is intended to separate the Federal Republic from the United States and that it seeks neutrality. ("I do not know any responsible politician in the Federal Republic of Germany who thinks that way.")

3. The foreign policy of the United States--especially concerning Europe--will not change after the presidential elections, no matter who is President.

Stoessel's reply was just as unequivocal with regard to the Honecker-Schmidt meeting. ("There are no problems whatsoever in that respect. These contacts are particularly important for stability in Europe.")

Bonn quarters also noted gratefully that Stoessel reaffirmed the American guarantee for Berlin and that he drew attention to the identical assessment of the situation in Iran and in Afghanistan by Bonn and Washington.

Therefore, Bonn quarters are all the more irritated by the Carter letter to Schmidt which--be its tone "tough" or "businesslike"--by its existence alone reveals a certain distrust for the German negotiating position. Besides, rumors are being spread that the CIA has "other disquieting information" about the true intentions of the Federal Government for its talks with the Soviets. Just like some years ago when a feared "self-Finlandization" of Europe was involved, the Socialist International is again named as one of the sources.

Stoessel, in contrast, said: "We are conducting very close talks on the chancellor's Moscow trip in order to prepare it carefully." Yet, despite the "very close talks," one man seems to remain suspicious: Carter's security adviser Zbigniew Brzezinski.

Cause of Letter: Bonn 'Carelessness'

DW181055 Frankfurt FRANKFURTER ALLGEMEINE in German 18 Jun 80 p 12

[Commentary signed R.H.: "The Letter"]

[Text] Regardless of how Bonn handles it, the suspicion that communications between the White House and the federal chancellor's office are not the very best has been confirmed by the intentional indiscretion regarding the letter from the American President to Helmut Schmidt. The irritation thus provided is probably a retaliation for the surprise created by the federal chancellor for the Americans some weeks ago when he made his ambiguous remarks on the decision to close the arms gap with regard to missile deployment, remarks the White House learned about from the press and radio. Both sides ought to consider such things as blunders from which one can learn. Quickness is necessary because transatlantic confidence has been called into question. Reports on this issue indicate that an exchange of ideas is already taking place on several levels. [paragraph continues]

The letter by the American President, along with its publication, must also be considered as a so-called "guard alert" ["vergatterung"] in military language: A reminder to be vigilant. The German Government will consider this uncouth and plain gesture to not be very nice, but the government itself caused it due to careless moves and negligence about the image it presents.

CARTER PROSPECTS FOR LEADERSHIP IN VENICE QUESTIONED

DW181135 Munich SUEDDEUTSCHE ZEITUNG in German 18 Jun 80 p 4

[Klaus Arnsperger Washington dispatch: "Jimmy Carter--Weak and Strong"]

[Text] President Carter's trip to Europe does not have favorable auspices. Today the power and role of the United States are more controversial among the Allies than ever before. It is especially the manner in which Jimmy Carter is governing his country that has essentially contributed to this development. The President appears to be a politically very shaken man in the circle of his most important allies who will gather in Venice next weekend to hold their annual conference on vital economic issues. Since the last summit meeting, which took place in Tokyo a year ago, the prestige of the United States abroad as well as its economic situation have worsened impressively: The effects of the crisis in Iran and in Afghanistan have heavily impaired the solidity of the Western alliance, especially the credibility of the U.S. claim to leadership. At the same time, the United States is on the threshold of a serious recession.

Viewed from the American angle, world political developments last year greatly amplified the centrifugal forces in the Atlantic Alliance. Carter's latest letter to Chancellor Schmidt is indicative of growing displeasure and even suspicion on the part of many Americans toward their European allies. By all appearances, the reason for this new attitude on the part of Washington is not so much the fact that it distrusted greater activity by its West European friends in the dual crisis from the outset, but that the President feels there is a lack of early and continuing coordination among the European capitals. But the Americans are even less inclined to give up their claim to leadership in the Alliance. Henry Kissinger's thesis that Europe must play a role which is predominantly determined by its regional interests continues to be topical.

It is this contradiction between Carter's claim to leadership and his inability to lead the Europeans under present circumstances from which the growing displeasure in the Alliance stems. A strong Europe would still be welcome to the United States today, but in no case a Europe which makes its will for political independence more and more manifest. The American objections go far beyond military considerations which seem to command the foreground today. What worries Washington most is the potential amplification of West European neutralist thinking, the feared extension of Russian influence over the entire Eurasian continent. The bilateral dialogues of West European governments with Moscow, therefore, make Washington more and more suspicious. The American refusal to postpone NATO'S closing of the nuclear arms gap is based on the consideration that only U.S. nuclear parity with the Soviet Union is maintaining the confidence of West Europe in the United States.

Washington is aware of the danger that continuous public criticism of the European allies' stance will only promote their trend toward independence. Official American reaction to the European Community's statement on a Middle Eastern peace settlement, for example, has been outstandingly reserved although this statement basically contradicts Washington's ideas. Carter also firmly believes that decisive East-West talks can be held solely between the Soviet Union and the United States; from this point of view Schmidt's visit to Moscow is more irritating than useful.

Behind this attitude is the conviction of the American Carter that the West Europeans basically do not merely lack a common line, but--even if they had it--would lack the means to conduct and maintain a common European policy independent of the United States. The dominant issue of the forthcoming Venice summit is plain evidence, from the White House's point of view; it demonstrates that again, as 1 year ago in Tokyo, the energy policy of the industrial countries will be the red thread running through the debate. The U.S. Congress has just inflicted a severe defeat on the President by categorically rejecting a special tax on imported oil, as suggested by Carter, but Carter still represents the most powerful industrial power of the world which, although weakened, if necessary can be self-sufficient.

Carter's weak position will become much more obvious during this European tour than ever before in an international conference. Four months prior to the elections it is absolutely uncertain whether his presidency will be renewed by the Americans. The undecided economic, monetary and financial policies of the President have contributed to the beginning of a recession in the country. This recession will probably be more grave and last longer than Carter had originally anticipated, and it will bring influence to bear on all other big industrial and trade countries of the world. The dollar did not improve its value last year. Inflation and unemployment in the United States have increased, and the productivity of American industry has decreased again. In view of these developments Carter will find it difficult in Venice to make the assembled Allies again follow in the footsteps of the United States.

GENSCHER, KHALID HOLD TALKS; ECONOMIC MINISTERS DISCUSS COOPERATION

[Excerpts] Bonn--On the third day of his state visit to Bonn, King Khalid of Saudi Arabia had a 1-hour meeting with Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher on current world political problems. The talk at Gymnich Castle near Bonn was to be followed by a 3-hour boat trip along the romantic Rhine Valley between Bingen and Coblenz.

The Saudi side has described the recent Middle East statement by the EC heads of states and governments, which was explained in detail by Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt and Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher, as "a positive step in the right direction." Between Bonn and Riyadh, which is concerned about security and stability in the Gulf region, there has been agreement in the talks so far that every effort must be made to guarantee the independence of Third World states. In his talk with King Khalid, Genscher reaffirmed German support for the initiative of the Islamic states for a complete Soviet withdrawal from Afghanistan.

Along the concrete path for expansion of German-Saudi cooperation is the offer by Federal Defense Minister Hans Apel to his Saudi counterpart, Sultan ibn 'Abd al-'Aziz, to provide German instructors for the Saudi Armed Forces. Possibilities for deepened economic cooperation were the main topic of a talk between Federal Economics Minister Count Otto Lambsdorff and Saudi Minister of Finance and Economy Shaykh Muhammad Aba al-Khayl, and Minister of Industry and Electricity Dr Ghazi al-Qusaybi, this afternoon.

Genscher and his Saudi counterpart, His Royal Highness Sau'd al-Faysal, will give a joint press conference on the results of the talks tomorrow morning. King Khalid who, after a visit to West Berlin will give a gala dinner this evening to honor Federal President Karl Carstens, will have a further meeting with Chancellor Schmidt at Cologne-Bonn Airport before flying home.

Mr. Shahi is on the three-member panel appointed by the Islamic Conference to look into the possible solutions to the crisis in Afghanistan. The two other members are Habib Chatti, secretary general of the Islamic Conference, and Iranian Foreign Minister Sadeq Qotbzadeh.

After his official visit (here) Mr. Shahi is to travel to Yugoslavia.

DIJOUD STRESSES NEED FOR PRESENCE IN NEW HEBRIDES

OW181335 Paris AFP in English 1307 GMT 18 Jun 80

[Text] Paris, June 18 (AFP)--French Secretary of State for Overseas Territories Paul Dijoud today "stressed the need to maintain a French presence" in the New Hebrides, when he briefed the Cabinet on the situation in the South Pacific archipelago, French presidential spokesman Jean-Marie Poirier said here.

This presence, Mr Poirier said, could make itself evident from New Caledonia, 800 kilometers (500 miles) away. A force of 55 gendarmes is stationed there.

He added that Mr Dijoud told the Cabinet that this presence must be maintained until the island's independence from joint administrators France and Britain, scheduled for July 31, "so that everything proceeds under the best possible conditions, without giving the impression of lowering the flag or practising neocolonialist policies."

MICHEL TATU CONTRASTS PARTY VIEWS ON NUCLEAR DETERRENCE

LD181509 Paris LE MONDE in French 14 Jun 80 pp 1, 15

[Michel Tatu article: "Battle or Not?"]

[Text] Battle or no battle? "Forward" or "in support"? Priority to conventional or nuclear weapons? Priority to the super Pluton or to the neutron weapon? An army of technicians or of big battalions? All these questions will continue to be debated before the choices which the government has to take on defense programs this summer and following the program documents recently published by the two main majority parties.

Indeed there has been no attempt to radically alter the main lines laid down by General de Gaulle after France's withdrawal from the Atlantic military organization in 1966. It is appropriate simply not to dwell on the "omnidirectional" doctrine proclaimed at that time: It was clear during that period that the only remotely possible aggressor was the USSR, but this is more readily discussed now after the spectacular strengthening of the Soviet potential. [paragraph continues]

We can also leave aside the need to face indirect attacks (threats to oil supplies, maritime communications and so forth) which has become more probable and in the face of which everybody seems agreed on increasing long-range intervention capabilities. On the other hand, with regard to the less probable but more fundamental danger of a war in Europe, only two major hypotheses still seem possible:

1--The seizure of some security: A limited Soviet military operation waged without nuclear weapons and aimed at taking control of a neutral country (Finland, Austria, Yugoslavia) or part of a NATO country--northern Norway for instance, the Turkish Straits or even Hamburg....

In this case the Kremlin would act as quickly as possible to create a fait accompli and start negotiations from a position of strength. This is an adventure, therefore, a game of "brinkmanship," but the very limited nature of the objectives revealed rules out the use of the ultimate weapons in both camps, at least at the start.

2--A general attack on Western Europe with the Soviet leaders considering, rightly or wrongly, that the situation was in their favor and that the United States would limit its response to the use of the troops and means it has in Europe and launching an all-out attack on NATO's whole defense system with the intention of stopping only at the North Sea or the Atlantic. Opinions may differ but it seems much more plausible to think, like General Gallois, that in this case they would use their so-called "tactical" nuclear weapons from the start. There seems to be no reason why they would give the Americans--who would be even more tempted to use such weapons on the old continent, which is a distant theater for them--the advantage of initiative in this sphere. What was true 20 years ago is even truer now that the SS-20 missiles and Backfire bombers, which are more accurate than their predecessors, make it possible to "disarm" the Atlantic armies even more effectively by a previous strike against military targets.

Without explicitly expressing it, General de Gaulle made his choice. Under the first hypothesis France would take a full part in operations, play its role fully in the Alliance and, of course, be associated in the settlement which was to follow. Under the second hypothesis it would cautiously pull back its forces and withdraw into a national territory previously "sanctuarized" by the threat of the broadest possible reprisals against Soviet cities.

Finlandization or Sovietization

In short, the hurricane would sweep over Germany and the North Sea but, it was thought, Paris had a chance of containing it on the Rhine by threatening the USSR with damage which was unacceptable in relation to the stakes and new for the USSR. France would find itself in the position which Spain occupied in World War II: Hardly an enviable situation in a ravaged Europe with the Red Army at its door but, after all, neutralization or even Finlandization is better than Sovietization....

This plan sends shudders through the Atlantic capitals as much today as it did before and its neutralist not to say egotistical or cynical odor is denounced. However, it cannot be rejected simply on the grounds that French interests would be dramatically affected if Germany were occupied by a hostile power. Everybody accepts that, but the only question is what France could do to survive in this extreme case after U.S. deterrence had failed. Nor is it possible to see how Paris could meanwhile strengthen the U.S. umbrella held over its European allies. If the United States with its formidable power cannot manage to be credible, why should France be credible at the risk of weakening its own deterrent?

That is the main weakness of the theory drawn up by Mr Giscard d'Estaing since 1976 and strengthened last month by the Union for French Democracy [UDF] program on the role of the "battle" in Europe. The political party which is closest to the president is extremely clear on this point. In its view the battle and the means with which we equip ourselves for waging it "become the elements of deterrence." To the extent that "French security would be decided right in the first battle in Europe" participation by French forces "could not be in doubt"; it should be defined "without reservations," the only margin for maneuver left to the French president relating to the choice of timing and whether or not to use the tactical nuclear weapons.

However, the prospect of a battle is no real deterrent for a power--the USSR--which is armed to the teeth, which knows that in the event of war in Europe its troops will suffer considerable losses in any case when faced with the U.S. and West German forces but hopes that the battle will take place well outside its territory and that the stakes will therefore be higher than the risks run.

A Paltry Contribution

The use of tactical nuclear weapons in no way alters these facts. As has been said, it is difficult to see why the USSR should not take the initiative in support of a general attack. It is even more difficult to see how France's paltry additional contribution in this sphere (be it the super Pluton or the neutron bomb, we will only add a few dozen bombs to the 6,000 American warheads) would frighten the Soviets: Even if France were to use these weapons first--and it would be a miracle if neither the Soviets nor the Americans used them before us--the Kremlin would have no reason to falter; the French "stop-hit" would be inadequate quantitatively and too far from home. All this does not prevent the UDF from asserting: "The decision to send in our forces alongside our allies will show the enemy that he will encounter considerable nuclear firepower."

In refusing this battle, therefore, the Rally for the Republic [RPR] is much closer both to the facts and to General de Gaulle's line. It goes even further by advocating in the event of conflict in Europe, a participation which is limited in advance: There is only a question of acting "second," with "a limited volume of forces," so as to "take part in settling a crisis not directly affecting our country." The conventional forces' role can only be to "prepare for bringing nuclear weapons into play" and this use has nothing to do with the battle itself; it only serves to announce the determination to resort to strategic weapons against Soviet territory proper in the context of a strategy of "escalating to extremes."

The only nuance introduced into the original plan is that countercity deterrence is now extended to the enemy's "decision-making centers and economic and industrial capacities." However, the aim is still to maintain deterrence "by the weak of the strong" by using the "atom's equalizing power." The weak country deters the strong one by not copying it; the former refuses battle and simply threatens to punish the latter in its own way by dealing a series of unacceptable blows to its nerve centers. Although this is not specified the United States plays its role in this plan without having anything to do; the damage done to the USSR will strike it as even less acceptable since the USSR would be very seriously damaged in the face of a more or less intact United States.

The arguments put forward against this doctrine are impressive but only on the surface: The first objection is that the French president who would press that button would call down terrible reprisals on our country leading to its "vitrification." The French are so convinced of this that, according to an IFOP-LE POINT opinion poll, half of them think that Mr Giscard d'Estaing would not press the button for this reason. [paragraph continues]

Nonetheless it is vital to realize that the important thing in deterrence is what is first going through the mind of the supposed aggressor. In other words, it is primarily up to Mr Brezhnev and [Soviet Defense Minister] Ustinov to decide whether the possession of France "is worth" the destruction of some 50 Soviet cities. Furthermore, people forget that the dilemma is posed in exactly the same terms for any nuclear power whether it be Mr Carter or the Chinese leaders. The scale varies from country to country but this is the price of sanctuarizing any territory.

At the expert level it is often pointed out that the "fashion"--prompted by technology--has changed, that the superpowers' move to a counterforce strategy makes France's obstinacy in pursuing a countercity strategy "outmoded." In fact the new accuracy of Soviet weapons is leading to constant new precautions to ensure the invulnerability of France's deterrent. However, this does not make it necessary to join the superpowers' game and "chase" a multitude of unattainable objectives; in this sphere the most effective thing is the one which hurts most. Furthermore, France does not have the same problems as the United States, which has not only to "sanctuarize" its territory--and it is doing this in essentially the same way as France--but also to provide a clearly much less credible protection for its allies.

The only new objection which can be made to the RPR's deterrent theory stems from the future deployment of the U.S. medium-range missiles in Western Europe. These Euro-strategic weapons will strengthen the U.S. umbrella by threatening Soviet territory with reprisals but they will indirectly weaken the French deterrent force precisely to the extent that they copy it. If the Soviets disregard this new NATO deterrent it will cost them less to disregard the French deterrent which promises them comparable damage. Nonetheless this is not reason enough for France to rally to the idea of a "forward battle."

Where does the idea of a European defense system come into all this? Mr Aurillac, author of the RPR's "Reflections on Defense," admits that "the stronger and more respected the French deterrent is, the more we will increase the impossibility of a war in Europe. In this respect," he concludes, "we are good Europeans." He goes no further than this, which must seem paltry to those who dream of a "European" Europe taking over the burdens and responsibilities of Europe's defense. However, it is not by wishing to take part in an "Atlantic battle" undertaken in dubious conditions or by wanting to please everybody that you will prove to be a better European.

COSSIGA HOLDS PRESUMMIT MEETING WITH PARTY SECRETARIES

[Excerpts] The international situation and Italy's position at the forthcoming Venice summit were examined at a meeting between Prime Minister Cossiga and the secretaries of the three parties of the government majority. Here is a report from Montecitorio by Angelo (Ada): [passage indistinct

Another topic on the agenda is the energy problem and economic policy, but only from the point of view of the Western allies, in order to emphasize the commitment that the Venice summit will have to demonstrate--regarding the problem of inflation and the need to solve it--by encouraging or halting the effects of rising oil prices in countries which have economies in transformation, such as Italy.

As regards domestic policy, the summit has effectively postponed--until a later ministerial-level meeting--the examination of measures to be adopted in order to combat the troubling inflationary spiral. There is talk of new taxes, of new increases in the price of gasoline, of fresh budget cuts so as to encourage intervention in favor of industry, that is to say, to guarantee employment.

Republican Secretary Spadolini, at the end of the meeting, showed his own satisfaction with the freshly affirmed line of Atlantic solidarity. Spadolini [Republican], Craxi [Socialist] and Piccoli [Christian Democrat], the semiofficial note says, viewed with satisfaction the excellent state of the government coalition with regard to the recent elections. The three secretaries, without the participation of the prime minister, also dealt with the problem of local councils, a problem which will be dealt with in depth at other [word indistinct] meetings.

BERLINGUER ON PCI'S OPPOSITION STANCE, POSTELECTION SCENE

LD190729 Rome L'UNITA in Italian 15 Jun 80 pp 1, 7

[Ugo Baduel interview in Rome with PCI Secretary General Enrico Berlinguer: "Berlinguer Interview on Vote"; date not given]

[Excerpts] Rome--[Question] Let us talk about opposition: How do you assess the consequences and prospects of our opposition stance at the national level?

[Answer] In January 1979 we told the workers and masses that they would have gained no benefit from the indefinite protraction--which is what the DC and other parties demanded--of our stay on the rungs of the parliamentary majority without ever crossing the government threshold with equal status. In view of the DC's stubbornness and political shortsightedness and the Italian Socialist Party's [PSI] indulgent weakness, we responded quite clearly with the following choice: "either in government or in opposition." But even though in opposition we have fought to wrest results and help provide a positive solution to our country's and people's problems. In the regional and local councils, where we are a governing force, we have shown that we can do the things that we could also do on the national plane in central government, although of course this would imply tackling problems very different in scale and quality. Both stances and positions have the same aim: to transform and regenerate the life of people and society, public life and government methods. So in both cases we have once again distinctively characterized the party's image, identity and characteristics--and this has benefited us. Indeed, I believe that if our image had penetrated further we would have gained better results everywhere, including the south and the islands.

In many areas we have not managed to completely eliminate the vestiges of the idea of a submissive and indulgent PCI which gained ground in 1976-79 and which lost us many votes at last year's general elections. These vestiges can also be seen by examining the different gains and losses in areas where perhaps, on the whole, we have progressed.

[Question] So what you were saying about struggle objectives and new contents with regard to the south and individual local situations is also valid on a national scale?

[Answer] Precisely. A government program or plan formulated by us must reflect such a quality. Even when we are in opposition the postive nature of our struggle must be apparent.

What We Mean by Governability

[Question] It has been said, however, that the elections have rewarded the present government, which does not intend to budge, so our prospects....

[Answer] Let us look at the facts. This government is the result of the 1979 general elections, not of the 1975 administrative and local elections. So it is in relation to the 1979 results that we must assess the votes gained by present governing parties as a whole. The three majority parties have risen from 51 to 52 percent. I do not regard this as politically very significant. Be that as it may, it is a fact that this Italy--with its economic crisis, whose most serious phase is yet to come, with the present state of the public administrations and structures and such a tense and dramatic international situation--cannot be governed with 52 percent of the votes and, above all, with the opposition of the backbone of the working class and workers masses. So with the present government it might be possible to struggle along (as we are doing in relations with the United States, in Europe and with regard to inflation) but not to govern. When we talk about governability we do not mean--as some people do--the numerical total of parliamentarians belonging to certain parties or a formula composed of party initials on paper. We mean substance, proposed solutions to problems, specific actions by ministers in all fields. And it is on this point that we have stepped up our opposition, in connection with specific actions and the complete absence of any blueprint or overall plan equal to the problems.

[Question] But, as you know, this has prompted charges of PCI "entrenchment."

[Answer] There is neither entrenchment nor refusal to shoulder government responsibilities, together with the left as a whole, with an alignment truly reflecting the interests of the masses. But today the struggle to resolve the country's problems demands that the Communists remain in opposition and that they avoid seeming to be involved in any way with government decisions and practices such as the ones we are witnessing.

[Question] Does this mean opposition even to a government different from this one, but which still excluded the PCI?

[Answer] Never in our history have we conducted a predetermined, blind opposition. It seems obvious to me that if this or another government took steps in a different direction more in line with the demands of the moment and country, we would certainly take this into account and push them and encourage them in those directions, even perhaps varying the nature of our opposition struggle. However, I do not believe this applies to the present government on account of both its political origins and structure and the actions it has already carried out. As long as it survives we will not cease to struggle for the objectives which we have frequently mentioned.

[Question] Let us talk about the PSI now, about this postelection PSI. Mancini has said in an interview: "I am worried by the fact that my party has gained consensus both where it presented itself as pro-Craxi and pro-government and where it presented itself with a critical image."

PSI Result

[Answer] Yes, this PSI is undoubtedly a new one compared to the one we have known. It has presented itself in various, often entirely contradictory guises and therefore ended up seeming like a catchall. Look at the Radicals' votes. [Radical Party Secretary] Pannella is still brandishing them as a threat, implying that he has "lent" them to the PSI. What does this mean? Will this affect the PSI's future conduct? On the other hand, in cities and regions where it has governed with us, the PSI has defended the leftwing councils and it gained votes on the basis of this stance.

How will it behave now? I hope that some uncertainties regarding the councils will disappear, because the PSI cannot be unaware that those who voted for it because of the way it has governed with the PCI did not intend to do so for the way it would have governed with the DC.

[Answer] Of course. It is likely that the time will come when a joint plan will be opportune. What I cannot share, however, is the illuministic approach of some people who talk about a joint plan as a kind of cure-all, a remedy to be administered from above, on the basis of agreements on paper between chiefs of staff. This is an idea that has always existed in Italian political life and which has a tradition which survived in La Malfa, but we have never espoused it. Leftwing unity must be a unity of the masses and must emerge and grow simultaneously in the country, in society, in people's minds, and must become established and grow among party members and workers. And--another essential point--it must not be an operation to dilute the characteristics of each party. On the contrary. Unity demands the utmost respect for everyone's identity and, therefore, the utmost emphasis on each party's own characteristics without submission or compromise on any side.

[Question] What is your verdict on the postelection situation as far as the DC is concerned?

[Answer] I believe that a major problem cannot fail to emerge within that party; I believe we have already seen the first signs of it. As I have said, we have a problem in the south, but the DC has an equally big problem in the country's highly developed areas. The DC, within its own party, must not evade calling into question the line which emerged victorious at its latest congress. To return to party images, the increasingly prevalent picture now is of an old DC, the party as election machine, dispenser of favors and center of corrupt practices (although of course it has managed to adapt and modernize its techniques and tools for handling power, even in the south).

HUANG HUA TALKS TO PRESS BEFORE LEAVING COPENHAGEN

OW191039 Paris AFP in English 1020 GMT 19 Jun 80

[Text] Copenhagen, June 19 (AFP)--Chinese Foreign Minister Huang Hua today ended an 11-day visit to Sweden, Norway, and Denmark with a firm warning that any negotiations with Moscow to end the Afghan crisis would be meaningless as long as Soviet troops remained in Afghanistan.

Speaking at the airport here before leaving for West Germany on the next stage of a European tour, Mr Huang Hua told reporters: "To negotiate with the Soviet Union at the present time, while its troops are still in Afghanistan, would be tantamount to accepting Afghanistan as a zone of Soviet influence." Mr Huang Hua said a coordinated international policy towards the Soviet Union was required if a settlement of the Afghan crisis was to be achieved. He also warned Western nations against what he said was a policy of worldwide aggression on the part of the Soviet Union, which could lead to a world war if not checked.

Mr Huang Hua also called for the withdrawal of Israel from occupied Arab territories, and voiced support for Palestinian autonomy.

Mr Huang Hua, who flew to Duesseldorf, will spend two days in West Germany, followed by a stop-over in Paris on Saturday for talks with French Foreign Minister Jean-Francois Poncet.

PRC Distrust of Detente Noted

OW190734 Hong Kong AFP in English 0726 GMT 19 Jun 80

[Text] Copenhagen, June 19 (AFP)--Chinese Foreign Minister Huang Hua's 11-day tour of Scandinavian capitals ending today amounted to repeated disagreement over detente with the Soviet Union. Sweden, Norway and Denmark hope detente can be revived. But People's China does not believe detente is possible.

The Swedish, Norwegian and Danish foreign ministers in turn reportedly told Mr Huang Hua they felt it was necessary to work for a political solution in Afghanistan to increase detente. But Mr Huang Hua did not mention the word detente once in his statements to newsmen, and probably did not in his talks with the ministers either.

A few hours from the end of his stay in Denmark today, he told Danish television that Moscow, far from being willing to withdraw from Afghanistan, wants to go all the way to the shores of the oil-rich Gulf and even farther. The Chinese minister made similar remarks in Sweden and Norway. So one can deduce he will say the same thing in West Germany when he starts a visit there today. He will probably be still more insistant than in Scandinavia since German Chancellor Helmut Schmidt will soon go to Moscow.

Though Sweden is neutral, while Norway and Denmark are members of the Atlantic Alliance and Denmark also belongs to the European Economic Community (EEC), Mr Huang Hua found that all three consider the international situation grave but believe a political solution is possible or at least that it is possible to try for such a solution.

During his journey to this strategically-important area, the Soviet Communist Party newspaper PRAVDA warned the three Scandinavian countries that invited Mr Huang Hua to beware of "Chinese hegemonism and risk-taking policy."

Meanwhile, a Chinese delegation also visited the European Parliament for three days, Poul Moeller, head of Danish conservatives in the Parliament, said on radio this morning that the delegation outspokenly condemned the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan. But he stressed the nine EEC countries should be friends of China not only for the sake of their trade, but also to be more numerous in opposing Soviet Afghan policy.

VISITING UAE MINISTER ON OIL PRICES, SUPPLY, COOPERATION

LD181313 Copenhagen BERLINGSKE TIDENDE in Spanish 14 Jun 80 pt 1 p 2

[Civi report: "Oil Companies' Power From Arab Countries; Interstate Deals Are the Future, Says Oil Minister"]

[Excerpt] On bidding farewell yesterday to Denmark and Energy Minister Poul Nielson, United Arab Emigrates Oil Minister Dr Mani' ibn Sa'id al-'Utaybah stressed that he is not an oil merchant and does not sell oil and therefore did not have a contract with him in his briefcase when he came to Denmark.

"Talks on oil deals must continue between our state selling and purchasing companies," the emirate's oil minister said, adding that after the Danish energy minister's visit to the United Emirates friendly ties had been established which ought to be developed further with a view to closer trade ties.

Oil Minister Dr al-'Utaybah announced that the United Emirates do not wish to use their oil as some sort of weapon in trade contracts containing political conditions. For this reason Dr al-'Utaybah assumed that other countries do not make political conditions in their contracts for the supply of oil. The United Emrites otherwise are expecting a moderate rise in oil prices in step with what the world economy can stand. In his opinion, oil prices will remain fairly steady in coming months.

"The multinational oil companies' domination of the oil market is waning, and we will finally reach a situation in which, as far as the Arab world is concerned, they will be suppliers of knowhow while we dominate oil production and sales. Denmark can buy directly from us. Other countries do, and this is in the best interests of the consumers, Dr al-'Utaybah said.

The next step will be the setting up between the United Emirates and Denmark of a so-called joint commission which will negotiate further trade ties, part of which will be Danish oil purchases.

Oil Minister Dr al-'Utaybah said that at the moment there is a surplus of oil in the world because of the Western nations' energy savings, but already next year a balance between supply and demand could become necessary; from 1984 there will be an oil shortage. For this reason the United Emirates are interested in expanding contacts and entering into contracts with a number of countries on joint problems connected with the marketing and use of oil.

FOREIGN MINISTER COMMENTS ON EC MIDEAST DECISION, PLO STATUS

LD181309 Copenhagen BERLINGSKE TIDENDE in Danish 15 Jun 80 pt 1 p 5

[Jens Thomsen report: "Yes to PLO But No Recognition"]

[Excerpt] The Palestinian terrorist organization, the PLO, can establish an information bureau in Denmark as a private undertaking, provided that the PLO does not contravene Danish laws through its activities.

"This does not amount to recognition of the Palestinian Liberation Organization as such," Foreign Minister Kjeld Olesen told me in connection with the EEC summit's statement in Venice that the PLO must be "associated" with the negotiations on a final peace settlement in the Middle East without the PLO, however, being considered the only representative of the Palestinians.

"The EEC statement in Venice reflects the Danish view, without containing any recognition of the PLO. During the latest foreign policy debate in the Folketing I said that the Palestinians themselves must decide who is to represent them. But we cannot get away from the fact that no individual, organization or party today can be considered more representative of the Palestinians than the PLO. Former Irish Foreign Minister Michael O'Kennedy, as chairman of the EEC Council Ministers, said on behalf of the EEC nations in the United Nations that the Palestinians themselves have the right to decide their own future and stressed in this connection that the PLO is part of them."

[Question] Yesterday the United States refused to negotiate with the PLO.

[Answer] Yes, I saw that. The most important thing about the Venice resolution was what we had hoped for, namely, that there is no mention of a final initiative as in UN Security Resolution 242. Instead, it takes the form of an expectation of a move which would mean that the UN Security Council would propose an addition to Resolution 242 incorporating the EEC nations' attitude, as it were--that the Palestinians have a right to self-determination --whereas 242 only talks about refugees. Our task in the EEC must be to push things along in the right direction. And, so, the most important thing about the resolution is that we will now make contact with all the parties concerned and elicit their views. This means the Arab countries, Israel--and the PLO. In this way we will be able to set forth a basis for evaluating the situation.

NORWAY

CONTENT OF TALKS WITH SAUDI OIL MINISTER DETAILED

LD191013 Oslo AFTENPOSTEN in Norwegian 17 Jun 80 p 4

[Svenn R. Helskog report: "Reciprocal Information Important"]

[Text] "The question of Norwegian membership in OPEC is not under consideration at the moment. But it is of great importance to exchange experiences with so outstanding a person as [Saudi Petroleum Minister] Shaykh Yamani. His visit to Norway reciprocates my visit to Saudi Arabia in the spring of last year. I do not really expect definite results from our talks, apart from the fact that we will both have the opportunity to inform each other of our views on developments in the oil and energy sector," Oil and Energy Minister Bjartmar Gjerde has told AFTENPOSTEN.

So far, Yamani has given Oil and Energy Minister Gjerde a general briefing on his views of the oil market, based on what happened at the latest OPEC meeting in Algeria and on his own judgments.

As far as AFTENPOSTEN has been able to ascertain, the Saudi oil minister believes that we are now entering a period of oil surplus. A period of less consumption and possibly also lower prices is predicted.

Nevertheless, there is no reason to expect dramatic changes, either in oil production or in prices. The pressure will be felt first by those countries posting the highest oil prices. Yamani has said in the past that Saudi Arabia does not want to increase the price above $28, that is, the price today, even though the OPEC meeting reached a sort of agreement on a $32 per barrel ceiling.

"We would like to keep in close contact with Saudi Arabia, not least because the country's leading representatives are in a position to influence others. We also notice that Shaykh Yamani said in his speech at a luncheon today that Norway can play an important role in the international context," Gjerde said. "But he made it clear that Norway has not been viewed as a mediator, nor can it fulfill such a role, in relations with the International Energy Agency, for example. There is no situation at present that requires mediation," Gjerde said.

Minister Gjerde said that the Norwegians had given a briefing on Norwegian oil activities. Norway for its part is interested in developments in Saudi Arabia, and is also interested in a more detailed account of the long-term strategy the OPEC nations are seeking to formulate.

The days's meeting at the Oil and Energy Ministry lasted for 2 hours. Part of the time was taken up in planning the rest of the program for Shaykh Yamani's visit, but the question of relations between the oil-producing and industrialized nations and the Third World was also discussed. The question of the attitude of oil-producing countries toward the dollar as means of payment, which has repeatedly been the subject of discussion within OPEC, was not raised at the meeting yesterday.

In the past Saudi Arabia has shown great interest in the Norwegian norm-price system. About a year ago a delegation from Saudi Arabia visited Norway with the express purpose of studying this system, and it is probable that the question will be discussed again.

Shaykh Ahmad Zaki Yamani will call on Foreign Minister Knut Frydenlund Tuesday [17 June] before an audience with King Olav. The talks with Minister Gjerde will continue later in the day.

On Tuesday [as published] Yamani will have talks with Prime Minister Odvar Nordli before he and his party set out for northern Norway. On Thursday Yamani will visit Statoil in Stavanger.

On Friday representatives of OAPEC [Organization of Arab Oil-Exporting Countries] and representatives of the Norwegian authorities and oil industry will meet in Oslo. This meeting is not connected with Yamani's visit. Statoil Administrative Director Arve Johnsen is the chairman of this committee. The questions to be discussed concern cooperation in the training sector and certain questions on shipping.

OFFICIALS COMMENT ON UN ADVISER'S VISIT, WALDHEIM INITIATIVE

NC190646 Nicosia I SIMERINI in Greek 19 Jun 80 p 1

[Text] A government spokesman states yesterday that Mr George Sherry, the UN secretary general's senior special political adviser, came only to study UNIFICYP economic problems. The spokesman said that Mr Sherry's visit has no connection with our political problem. Mr George Sherry arrived in Cyprus 17 June.

Interview With Ioannidhis

LD181225 Kuwait AR-RA'Y AL-'AMM in Arabic 16 Jun 80 p 18

[Salih Qallab interview with Minister to the President Yeorios Ioannidhis in Nicosia, date not given]

[Excerpts] [Question] Many questions are being asked about the UN secretary general's new initiative in terms of its success or failure and the attitude of all the parties toward it.

[Answer] So far there have been no specific results from the UN secretary general's initiative, which was preceded by contacts and moves involving the two basic parties to the Cyprus problem and several other parties. The mission undertaken by the UN secretary general's envoy concentrated on a single issue, namely, the need to resume the negotiations which have been interrupted since last year because of the Turkish side's hard line and its demand for impossible conditions which we cannot accept.

Of course, the resumption of negotiations never indicates that the Cyprus problem has taken a step on the road to a solution. We have no evidence indicating that the Turkish side has given up its hardline stand and has become convinced of the need to enter into serious negotiations with us on the basis of the UN resolutions and the agreements concluded between the Turkish and Greek communities.

This time, like all the previous times, the impossible conditions which the Turkish community leaders put to the UN secretary general's envoy aborted this international initiative at an early stage just as they aborted previous similar initiatives.

Denktas and other Turkish officials insisted on us accepting their conditions before beginning negotiations and demanded that we should recognize the existence of two states on the island of Cyprus linked together only by flimsy ties. They also demanded the need to recognize the Turkish Army's occupation of 40 percent of the island. When I speak about the Turkish community leaders I in fact mean the Turkish Government because the Turkish community leaders' stand depends on the stand of the Turkish Goverment and the Turkish Army command on the island.

As far as we are concerned, we have declared our stand to everybody and we conveyed this stand to the secretary general's envoy: We favor negotiations without preconditions and for a solution on the basis of the UN resolutions and the agreements concluded between the Cypriot Government and leaders of the Turkish community. We favor the unity of the island within the framework of a federal state and for the departure of all foreign forces from it.

[Question] Did you discuss with the secretary general's envoy the details or just general lines?

[Answer] The UN secretary general's new initiative is based on the May 1979 agreement between President Kiprianou and Turkish community leader Denktas. The initiative aims at the resumption of negotiations on this basis because the United Nations considers the agreement in question and the February 1977 agreement still suitable for solving the Cypriot problem. The two agreements envisage that the basis for the solution is to establish a federal state consisting of a Turkish sector and a Greek sector that is fully sovereign, nonaligned, and demilitarized.

[Question] Is that all?

[Answer] Of course not. There are more detailed things. We want to go to the negotiating table without preconditions in order to discuss the area of each sector, the powers of the central government, and the quarters to be entrusted with looking after the security situation.

Therefore, we told the secretary general's envoy that we reject the Turkish side's preconditions which insist that the state should be a confederation or two separate states, despite the lapse of several years since the agreements in question.

[Question] Is Cyprus satisfied with the Arab countries' attitude toward your problem?

[Answer] First and foremost I must emphasize the depth of the historical relations between Cyprus and the Arab area. We are linked to the Arabs by common cultures which alternated in our island and in the Arab area. We also have objectives and aspirations in common with the Arabs.

Cyprus may be classified as a European country, but if you tour the island you will discover traces of the common culture and common history that tie the Arab area to Cyprus.

We are one with the Arab cause and consider the Arabs our brothers. Here I must point to our government's distinguished attitude toward the Palestinian problem. On this occasion I would like you to convey to the PLO leader and leader of the Palestinian people Yasir 'Arafat my warm greetings and the greetings of the Cypriot people.

On behalf of the Cypriot people I wish to express many thanks to the Palestinian people and the PLO for their support of our people's struggle and our cause. In fact, we consider the struggle of the Palestinian people and the Cypriot people as one common struggle. We face the same challenges and have the same objectives.

NEWSPAPERS COMMENT ON PLANNED TALKS WITH U.S. OFFICIALS

I KATHIMERINI Editorial

AT181414 Athens I KATHIMERINI in Greek 18 Jun 80 p 7

[Editorial: "Clarifications...."]

[Text] The days to come will be interesting with regard to developments on national issues. In fact U.S. Assistant Secretary Nimetz, who is responsible for issues in our area and the new Commander of Allied Forces in South Europe U.S. Adm William Crowe are expected in Athens. Finally, the Greek foreign minister and the U.S. secretary of state will meet in Ankara next week within the framework of the meeting of the Council of the Atlantic Alliance.

Of course the object of Nimetz's talks with the Greek Government will be the issue of our country's position in the Atlantic Alliance and its well-known connections, the balance of forces between Greece and Turkey in light of the abundant economic and military aid that is being given to Turkey, the outstanding issue of a Greek-U.S. defense agreement which is directly connected with the existence and status of foreign bases in our country, and so forth.

We suppose the same issues will be the subject of the talks to be held in Ankara between the Greek foreign minister and his U.S. counterpart. With regard to Admiral Crowe's visit this is officially described as "ceremonial" but there is no doubt that the well-known burning issues will be discussed during the U.S. admiral's meetings with the Greek officials.

We do not know what course the talks will take and we cannot prejudge their long- or short-term results. However, we do not doubt that during the talks and contacts in the days to come the Greek side will put forth certain truths to our interlocutors and once again Greek positions on the critical issues we mentioned before will be made clear.

What we suppose will be stressed to our visitors and interlocutors is the fact that Greece's policy should not be "taken for granted," as Prime Minister G. Rallis himself stressed in his policy statement to the chamber. Greece's policy is connected with the country's vital interests and related needs.

Our country's basic direction and fundamental choices are well known and are dictated by the overall evaluation of its fixed interests, but they do not imply the acceptance of situations which run contrary to Greece's acquired rights and vital interests.

As we have stressed in the past, the purpose of an alliance is to guarantee the integrity, independence and national security of the partners. If an alliance, instead of serving this purpose, runs contrary to it with regard to one of its members then it has no reason to exist for that member because the situation becomes incongruous.

Consequently, Greece can return to the military wing of the Atlantic Alliance only under the well-known conditions proposed by Greece which guarantee its security and its sovereign rights in its national area without running contrary--quite the opposite--to the (proven at least) aims of the Alliance.

On the specific issue of the foreign bases, their significance is truly important and multilateral. This issue has many connections and the bases are one of the most important negotiating "trump cards" our country has and they are related to all our national issues.

The U.S. side's goal for an immediate settlement of the issue, in accordance with its aims, is easily understood, but the Greek side's prudence is even more easily understood because it does not intend to relinquish any of the country's "trump cards" or accept hasty settlements that will not fully serve the country's interests.

In reply to reports about Nimetz's intention to exert pressure on this issue in conjuction with the issue of Greece's return to the Alliance's military wing, the government spokesman stated that Nimetz "does not have the intention or the potential to exert pressure and blackmail Greece." We do not know if he has the intention but certainly he does not have the potential. The country's responsible leadership and the majority of Greek people are not gripped by any barren or preestablished "anti-American" or "anti-Atlantic" feeling. Quite the contrary. But the era of docility and of exclusive dependence to the extent of subjugation has definitely ended.

The supp and strengthening of those who chauvinistically have unjustifiable designs on Greece its area produces and breeds negative processes among the Greek people and, in any case, the Greek Government will never agree to anything that will constitute even a possible or "forceful" design on Greece's legal and acquired rights, security and sovereignty in its national area or on the existence of large-scale Hellenism.

Likewise, Greece will not become involved directly or indirectly in aims or confrontations that are foreign and unrelated (at least) to its specific interests and its geographical area. When powers with international prestige avoid such involvements it would be inconceivable for our country to become involved in any way.

I AVYI Column on Nimetz

AT171940 Athens I AVYI in Greek 17 Jun 80 p 5

[From the "I AVYI" column: "The Only Correct Viewpoint"]

[Text] In reference to the imminent visit by the U.S. Assistant Secretary Nimetz, the government spokesman hastened to assure us that the American visitor does not have "the intention or the potential" to exert pressure upon Greece and to blackmail it. We have no idea how the government is so sure about the intentions of Nimetz. Converging reports from Washington, already published in the press, indicate the exact opposite. At the same time, the policy of the United States to date does not indicate that the Nimetz visit will be a visit of "politeness."

What does the United States want of Greece at this moment? It asks--and apparently it is on this that Nimetz will insist--that the Greek-U.S. agreement on bases be signed as soon as possible, separating this issue from the problem of our country's relations with the military wing of NATO. At the same time it "offers" its promise it will not overthrow the balance of power between Greece and Turkey and also that the agreement on bases will facilitate our country's return to NATO's military wing. In other words, if one carefully reexamines things, the United States only makes demands. In the end it demands only one thing: That all Greek opposition to its policy should cease and that our country should give in without objections to its more general plans in the area of the eastern Mediterranean and the Middle East. This is because both the return to NATO's military wing as well as the notorious balance of power with Turkey within military NATO operate only for U.S.-NATO interests.

A few days ago Prime Minister Rallis stressed that NATO does not protect its members from an attack initiated by a member of the Alliance. He then reached the conclusion that it is for this very reason we must strive for the preservation of the balance of power between Greece and Turkey. [paragraph continues]

In this way the issue of this balance of power becomes the central theme of Greek foreign policy. We, without underestimating the importance of strengthening the defense ability of the country, consider that such a view on the protection of our national interests is myopic to say the least. This is because the pressure which is at this moment being exerted against our sovereign rights in the Aegean does not originate only with Turkey and its armed forces. It is a multifaceted and multipurpose pressure which is primarily exerted through NATO and U.S. policy. Without these elements which are hostilely disposed toward Greece, any Turkish aggressiveness would have been virtually impossible in the form that we have known it from 1974 to date. If things are like this, however--and nobody has any doubt that they are--then the more we align ourselves with U.S.-NATO strategy (and such an alignment is represented by our return to NATO's military wing and the agreement on U.S. bases) then the more we will be pushed into situations which we could possibly control or deal with.

This then is the reason why dealing with Turkish aggressiveness is not exclusively and primarily limited to a military problem. Today's Turkey will continue to be armed "legally" or "illegally" by the United States and NATO "to the teeth." It has already been reported that the goal is that Turkey should replace the Iran of the shah with the "fifth strongest army in the world." Will our country enter such a race for the "balance of armaments?" The United States would have absolutely no difficulty in offering us such a prospect provided that we returned to NATO's military wing and we cede to it the bases it wants. In this way they would get two birds with one stone. Let us not forget that the strength of a nation is not counted only in tanks and rockets but--and primarily--with the stability of its home front. To the degree that the United States manages to overcome resistance to its policy today it is to this degree that it will manage to open up a great rift in the nation's home front. This is what U.S. estimates are based upon, estimates which do not stop at today and which do not underestimate the reserves at their disposal within the rightwing in our country.

The problem, therefore, does not consist primarily of negotiating over a certain--and also unattainable--balance of armaments with Turkey. The problem is primarily political and it cannot be correctly solved as long as the government refuses to identify the deeper and more permanent elements which feed the threats against our national interests--but also against democracy, we would add--as long as the government is not firmly oriented toward a new viewpoint on problems of our national defense against undermining U.S. and NATO activities and as long as it does not proceed to a direct severance of all negotiations for a return to NATO's military wing and for closing U.S. bases on Greek territory. This is the only correct and realistic viewpoint for handling our national interests today. It is from this viewpoint that both ourselves and the greatest majority of the Greek people will judge the position of the government during its imminent talks with Nimetz.

OZAL LEAVES FOR OECD MEETING, COMMENTS ON IMF FUNDING

[Text] Prime Ministry Under Secretary and State Planning Organization Deputy Under Secretary Turgat Ozal has said that Turkey's debts of some $2.6 billion are expected to be postponed following meetings that began in Paris yesterday. Ozal left for Paris today to attend the meeting on the deferral of Turkey's debts within the framework of OECD.

In a statement at Ankara's Esenboga Airport, Ozal said that there have been positive developments concerning the 12-year deferral of Turkey's $2.5 billion debt--with a 5-year grace period. Pointing out that the additional deferral of Turkey's debts, which were briefly deferred in 1978 and 1979, will also be discussed during the talks. Ozal announced that approximately $7 billion in economic support has been secured from international organizations this year.

Recalling that today the IMF board of directors will discuss the standby [last word in English] agreements which are to be signed between Turkey and the IMF, Ozal reiterated that this agreement will provide a credit of $1.625 billion for Turkey. Ozal noted that this is proof that the economic measures taken by Turkey on 24 January are supported by international organizations as well. He said: It is necessary to make great efforts and sacrifices for a minimum of 3 or 4 years in order to overcome the existing situation and again become a strong Turkey. I declare that I view the uninterrupted implementation of this new economic program--which will demonstrate the power of our people and which will rapidly bring [word indistinct] civilization to Turkey--essential for the noble interests of our country.

Ozal explained that shortages and black markets have been eliminated and the rate of inflation has been brought under control as a result of the economic measures and that serious work is underway both inside and outside the country in a bid to restore the economy.

Ozal then replied to journalists' questions. He said that there is nothing secret in the letter of intent to the IMF and that it is based on the economic measures implemented on 24 January. Ozal added that the decontrol of interest rates for deposits and loans and the policy of flexible exchange rates are also included in the letter of intent.

[Text] Finance Minister Ismet Sezgin has announced that during its meeting in Washington the IMF executive board approved the new 3-year standby [last word in English] agreement drawn up between Turkey and the Fund. In a statement to the TRT, Sezgin said that under the agreement Turkey should draw $1.6 billion from the Fund's resources over a 3-year period.

Noting that he met the Turkish officials in Washington, Sezgin went on to say that the economic measures taken by Turkey were approved at the IMF meeting and that the necessity of aiding Turkey from sources other than the Fund was also discussed. The finance minister announced that Turkey would use its right to make an initial withdrawal from the IMF this week.

Sezgin also said that the talks in Paris to defer Turkey's debts within the framework of the OECD were developing positively.

RPP Parliamentarians Injured at Funeral

[Text] RPP Nevsehir provincial leader Zeki Tekiner was killed by terrorists last night. Incidents broke out at Tekiner's funeral today. RPP leader Bulent Ecevit and over 100 RPP parliamentarians were present at the funeral in Nevsehir. A group attacked those participating in the funeral. The seurity forces prevented the incident from spreading. RPP Deputy Secretary General Erol Tuncer said that RPP Senator from Tekirdag Hayri Mumcuoglu, Deputy from Nigde Burhan Egemis, Deputy from Mus Garip Sanli and Deputy from Konya Yucel Akinci were slightly injured in the incident. Nevsehir Governor Fevzi Alaloglu said that the security forces have taken the necessary measures and that the situation is calm in the province. He added that a curfew has not been imposed.

Ecevit Denunciation of Incident

[Excerpts] Incidents occurred at the funeral of Zeki Tekiner, the RPP leader for Nevsehir Province and former deputy, in Nevsehir today. Four RPP parliamentarians and a member of the Central Administrative Council of the youth branch were injured in the incident. RPP leader Bulent Ecevit and some 100 RPP parliamentarians were in attendance of the funeral in Nevsehir. Speaking at a ceremony held while the body was being moved from the hospital, Ecevit said that the real aim of those who kill RPP members is to strengthen and consolidate the system of exploitation in Turkey. Recalling that Adana provincial leader Ahmet Albay and Kayseri provincial leader Mustafa Kulkuloglu had been killed before Tekiner, Ecevit said that a relentless campaign of enmity was being waged against RPP members in many parts of the country despite the fact that no RPP member has ever been involved in armed clashes.

Noting that the real target was not Tekiner and other RPP members, Ecevit continued: The real goal is to strengthen and consolidate the system of exploitation in Turkey. Therefore, they intend to destroy democracy and abolish social rights, political freedoms and the freedom of belief.

The aim is to weaken the people through exploitation and to reduce them to a position from which they cannot defend their rights. This is the real goal. We, the RPP, are the people's organized obstacle in front of this real goal. RPP members are individual living obstacles to this goal. We are the living obstacles facing the bullets. Ecevit added that they will continue to the end their peaceful struggle for rights, freedom and peace and that they will defeat fascism. Ecevit noted that despite their peaceful struggle new bloody wounds were being opened in the public. He said: No one can win in the strife which is dividing the nation. No one can emerge the victor from such strife. However, all of us as a nation will be the losers. The time has come to unite in our love for the nation and humanity instead of crying individually over our dead.

The public and the state have reached a point where it is very difficult for any party to save the country by itself. Those who want peace, those who are in favor of democracy and those who can realize that there is no alternative but democracy for the Turkish people--though they themselves have not digested democracy--should unite.

After the incident Ecevit called Ankara and talked with Prime Minister Suleyman Demirel and Chief of the General Staff Kenan Evren. Ecevit said that the security measures in the city are insufficient and that he will not leave Nevsehir until the security of citizens lives are ensured.

Replying to reporters' questions at the parliament regarding the Nevsehir incidents, Demirel said: Incidents have occurred in Nevsehir. I talked on the phone with the Nevsehir governor and with Mr Ecevit. The state is trying to restore tranquillity. I also talked with the chief of the general staff and the gendarme commander. I ask our Nevsehir citizens to not be provoked. TRT correspondents in Nevsehir have reported that incidents have been prevented and that calm reigns in the city.

GRAND NATIONAL ASSEMBLY DEBATES EXTENSION OF MARTIAL LAW

[Text] The Office of Prime Minister memorandum on extending by 2 months the martial law in effect in 20 provinces is being discussed at the joint session of the Senate and the National Assembly.

Interior Minister Mustafa Gulcugil was the first to address the meeting, which began at 1500 under the chairmanship of Deputy Assembly President Memduh Eksi. Explaining the reasons for the extension of the martial law, Gulcugil said that the struggle being waged against terror and anarchy was continuing without any concessions. Noting that 3,347 incidents occurred and that 339 persons were killed in martial law areas in the last 2 months, Gulcugil added that 875 persons were injured, 6,106 were detained and 1,135 were arrested during the same period. Noting that the time had come to refrain from exploiting for political reasons incidents which threaten the country and the state, Gulcugil concluded by saying that it is necessary to extend by 2 months the martial law which is in effect in 20 provinces.

Istanbul Deputy Orhan Birgit, who expressed the views of the RPP Group, criticized the fact that the interior minister did not refer to the incident in Nevsehir today in which an RPP senator and three RPP deputies were injured. Noting that either the Nevsehir governor did not inform the interior minister of the incident or that he gave false information, Birgit added that RPP leader Bulent Ecevit tried to contact Prime Minister Suleyman Demirel from Nevsehir, but that the prime minister's private secretary did not transfer the call. He noted that Nevsehir PTT [Post, Telephone and Telegraph Administration] officials tried to prevent any contact with the city. Birgit said that these officials should be removed from office.

Speaking on behalf of the Turkish Unity Party, Senator for Life Suphi Karaman said that the view that martial law is not a remedy was gaining strength within the public and that this view strengthened suspicions concerning the future of the democratic regime. The steadily increasing violent acts, which aim at abolishing the democratic system and basic rights and freedoms, have engulfed the country and people. He concluded by saying that the impartial attitude of the armed forces in the face of all sorts of armed acts should be preserved.

Expressing the views of the Nationalist Action Party, Konya Deputy Agah Oktay Guner said that anarchy was increasing despite martial law, but that the statistical figures concerning anarchy did not reflect the essence of the problem. Reiterating that his party was opposed to both fascism and communism, Guner added that the RPP winked at the incidents and that it assessed them subjectively. Recalling that great duties befall the government concerning anarchy, Gune called on all constitutional establishments to unite against anarchy.

Speaking on behalf of the Justice Party Group, Trabzon Deputy Ibrahim Vecdi Aksakal called on the political parties to support the government on measures to be taken to increase the effectiveness of the state against acts of terror. Aksakal added that especially the RPP should establish a sincere dialogue without any delay in bills concerning martial law, the state of emergency, state security courts, special security forces and residence. Aksakal noted that, if necessary, the state should be made--through a normal functioning--to threaten its enemy and to inspire confidence and security in the people.

Ankara Deputy Oguzhan Asilturk expressed the views of the National Salvation Party [NSP], noting that the two most important problems, namely anarchy and economy, were still on the agenda. Asilturk said that the government has not been sufficiently active, especially on the issue of preventing anarchy. He concluded by expressing the NSP view that religious officials should be recruited and that impartiality should be secured within the administration in order to uproot anarchy and to produce loyal to moral and spiritual values.

Speaking after Asilturk, Gulcugil gave information in connection with the incidents which occurred in Nevsehir. He said that a deputy who was in the funeral procession of the RPP leader for Nevsehir Province, who was killed yesterday, fired a shot. He added that the fire was returned by unidentified persons. He noted that security forces intervened with tear gas, thus preventing further incidents. Gulcugil noted that RPP Deputy from Nigoe Burhan Ecemis was shot in the hand, that Deputy from Konya Yucel Akinci was injured, and that a member of the youth branch was wounded in the foot. Noting that the security forces were in control of the situation, Gulcugil added that Ecevit was still in Nevsehir and that the body of the provincial leader has been sent to Ankara.

The chairman later allowed an aggressive deputy, who asked for the right to speak, to take the rostrum. This deputy was speaking at the time this news bulletin was being prepared.

DEMIREL SAYS JP GOVERNMENT DEPENDENT UPON NSP SUPPORT

TA181924 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1600 GMT 18 Jun 80

[Excerpt] Justice Party [JP] leader and Prime Minister Suleyman Demirel said that if the National Salvation Party [NSP] abstains or if it unites with the RPP then, naturally, the JP government cannot remain in power. He was speaking to the JP [Senate and National Assembly] Group. He said that those who are creating a government crisis will shoulder the responsibility for this crisis.

Noting that yesterday's National Assembly meeting was opened without a quorum, Demirel described this as a plot. He noted that those who staged this plot were trying to seize the government for the second time. Describing the incident as a coup and a raid, Demirel noted that if the RPP becomes the government again then Turkey will regress to its position of November 1979.

Demirel said that the JP was not intimidated by the interpellation and that it was not afraid to give an account of its deeds at the assemblies. He added: If they cannot form a government after having created a government crisis, then Turkey's administration by a government which has not received a vote of confidence is inconvenient and dangerous. This should not be considered. Those who are trying to create a crisis should explain what they intend to do and how. Noting that Turkey's problems will be solved if the JP government remains in power, Demirel added: If they do not let us govern and if they avoid resorting to the nation, then they will be held responsible.

RPP DISCLOSES REASONS FOR INTERPELLATION

[Excerpts] The reasons for the interpellation submitted against the Demirel government by RPP leader Bulent Ecevit and his colleagues have been disclosed. The interpellation states: So long as this government remains in power the foundations of the state, the essence of democracy and the people's concept of values will be destroyed, the moral crisis will be exacerbated, Turkey's healthy and peaceful development will be prevented, our independence will be damaged and security of life will be totally destroyed.

The reasons for the interpellation were disclosed at a news conference held by RPP National Assembly Group Deputy Chairmen Metin Tuzun and Coskun Karagozoglu. The interpellation notes that the government has failed to fulfill any of its promises and that it has acted contrary to its promises. The interpellation expresses the following views: Individual or organized terror has been transformed into widespread mass terror by oppressors who have seized and enjoy the support of the administration. The number of persons killed in acts daily of terror has quadrupled. Not only streets and quarters but cities and many state establishments are also becoming "liberated areas" and are being occupied by the oppressors.

The interpellation says that by imposing curfews to combat terror the government is achieving nothing other than halting daily life. Pointing out that the government is blocking the path to conciliation both in the parliament and within the society, preventing parliamentary activities and exerting efforts toward a constitutional amendment which will introduce a system contrary to democracy, the interpellation adds: Anarchy in the economy and the administration is exacerbating street anarchy. The rate of inflation has reached unprecedented dimensions and the cost of living has reached a stage where it poses a danger to public welfare. Noting that continuous and high-rate devaluations have undermined the value of the Turkish lira and that economic anarchy has reached an explosive point, the interpellation adds that all sorts of concessions are being made in order to obtain loans from Western countries.

The following views were expressed in the last section of the interpellation: The government is collaborating with various foreign forces, domestic circles of exploitation and various oppressors in order to introduce by force an economic model which is incompatible with the realities of the Turkish society, the desires of the Turkish people and the requisites of our democracy and Constitution. With the help of various foreign financial and political forces the future of Turkey is being mortgaged in order to firmly establish this model.

Meanwhile, the National Assembly Consultative Council, which convened in order to fix the date of the debates to determine whether or not the interpellation will be included on the agenda, could not reach a decision.

Discussion Planned for 19 Jun

TA171616 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1600 GMT 17 Jun 80

[Excerpt] It has been decided to hold the debates on whether or not to place the interpellation against the Demirel government on the agenda during the National Assembly session on Thursday, 19 June. The motion for the interpellation was read at the National Assembly today. After the National Assembly Consultative Council failed this morning to determine the date on which the debates would be held, National Assembly President Cahit Karakas proposed the date of 19 June. This proposal was approved by the National Assembly. If the deputies agree to place the interpellation on the agenda, they will have to decide the date on which the interpellation will be held.

TRUDEAU VIEWS 'SEPARATIST' ISSUES, GISCARD-BREZHNEV SUMMIT

[Unattributed report: "Trudeau Criticizes Lack of Consultations Before Giscard d'Estaing's Meeting With Brezhnev"]

[Text] Pierre Elliott Trudeau, who was the guest of Europe 1 Press Club the evening of Sunday, 15 June, commented on the defeat of the separatists in the 20 May Quebec referendum on "sovereignty-association." "What was demonstrated," the Canadian prime minister asserted, "is that even the separatist party which runs the Quebec government did not dare to ask the citizens of Quebec 'do you or do you not want to leave Canada?' Because it knew that this question would be rejected by a very large majority. To the ambiguous question 'do you want to leave Canada and remain in it at the same time'... the inhabitants of Quebec replied: No." Mr Trudeau expressed the view that on this occasion a "historic turning point" was "missed" and that a blunt question on independence "might have settled the question once and for all."

The Canadian prime minister did not rule out the idea of resorting to a referendum for the whole country on the constitutional question. "Since the Quebec government was able to appeal to the Quebec people to remove Quebec from Canada, why should we not ask the Canadian people to separate the Canadian Constitution from Britain," he said. Indeed, the text which forms Canada's constitution is an act of Parliament passed in London in 1967 (LE MONDE editor's note) [as published].

Mr Trudeau also criticized the meeting between Giscard d'Estaing and Brezhnev in Warsaw. "If it had succeeded President Giscard d'Estaing would have been a hero. Since it did not succeed he is an antihero." The Canadian prime minister also regretted, "without making a song and dance about it," that the French president took this initiative "without any consultation." While reaffirming his country's decision to boycott the Moscow Olympic games Mr Trudeau stated that he could "see no military or political strategy which would enable the West to win a war against the Soviet Union in Afghanistan."

DO AMARAL CITED ON EEC ACCESSION ISSUES

[Jose Rebello 12 June Lisbon interview with Foreign Minister Diogo Freitas do Amaral: "The Community's Internal Problems Must Not Hinder Its Enlargement"]

[Text] Lisbon--Receiving us on the eve of the conclusion of the European Council meeting in Venice, Portuguese Deputy Prime Minister and Foreign Minister Diogo Freitas do Amaral told us that he expected "a positive clarification of France's attitude toward us," from this meeting. According to him, EEC member states should reach the conclusion that "the Community's internal problems must not hinder its enlargement."

The minister hastened to explain that, according to official explanations given by Paris, "Mr Giscard d'Estaing's statements on enlargement were not aimed at interrupting negotiations. For the French president it was rather a question of getting the EEC countries to jointly consider the problems now existing within the EEC prior to the entry of new members. We hope that it will not take them too long to consider these problems and that it will be possible to conclude negotiations in accordance with the timetable originally agreed upon." Mr Freitas do Amaral hopes that the discussions which will take place in Paris at the beginning of July--that is, during Portuguese Prime Minister Sa Carneiro's visit--will make it possible to reconcile the two countries' interests. "Otherwise," he added, "we would have to reconsider many things and take all necessary measures to protect Portugal's interests."

The minister declined to interpret Mr Giscard d'Estaing's statements in the light of French domestic politics. He explained, however, that "the French people in general and farmers in the south in particular have nothing to fear from Portugal's integration in the Common Market because Portugal's economic dimensions and structures are unlikely to create any serious problems with respect to competition. Portugal's specific case in the context of candidacy for membership is probably not sufficiently well known. It is necessary to make an effort to clarify this point." Nor should general political objectives be overlooked--"a rejection of the Portuguese request would have harmful consequences for the future of democracy in Portugal. No EEC country--and France especially--would dare to assume responsibility for this."

Asked about the optimistic statements made by Mr Sa Carneiro, according to whom the transition period should last no longer than 5 years and the clauses of the Treaty of Rome relating to free circulation of workers should be brought into operation immediately after the document is signed, Mr Freitas do Amaral stated:

"This was merely a starting point for negotiations. However, the optimum does not always coincide with what is possible. We believe that it necessary to choose between two philosophies--the first stems from the country's economic backwardness and would require very long transition periods while the second takes the Portuguese people's temperament into account and advocates the adoption of short periods. Observed from a distance, problems do not mobilize our people, who always wait until the last moment before they face up to problems. Therefore, we are rather in favor of adopting short periods, maybe making an exception for agriculture."

In conclusion the minister confirmed his opposition to any "globalization" of Spanish and Portuguese candidacies.

"Portugal and Spain," he stated, "are two different countries. The degrees of development of their economies are not the same and Spain has not suffered the kind of structural upheavals to which Portugal was subjected after its revolution. Therefore it would be pointless to consider the two countries jointly. However, this does not mean that Portugal demands to be accepted as a member by the Community before Spain. If the study of the two Iberian countries' files were concluded at the same time we would see no objection to their simultaneous admission. But any possible problems which Spain's admission could create should not affect us. The date for Portugal's admission should not be dependent on Spain's admission."

FRANCE WARNED OVER DISRUPTIONS TO MOVEMENT OF PRODUCE

[Text] The Diplomatic Press Office of the Foreign Ministry has issued the following note:

In view of the most serious situation that has arisen--the prevention of the transit of Spanish produce through France--the Ministry of Foreign Affairs has summoned the French ambassador to express to him in the most energetic terms our protest over these unspeakable attacks, and to ask for immediate measures to prevent their repetition. The ambassador conveyed the French Government's regret over what had happened and gave all kinds of assurances that Spanish tructs will be adequately protected by the French security forces.

In view of the attack last night in the station at Tarascon on the railroad cars of a train carrying Spanish agricultural produce, our protest has been made again both in Paris and Madrid and a warning has been given that if events of this kind recur, a situation will arise that will oblige the Spanish authorities to take energetic measures to defend our interests.

The French Embassy has given assurances that the protection measures will be extended to railroad transportation. The French Government has also been asked to speed up compensation procedures to the highest degree.

CONGRESS ON EEC-LATIN AMERICA ECONOMIC COOPERATION OPENS

AU191022 Rome ANSA in English 0830 GMT 19 Jun 80

[Text] Rome, June 19 (ANSA)--The dialogue between the European Economic Community and Latin American countries will be resumed today with the opening in Rome of a three-day congress sponsored by the Italo-Latin American Institute with the cooperation of the Organization of American States (OAS) and the Italian Foreign Ministry.

The theme of the congress is the search for new and more effective forms of economic cooperation between the Community and the Latin American countries, which count a total population of 320 million on the continent including 150 million who live in substandard economic and social conditions.

The keynote speakers on the program for today's inaugural session are the OAS secretary general, Alejandro Orfila, the president of the Italo-Latin American Institute, Ambassador Augusto Gomez Villanueva of Mexico, and Italian Treasury Minister Filippo Maria Pandolfi. The three will address the congress on the role of Europe in the development of Latin American nations.

The OAS secretary general will present documents on the gap between the requirements of the Latin American nations in the area of cooperation and the European attitude towards the development of these nations.

Another document scheduled for delivery today by Orfila takes up "the indifference manifested in European cooperation policies towards the special problems of the Latin American area".

Following discussion on the general issues connected to cooperation in the development of the Latin American and Caribbean countries, the participants will move on to the specific points of technical and financial aspects of cooperation, EEC and OAS activities in the field, private financing, the transfer of technology and the like.

Present for the congress are delegations from the Latin American countries and all nine of the EEC member nations, from the OAS, the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development, the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade, the Organization of Economic Cooperation and Development, the International Fund for the Development of Agriculture, the European Investment Bank and [word indistinct] from the regional organizations, including the Latin American Economic Commission, the Interamerican Bank for Development and the Andean Pact.

The secretary general of the Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries, Rene Ortiz, is also expected to attend the congress.

AGREEMENT WITH USSR ON NUCLEAR EQUIPMENT SIGNED

WA192004 London REUTER in English 1957 GMT 19 Jun 80

[Text] Vienna, June 19, REUTER--Austria and the Soviet Union have signed an agreement to cooperate in building components for nuclear power plants and in selling power plant equipment to third countries.

Victor Korotov, Soviet minister for energy equipment construction, signed the agreement in Vienna today with Austriatom, a nuclear energy consortium belonging to four major Austrian firms.

According to the Austrian firms involved, the planned deals included construction of a turbine factory in Leningrad and delivery of Austrian components for a Soviet nuclear project in Libya.

An Austrian delegation will discuss project plans with Soviet specialists in Moscow this autumn, an Austriatom spokesman said.

NORWEGIAN DEFENSE MINISTER MEETS WITH ROESCH, MILITARY

AU190916 Vienna WIENER ZEITUNG in German 29 Jun 80 p 2

[Text] Thorvald Stoltenberg, defense minister of the Kingdom of Norway, paid the Austrian Army an official visit from 16-18 June. The Norwegian delegation included Maj Gen Rolv Elos, inspector general of the Norwegian Army, Deputy Ministerial Director Ole Martin Engh and Lt Col Tore Naess, aide to the defense minister. Brigadier Leif Schanche, Norwegian defense attache, and General Staff Colonel Johann Boehm, Austrian military and air attache, also participated in the program of the delegation's visit.

During his visit the Norwegian defense minister, among other things, inspected the National Defense Academy in Vienna and the Theresian Military Academy in Wiener Neustadt. He had talks with his Austrian opposite number, Defense Minister Otto Roesch, and with Infantry General Hubert Wingelbauer, inspector general of the Austrian Army. The talks were held in a very cordial atmosphere. Both sides agreed that it would be useful to further expand existing contacts between the Norwegian and Austrian armies.

BRIEFS

UNEXPLOITED BROWN COAL DEPOSIT--In the Zillingdorf-Neufeld region near Wiener Neustadt there is a large unexploited brown coal deposit. Trial borings have shown that this deposit, estimated to contain about 37 million tons, extends over an area of about 30 square kms at a depth of about 200 meters. If this coal were used for the production of electric power, it would also be possible to produce some uranium from the ashes. Chemical tests have shown that about 100 grams of uranium could be extracted per ton of ash. [Vienna VOLKSSTIMME in German 19 Jun 80 p 5 AU]

JOOP DEN UYL CITED ON TALKS WITH QOTBZADEH

LD190917 Rotterdam NRC HANDELSBLAD in Dutch 13 Jun 80 p 5

[Rob Meines report: "Den Uyl: Talks in West Strengthen Qotbzadeh's Position"]

[Text] Rotterdam, 13 June--Iranian Foreign Minister Sadeq Qotbzadeh is busily pursuing a strategy to get the other centers of power in his country to release the American hostages. He is trying to demonstrate that Iran is not alone in the world and that it really is finding a sympathetic ear for the grievances which the country accumulated during the shah's U.S.-backed regime.

This picture was given by Labor Party [PVDA] leader Joop den Uyl who, together with other Socialist leaders, had talks with Qotbzadeh in Oslo during the past few days. The Iranian minister himself requested these talks. It was not only the Socialist International which satisfied this need to find understanding in the world. In Oslo Qotbzadeh also had "secret" talks with Chinese Foreign Minister Huang Hua who happened to be there on a 4-day official visit. Today Qotbzadeh is returning to Sweden to have talks with the Swedish Government.

Den Uyl gained the impression from the talks with Qotbzadeh that the hostage problem could be solved if the Iranian people come to feel that the world does not consist entirely of enemies. That is precisely the reason behind the socialist leaders' determined intentions to pursue this goal.

These talks confirmed the impression which Olaf Palme (Sweden), Bruno Kreisky (Austria) and Felipe Gonzalez (Spain) obtained in Tehran at the end of May when they had talks with the Iranian leaders on behalf of the Socialist International. "At that time I was somewhat surprised that Kreisky and the others said after their return that there was no point in exerting further pressure on Iran at the moment. After the talks with Qotbzadeh I can understand their statements", Den Uyl told us yesterday.

"Qotbzadeh outlined the whole Iranian situation to us. He explained his policy which is very anti-American and equally anti-Russian. He had a great, and we think authentic, need to talk and to find somebody to listen to the Iranian people's grievances," Den Uyl said. In addition Qotbzadeh showed himself to be clearly in favor of a prompt solution to the hostage question.

The PVDA leader thinks that Iran's position in the world has been weakened to an extraordinary extent by the hostage affair. "The world is concentrating entirely on the 53 hostages and is no longer talking about the 35 years or so in which the shah, with U.S. backing, oppressed the country and tortured its subjects. In the Western world people are now saying: First release the hostages and then we will talk. The Iranians are saying: Talk first and then we will release the hostages."

Den Uyl emphasized that Qotbzadeh did not go to Oslo without consulting and obtaining agreement from the Revolution Council and that he was talking in his capacity as foreign minister, not privately. The Socialist International, for its part, had first had contact with "U.S. administration officials at the highest level," as Chairman Willy Brandt (West Germany) said in Oslo yesterday.

Brandt added that the Americans also think that this form of open dialogue with Iran could be useful. The Americans were also informed of the visit to Tehran by Kreisky, Palme and Gonzalez.

According to Den Uyl, Qotbzadeh's position in his country is strengthened when important organizations such as the Socialist International have talks with him. Den Uyl said that at no time during the talks did he feel the same as during negotiations on hostage affairs with the South Moluccans when he was prime minister. "We did not have to convince Qotbzadeh that the hostages must be released," Den Uyl said.

After yesterday's talks Qotbzadeh gave a press conference in which he repeated his usual statement that the hostage affair can only be solved in a broader perspective and that Iran must have the opportunity to express its grievances over the shah's regime in an international forum.

PRC FOREIGN MINISTER ARRIVES ON 2-DAY VISIT

Welcomed by Genscher

LD191019 Hamburg DPA in German 0948 GMT 19 Jun 80

[Excerpt] Bonn--Chinese Foreign Minister Huang Hua arrived today on a 2-day working visit to Bonn where he was welcomed by Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher. The first talks between them are due to take place this afternoon. The most important topics will be the world political situation, especially the situations in the Middle East and Asia.

Genscher Hosts Dinner

LD191716 Hamburg DPA in German 1725 GMT 19 Jun 80

[Text] Bonn--Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher stressed today in Bonn the good and positive development of relations between the Federal Republic and China. During a dinner for Chinese Foreign Minister Huang Hua, Genscher said this applies to political relations as well as economic and cultural cooperation.

The Chinese foreign minister arrived this morning for a 2-day working visit in Bonn. The visit is taking place 2 weeks before the trip by Helmut Schmidt and Genscher to Moscow, which should be of great interest to Beijing. Any connection between the two visits is being officially denied.

After his initial exchange of views with Genscher, Huang Hua talked with CDU Chairman Helmut Kohl and Hans-Juergen Wischnewski, deputy chairman of the SPD. On Friday he is to have an exchange of views with the chancellor and Federal President Karl Carstens.

During his dinner speech Genscher expressed the conviction that the serious Afghanistan crisis could only be overcome by a Soviet withdrawal of troops. The Soviet occupation of Afghanistan is a great international threat. He said: "We fear that a continuation of this situation cannot but have an effect on Europe, for detente is and remains indivisible."

On the situation in Southeast Asia Genscher said that Bonn welcomed any endeavours to find a political solution to the Kampuchean question. The Federal Government sympathizes with the Kampuchean people and their endless suffering, and with the countless refugees in Southeast Asia.

Huang Hua Attacks 'Hegemonism'

LD192128 Hamburg DPA in German 2045 GMT 19 Jun 80

[Text] Bonn--Huang Hua, Chinese foreign minister, sharply condemned any form of international hegemonism in Bonn on Thursday. Without directly mentioning the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan, Huang Hua said the tense situation in Southwest Asia and the Persian Gulf confirmed the Chinese premier's statement that the world situation would become even more tense and unstable in the eighties as a result of the expansion and aggression of hegemonists. This is why it was important for China and the Federal Republic to exchange opinions on international questions and to expand their cooperation in the joint cause of maintaining world peace.

Huang Hua expressed these views during a dinner given for him by Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher.

INTERIOR MINISTER BAUM INVITED TO PRC

LD191759 Hamburg DPA in German 1521 GMT 19 Jun 80

[Text] Bonn--Federal Interior Minister Gerhart Baum has been invited to visit the People's Republic of China. The invitation was issued by Zhao Cangbi, Chinese minister for public security, who ended a 1-week fact-finding trip to the FRG on Thursday.

Baum was in Beijing late last year. Both ministers want to continue their exchange of information about questions on police matters.

KING KHALID DELEGATION CONCLUDES VISIT, DEPARTS FOR RIYADH

Discussion of EC Statement

LD191111 Hamburg DPA in German 0947 GMT 19 Jun 80

[Excerpts] Bonn--There is far-reaching agreement between the Federal Republic and Saudi Arabia in the assessment of world political problems and international economic questions. This was underlined today by both Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher and his Saudi counterpart, Prince Sa'ud al-Faysal, at the end of the 4-day state visit to Bonn by King Khalid. King Khalid earlier took his leave of Federal President Karl Carstens before departing on a visit of several hours to Berlin.

Genscher listed as examples of agreement the joint belief that the Afghanistan crisis could only be overcome through the withdrawal of Soviet troops, and that the independence of the countries of the Third World must be safeguarded.

According to Prince Sa'ud, the Saudi guests were comprehensively briefed by Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt and Foreign Minister Genscher about the latest Middle East declaration by the EC which, though in Riyadh's eyes it represents an important fundamental step, does not fully correspond with "our hopes and expectations." Saudi Arabia had especially hoped for a concrete standpoint concerning an Arab jurisdiction over Jerusalem and the role of the PLO as the representative of the Palestinians. Prince Sa'ud described as "positive aspects" the condemnation of the Israeli settlements policy and the first ever mention of the central Jerusalem problem in an EC declaration.

Federal Foreign Minister Genscher, concerning the recognition of the PLO desired by the Arab side, stressed that the Palestinian people themselves must decide who are to represent them. Concerning Bonn's standpoint on the separate peace endeavors between Cairo and Jerusalem, Genscher said that the European Community, just as the United States, Egypt and Israel, desires a just, lasting and comprehensive peace settlement in the Middle East. The Camp David agreement serves this aim; therefore, such endeavors should be supported.

Both ministers agreed that the state visit has contributed to the deepening of the already existing "very good and friendly relations" between Bonn and Riyadh. This good bilateral relationship could also have a positive effect in other spheres. Prince Sa'ud pointed out that new areas of cooperation had been opened up back in 1976 following the visit of Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt. He hoped that the present visit would have similar consequences.

Khalid Visits West Berlin

LD191715 Hamburg DPA in German 1553 GMT 19 Jun 80

[Text] Berlin--During a visit of several hous to Berlin today King Khalid of Saudi Arabia described the town as a "fortress of freedom" which prevails against destructive currents. While putting his entry into the town's golden book, Khalid expressed the hope that Berlin, once so powerful and great, will be reincorporated in the future in to the entire territory of Germany, just as Jerusalem would like to be reincorporated to Arab Palestinian territory.

A reception was held for the king in Charlottenburg Castle by the Berlin Senat and the House of Representatives.

Dietrich Stobbe, mayor of Berlin, thanked the king for including Berlin in his visit to the Federal Republic. Berlin is a good example of the fact that crises may be alleviated and an accomodation of interests reached. Afterward a conversation took place between King Khalid and Stobbe, during which the latter informed his guest about the problem of a divided Berlin and a divided Germany.

Khalid went into the town in the afternoon. At the Reichstag building, not far from the Brandenburg Gate at the Berlin Wall, the king was received by Richard von Weizsaecker, vice president of the Bundestag. After the 4-hour Berlin visit, the king flwe to Bonn where he was scheduled to have a final conversation with Helmut Schmidt. He is to fly home in the evening.

Departure for Home

[Text] Bonn--At the end of his 4-day state visit to the Federal Republic, King Khalid of Saudi Arabia left for Riyadh on Thursday evening. The king's Boeing-747 left Cologne-Bonn Airport on schedule.

Just before his departure the Arab monarch had a final conversation with Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt. The latter had gone to the airport.

The king had his last conversation with his host, Karl Carstens, in the morning. After their 30-minute conversation Carstens gave his guest a traditional military departure ceremony. In the afternoon, Khalid visited Berlin.

Press Comment

[Press review]

[Text] KOELNER STADT-ANZEIGER writes: Lately only bad news had come from the countries which produce crude oil. Viewed against this background, the visit by Saudi Arabia's king and his entourage is a bright spot. The Federal Republic's biggest oil supplier is prepared to send even more oil in case of emergency. What is more important, however, is that the Saudis obviously intend to stick to their moderate price and quantity policy. As far as the world economy is concerned, this constitutes a stabilizing factor which cannot be rated highly enough.

Duesseldorf's RHEINISCHE POST has this to say: If so desired, the black gold will flow in even richer streams into the tanks of German consumers in the future. Khalid's visit would have been worthwhile if it had been concluded with that alone. But it would be absurd to speak of a German kowtow to the king from the Orient.

It is necessary to recall this, too: Saudi Arabia is one of those states in the Near and Middle East which has remained responsive to the Western world. There are but few of them. Through their moderate policy, states like Saudi Arabia make it possible for the Western world, and thus for the Federal Republic, to live up even halfway to its moral commitments--which, as a rule, are tantamount to financial burdens--toward states of the Third and Fourth Worlds and toward a country like Israel.

HESSISCH-NEIDERSAECHSICHE ALLGEMEINE of Kassel writes: The Bonn protocol saw no reason for restraint. After all, Saudi Arabia is lending us billions; it is prepared to supply even more oil if necessary, and it is the most important trade partner in this region and the last Western bastion in the Gulf. The fact that King Khalid has called Berlin a "fortress of freedom" may have turned the feeling of satisfaction into applause. His comparison with Jerusalem, however, could be mastered only with utter diplomacy. The king wants to win it back as the holy town of Islam while the Israelis continue to claim it as their capital. Even the Europeans would not succeed in mediating there although they are skillful when it comes to dancing on eggs.

The daily DIE WELT stresses: The state visit of the king of Saudi Arabia to Bonn certainly is one of the more pleasant political events of these months. Traditional relations between the Germans and Arabs and the Western orientation of Saudi Arabia were obvious. But what is called the Near Eastern problem still remains: the problems of the State of Israel to which the Germans cannot but remain particularly attentive. And there is the Palestinian problem which the Germans must handle even more carefully than the other states of the West. Even though "wisdom" and commonsense seem to dictate it, the PLO is not acceptable. This comprises the German-Arab dissent.

SCHWAEBISCHE ZEITUNG of Leutkirch notes: There is talk of "far-reaching agreement on all important problems" which would be correct only if King Khalid either would not always consider the Near Eastern problem as the no 1 problem, or if Bonn would switch "to a great extent" to hostility vis-a-vis Israel-Egyptian peace. The one cannot and the other may not. So one can hope that this was just another social-liberal effort to appear to the voters as the darling of the world--and that it was not an attempt to play up to Israel's enemies.

PUBLIC DISCUSSION CONTINUES OVER CARTER LETTER TO SCHMIDT

[Thomas Kielinger Washington dispatch: "Carter Letter 'Brusque to the Point of Rudeness,' Genscher Complained to Muskie"]

[Text] According to confidential information, Zbigniew Brzezinski, presidential adviser on national security, is in the center of the latest irritation between Bonn and Washington caused by President Carter's letter to Helmut Schmidt. The letter to the chancellor, inspired and drafted by Brzezinski according to research done by DIE WELT, had not been cleared with the highest authority in the State Department, that is, with Secretary of State Muskie.

This development not only elicited maximum displeasure in Bonn (Cabinet opinion: "After all, we are the best allies of the United States"), but has also continued to occupy official Washington. Once again it has brought to light the old controversy between the Security Council and the State Department over the direction of U.S. foreign policy.

State Department medium-level officials were given a draft letter to read when it had not yet been clear when, in what form, and whether or not the letter would be dispatched. The letter contains a censorious instruction to Helmut Schmidt on the topic of tactical nuclear weapons [TNF] in Central Europe.

The German chancellor was reminded that the NATO decision on the so-called TNF weapons is unshakable and that it cannot be up to the Germans or to anybody else to revive the subject. Such attempts could only arouse new suspicion about the position of the Federal Republic.

DIE WELT learned the following details from an official of the administration who saw the draft and the final version of the letter:

By his own hand President Carter toned down several passages of the original text. At two points he also corrected the grammar of the Brzezinski draft. But despite the amendments, what this involves is a "rather bad" letter whose tone is "brusque to the point of rudeness." The tenor was "dictatorial, suspicious," and obviously did not even contain the minimum of polite phrases otherwise customary between business partners: "This obviously was not a letter to a friend," we were told.

People in the State Department understand the vehement reaction from Bonn which "predictably" followed the letter. This reaction passed through the following stages:

On Friday morning, Bonn time, Foreign Minister Genscher immediately made a telephone call to his U.S. counterpart, Edmund Muskie, to let him know, in a rather agitated frame of mind, that such letters "can only do harm."

Muskie tried to calm Genscher down but he probably did not fully succeed. After all, it must have been an effort for Muskie to digest this most recent move of Zbigniew Brzezinski and not to show his own indignation too much.

After the talk with Genscher Edmund Muskie wrote a memorandum to the President to inform Carter exactly about the excitement of his German partner. Thereafter, the White House and chancellor's office exchanged a few cables which were all tailored to take the edge out of the newest German-American dispute.

Chances for keeping the family quarrel covered up disappeared, however, when Monday's STERN carried the news of the Carter letter, due to an international indiscretion (the Americans said: "It did not come from us").

It is being assumed in Washington that Bonn, which is still highly indignant by the letter from the White House, tried to retaliate through the indiscretion. The "sinner" Brzezinski was supposed to be exposed because Bonn is quite certain that he was the originator of the letter. According to information gathered here in Washington, Bonn has fully succeeded.

Zbigniew Brzezinski presently stands on uncertain ground as regards the degree and extent of his influence. He has been pushed into the background of public attention by the new Secretary of State Muskie, who is aware of publicity. The time has passed when he dealt with just a polite, reserved colleague like Cyrus Vance. The opportunity to gain some ground in his very own field, security policy, was offered to him when irritation increased in Washington due to Helmut Schmidt's public statements on the TNF problem. Since there exists basic agreement between the Security Council and the State Department on this matter, Brzezinski obviously felt encouraged to act strongly.

In the form and content, however, he went too far so that he created not only an avoidable quarrel between Bonn and Washington, but even undermined his own position in the administration. If there exists a majority opinion in the State Department today, it would be: Brzezinski is a bad influence; he is impertinent, inconsequent and willful; his policies lack "profoundness".

And in the Bonn Foreign Office, which cooperates very well and "very closely" with the Americans as U.S. Ambassador Stoessel said, nonaligned professional diplomats are shaking their heads and saying: "Our Polish friend in Washington mistrusts us more than our Polish adversaries in Warsaw."

DW191015 Cologne Deutschlandfunk Network in German to East and West Germany 0505 GMT 19 Jun 80

[Press review]

[Text] The Dortmund RUHR-NACHRICHTEN writes: A letter from Carter to Schmidt just a few days prior to the latter's Moscow trip was bound to elicit speculation about divergent views between Bonn and Washington. It has been impossible to refute these speculations with the subsequent official statements on this side and across the Atlantic. In the event of full conformity of political positions, careful governments would have refrained from taking such a spectacular step. If its only purpose was to recall common negotiating positions--which is the official stance in Bonn and Washington--the Venice world economic summit would have been the ideal place for such talks.

The editorial in the Ludwigshafen DIE RHEINPFALZ says in part: By his epistle to Helmut Schmidt President Jimmy Carter has continued his series of unusual interventions in European affairs. The idea that the Europeans might venture a foreign policy on their own is an obsession which bothers the National Security Council staff in the White House. Carter's letter to Schmidt, last but not least, was very emotional because the White House would like to reserve for itself the problem of medium-range missiles in Europe as an instrument of negotiation with the Soviets. The people in the National Security Council, who are planning on a long-term basis, are now afraid that Schmidt, with the support of Giscard d'Estaing, will use this hand of cards to introduce a separate European initiative vis-a-vis the East.

In this connection NEUE HANNOVERSCHE raises the following question: Does the chancellor need any prompting just before his Moscow trip? Things are not at their best with the Western alliance--though in a sense different from what the opposition in this country seeks to make people believe. The ailment that needs to be cured is not a lack of allegiance but the weakness in leadership of a world power whose top politicians dangerously seek salvation in an undifferentiated policy of strength--no matter whether they do so out of conviction or out of tactical election considerations. Can the chancellor's Moscow trip reap any success under such circumstances? The fact alone that dialogue is taking place must not be underrated. Still, in the long run this will not be sufficient for a relaxation of tensions in East-West relations.

MANNHEIMER MORGEN argues: The Americans believe they have reason to warn the chancellor against performing a solo act in Moscow. That must sound like mockery in the ears of a partner who has strongly supported the NATO decision to close the arms gap, a decision made in Brussels. Schmidt has caused some irritation with untactful statements, but once the matter was clarified Washington should consider the blunder--and it was not more than that--as having been ironed out.

MUENCHNER MERKUR is of a different opinion: The SPD chairman confirms how right Carter was to send his letter. He announced in a loud-mouthed way that such an important state as the Federal Republic must look after its own interests. The American warnings therefore were said to be out of place. It could not be more informative and revealing; it could not be more discrediting to Schmidt either.

FRANKFURTER ALLGEMEINE ZEITUNG notes: The American President is disquieted by Schmidt's visit to Moscow, regardless of which diplomatic formulations he may use to express it. This is not shadowboxing, it is reality--estrangement is increasing. Is the chancellor running that risk in order to bring back from Moscow rhetorical answers to rhetorical questions?

DIE WELT writes: It seems that for the Kremlin the mere fact that the federal chancellor will visit Moscow is a success. Obviously, Moscow, following the Afghanistan invasion which was considered a "faux pas" not only by the West, seems to be looking for ways to continue its foreign policy which has been discredited by this invasion.

Brezhnev does not want to discuss Afghanistan, but rather detente--this is how the Russians are baiting Bonn with "signals". They hint that Schmidt will indeed achieve something. But he who wants to restore detente must naturally also discuss disarmament. In this respect Schmidt will stand on thin ice in Moscow.

LAW OF THE SEAS QUARREL EXPECTED BETWEEN BONN, WASHINGTON

DW200852 Duesseldorf HANDELSBLATT in German 20/21 Jun 80 p 4

[Correspondent dispatch signed Wff.: "Bonn Against U.S. Policy"]

[Text] Bonn, 19 June 1980--A quarrel over the law of the seas negotiations that have been in progress for years is taking shape between the United States and the Federal Republic. It has been learned in Bonn after a dialogue between President Carter's special commissioner for law of the seas questions, Richardson, and Federal Economics Minister Otto Graf Lambsdorff that the Americans lately have been urging the passage of the existing text for a convention even though, viewed from the Federal Republic's view, this would create the long-term danger of having access to the seabed deposits being blocked to private enterprises. What this primarily involves is the draft of a revision clause under which, with the majority of the member states--meaning the developing countries--amendements can be railroaded through. The financing of the envisaged international seabed authority by means of dues payments is meeting with Bonn objections because of its prejudicial character.

The Bundestag Economics Committee has unanimously adopted an interim bill on deep-sea mining. This is intended to safeguard the activities of German enterprises in deep-sea mining for as long as no international agreement exists. A similar law is awaiting presidential signature in the United States.

SUEDDEUTSCHE ZEITUNG: CEMA MEETING REVEALS BOYCOTT IMPACT

DW200951 Munich SUEDDEUTSCHE ZEITUNG in German 20 Jun 80 p 4

[Josef Riedmiller article: "Carter Hit Moscow After All"]

[Text] The 34th annual meeting of the Council for Economic Mutual Assistance (CEMA) came to a close in Prague 2 days prior to the opening of the summit meeting of the Western industrial states in Venice. The problems which the Eastern economic bloc finds itself facing most likely are in many respects similar to those with which the Western world must cope. [paragraph continues]

The increasing scarcity of energy and raw materials which entails higher prices and an upward surge of amounts of investment for obtaining new sources--they are phenomena which countries in the East and West alike are suffering. Neither side has any patent medicine for evading the shortage, except the remedies already known: saving, substituting, researching, and exploring.

And yet we will hear from Prague that the socialist countries, due to their better social and economic system, are better capable of mastering these problems than are the capitalist countries. There may even be something to that, for in the East bloc the instruments for controlling the shortage and the dexterity of the people to live with it are incomparably more manifest than in the West. They are, in fact, the basis of the system. But these "advantages" cannot balance the disadvantages and impediments resulting from an economy which is planned and bureaucratized from beginning to end: the lack of flexibility and innovating force, a low rate of labor productivity, and a high input of energy and raw materials in the production process.

The CEMA countries, led by the Soviet Union, have tried in the past 10 years to overcome these weaknesses with the help of intensified technology transfer from the West; they have even been successful in some fields although at the expense of high indebtedness. Slower production increases in the industrial field, necessitating reduced production targets, indicate that socialism also has its limits. The U.S. trade embargo, caused by the Red Army invasion of Afghanistan, seems to have had some effect in this respect. Soviet Government chief Kosygin did not deny it in Prague, but he denied that the "economic pressure" will work to the political benefit of the United States.

News coming from unofficial Soviet sources, however, indicate somewhat more. It seems that the Soviet Union achieved some substitute for the canceled American grain supplies, but this obviously could not keep the slaughtering or "adaptation" of livestock reserves to the existing fodder means, as happened already 4 years ago. The meat reserves created that way have been used up in the meantime, and livestock is again being cared for to provide for the consumption of tourists who will come to see the Olympics--so that reports on poor food supplies for Soviet citizens sound rather credible, particularly in the provinces. In the meantime, Moscow has denied that there have been worker strikes in the Togliatti and Gorkiy automobile plants. There exists no firm evidence to support one statement or the other although some things support the assumption that there are limits to becoming accustomed to shortcomings. It is puzzling why Politburo member Kirilenko is now visiting the personnel of another enormous automobile factory on the Kama. There is a simple explanation, however, for why the respective authorities apply tougher measures against attempts to set up trade unions which will be independent of the state, tougher measures than "normal" means applied against the dissident movement. There are very many workers and not all of them are content.

President Carter's embargo policy has hit the Soviet Union at a sensitive spot, but it simultaneously increased Moscow's intention to become as independent as possible. The Russians never liked to be dependent on the West; they did not like it at the time of the tsars either. Carter's selective embargo has strengthened their deeprooted mistrust of everything external. Brezhnev's policy of "opening toward the West," conceived under the pressure of having to catch up, was never fully accepted by the higher leadership organs. The advocates of self-sufficiency have gained some ground in past months. The Prague decisions also indicate that coordination of the 1980-1985 5-year plan with regard to energy, raw materials transport and equipment, is aimed at curtailing as much as possible the East bloc countries' dependence on the West. The inclusion of small CEMA countries in this Moscow plan must further curtail their economic and political leeway.

A third element of future CEMA policy, which has become more evident in Prague than before, consists in the attempt to link the countries of the Third World to the economy of the East bloc. Some states of that region which have had close, friendly relations with Moscow, have dispatched observers to Prague. Kosygin said that politically liberated countries can achieve their economic independence only with the help of socialist countries. But some raw materials are more easily accessible in the Third World than they are in Siberia.

SPD DEPUTIES REVOLT AGAINST AID TO TURKEY

DW191108 Frankfurt FRANKFURTER RUNDSCHAU in German 19 Jun 80 pp 1, 2

[Rolf Dietrich Schwartz dispatch: "Displeasure in the SPD About Aid to Turkey"]

[Text] Bonn, 18 June--Vehement displeasure has been voiced in parts of the SPD Bundestag faction about the Federal Government's aid to Turkey on which the Bundestag will make a decision this Thursday within the framework of the 1980 supplementary budget.

The Federal Republic's financial aid to Turkey within the framework of the Alliance met with determined criticism in parts of the SPD faction. In a special faction meeting Wednesday, which was convoked on short notice, some voices even urged a rejection of the 1980 supplementary budget which will be subject to a vote in the Bundestag this Thursday and in which approximately DM100 million are earmarked for additional military assistance for Ankara.

Thus displeasure over the increasing foreign burdens on the federal budget again erupted in the larger of the two coalition factions, a displeasure which had already become evident following the EC compromise to the advantage of Great Britain a few weeks ago. Critics of the financial aid to Turkey, especially of the military arms assistance, justify their position with the constant violation of human rights in the southeastern NATO state.

Deputies Manfred Coppik, Norbert Gansel and others in the special faction meeting advocated a Bundestag resolution in which the clear expectation should be voiced on the occasion of the adoption of the supplementary budget that the Ankara government will pay special attention to human rights, use the foreign economic aid primarily for improving the standard of living of a broad strata of people, and reserve the military aid exclusively for NATO commitments.

The critics were joined by other deputies who maintained that the formation of an in-depth opinion had been prevented in the special faction session. Instead, a compromise was agreed upon envisaging that faction and party spokesmen should express in separate statements the contents of the Bundestag resolution which would then make the resolution superfluous. It was not yet certain even after the special session on Wednesday night whether the critics of the supplementary budget would support it on 19 June if there were no such Turkey resolution. Agreement existed in the faction on the justification of the contents of such a resolution, but the majority maintained that a completion of the supplementary budget in this form would not make sense.

Observers expect that on 18 June the CDU/CSU faction will agree to the supplementary budget, particularly because of the aid to Turkey. It will, therefore, probably not be endangered even if some SPD Bundestag deputies were to reject it.

AGHA SHAHI COMMENTS ON AFGHAN COMMITTEE PROSPECTS

NC191515 Paris AFP in English 1507 GMT 19 Jun 80

[Text] Paris, June 19 (AFP)--French officials informed Pakistan Foreign Minister Agha Shahi today that the establishment of a three-man committee by the Islamic Conference to find a political solution to the Afghanistan crisis was a "useful and positive" move, an authoriative source said here.

French support for the committee's efforts was indicated when Mr. Shahi conferred with French Foreign Minister Jean Francois-Poncet. Mr. Shahi, who arrived here yesterday and who met earlier today with President Valery Giscard d'Estaing, said that his conversations here had been "most constructive and productive."

The Pakistani official is expected to go to Belgrade tomorrow and then participate in a meeting of the Islamic Conference committee Saturday in Geneva.

Mr. Shahi said that he though that a solution could be found to the Afghan situation that would be acceptable to all parties involved. Such a solution, he said, would "reconcile the fundamental rights of the Afghan people, the Soviet interests and the security concerns of Iran and Pakistan."

Mr. Shahi added that the committee wanted to "give an honorable way out for all parties. Nobody wants to humiliate the Soviet Union but we don't want to be intimidated because the Soviet Union is a superpower."

The other members of the committee are Iranian Foreign Minister Sadeq Qotbzadeh and Islamic Conference Secretary-General Habib Chatti.

Mr. Shahi said that it was "regrettable" that the Kabul government had refused to send a delegation to the committee's meeting in Geneva. Only the Afghan rebels will be represented. He added that the committee had never expected the Soviet Union to send delegates.

The Pakistan official said the group would first seek to halt the fighting in Afghanistan and then to persuade Moscow to remove its troops. The next step, he said, would be to arrange for a "national government representative of all political tendencies in Afghanistan with an independent leader, which would follow a friendly policy towards the Soviet Union."

Mr. Shahi said that he had been "encouraged" by the reactions of the European governments with which he has had talks. He visited London, Bonn, Vienna and Bucharest before coming to Paris.

LE MONDE SUPPORTS EC MIDEAST STATEMENT

[Editorial: "A Step"]

[Text] The Nine's statement on the Middle East has turned out to be better than might have been feared. This document certainly does not constitute a great "step forward" as regards the French position but is that necessarily a bad thing? Just because the Nine had decided to compare their viewpoints why should they have aligned with the most advanced theories, in other words those held by Paris? Is it not more important that, after many tentative efforts and laborious negotiations, they have succeeded in reaching agreement on a "common core?"

Two elements in the statement are particularly striking: This is the first time that the Nine have come out clearly in favor of involving the PLO in negotiations on an all-embracing settlement in the Middle East, and it is also the first time that the EEC member countries have promised to guarantee a possible solution "specifically and bindingly, including on the spot," in other words by sending contingents to monitor the security of Israeli borders.

The Nine's key idea--is it really new?--is to simultaneously obtain Palestinian recognition of Israel's right to exist within secure and recognized borders and Israeli recognition of the Palestinians' right to self-determination. This is an enormous task; it implies a very strong political will to succeed not only from the Europeans but also from Washington and probably Moscow. It is possibly at this level that the shoe pinches: Do the European leaders really have this determination? Or are they simply trying to move away from Washington, which is paralyzed by the presidential campaign, and from Jerusalem, which is becoming increasingly set in a policy of obstinacy--not to say provocation?

The only thing which can be done to obtain clarification is to wait now until the EEC presidency--Italy today, Luxembourg as from July--establishes the "contacts" with all parties concerned for which the Nine's statement makes provision. In principle it is only after seeing the results of this consultation that the Community will take a diplomatic initiative either in the UN General Assembly or even in the Security Council (where the United States could modify its attitude once the election campaign is over and the failure of the Camp David process is definite) or at a specific regional conference or even at a conference among the great powers. In any case it is clear that, to succeed, any initiative will need some U.S. support if only because only the United States has the means--if any country has--of convincing Israel.

This statement by the Nine would however have been more convincing if it had come in a different European climate: It has to be pointed out that this step--which nonetheless represents a diplomatic victory for Mr 'Arafat--has been taken by the Community at a time when it is passing through one of the most serious crises in its history. It is as if the aim was precisely to gloss over this crisis whose solution will require not only time but major sacrifices from several countries, especially France and the FRG. It has to be noted that while nobody in Venice denied the existence of this European crisis, everybody agreed to discuss it later. For instance when the election dates facing Mr Giscard d'Estaing and Mr Schmidt are over....

SCHMIDT POSITION ON ARMS DEPLOYMENT VIEWED

[Editorial: "Mr Schmidt and the Euromissiles"]

[Text] Try as he will to take every precaution, Chancellor Schmidt's upcoming trip to Moscow still seems to be worrying his American partners. Both Bonn and Washington have taken pains to deny that the letters recently exchanged between the two capitals on the subject of this trip (a letter from the U.S. President to the chancellor was followed by an exchange between Mr Genscher and Mr Muskie, the two countries' respective chiefs of diplomacy) constituted a warning from the United States calling on Germany not to undermine the decision on Euromissiles taken by NATO last December. However, there is reason to wonder what the point of this correspondence could have been--it has been confirmed that it related mainly to the theater weapons--if the two sides were in complete harmony on this subject.

It is true that the chancellor has moderated his line somewhat. His latest statements seem completely aligned with the NATO stance whose two aspects he merely specified: the decision to deploy 572 medium-range ballistic and cruise missiles in West Europe from the end of 1983 but, at the same time, an offer of negotiations to the USSR on monitoring and limiting these weapons. He will probably go no further than this in his talks in Moscow and will take care not to make any other specific proposal. Nonetheless nobody has forgotten the suggestion he made in April, aimed at taking advantage of the 3-year period required for the deployment of the Western theater weapons, to freeze these arms systems in the two camps.

By asserting now that this freeze could last no longer than 3 years Mr Schmidt is behaving like the Atlantic class' model pupil; indeed the Soviets should stop the deployment of their SS-20 missiles now--deployment which was recently speeded up and is now being carried out at the rate of more than one missile per week--while the West would continue to prepare for the deployment of their missiles in 1983.

This suggestion still worries the Americans. "A freeze at the present time," the State Department spokesman said on 16 June, "would jeopardize a decision which was laboriously worked out by NATO and would leave untouched the very situation which this decision was supposed to rectify, namely a major Soviet advantage in the sphere of theater nuclear weapons." As British Defense Secretary Pym has just recalled in support of his government's decision to accept 160 American cruise missiles on two British bases, the USSR, which has not dismantled its former "Eurostrategic" systems, now has 930 medium-range missiles; in other words a four-to-one advantage over NATO. Even the deployment of the 572 American Pershing-2 and cruise missiles officially planned will therefore not be enough to restore the West's numerical superiority.

The debate is still academic at present since the Soviets will not countenance either negotiations, unless NATO cancels or suspends its deployment decision, or even a freeze. According to them, their new missiles are only there to match their partners' existing weapons.

However, this unreasonable attitude may not be definitive. It is conceivable that the Kremlin will accept or even propose a freeze in 1 or 2 years' time when its arsenal is complete. Pressure will then be very strong in Europe to revoke the NATO decision, particularly on the leftwing of Mr Schmidt's own party which he increasingly has to take into account.

LE MONDE EXAMINES 'CHILLY' RELATIONS WITH SPAIN

[Editorial: "Chilly Atmosphere Between Paris and Madrid"]

[Text] The very serious disquiet caused in Lisbon and Madrid by Giscard d'Estaing's recent statements on the need for a "pause" in the process of expanding the Common Market is likely to turn quickly into an outright crisis in France's relations with Portugal and Spain. Worried by an about-face which they are tending to explain by "election" considerations, the Lisbon and Madrid governments quickly counterattacked.

Portuguese Government chief Sa Carneiro, who is due to make an official visit to France on 1 July, intends to plead the cause of his country's entry into the common market in The Hague and Brussels this week. He intends to ask that the timetable drawn up for negotiations be strictly respected. Once these assurances have been obtained he will remind the French leaders of the solemn promises made last fall by Barre and Mr Giscard d'Estaing who stated at that time that they "wanted to make every effort to facilitate Portugal's entry."

At present Mr Sa Carneiro is pretending to believe that the halt recommended by Mr Giscard d'Estaing does not really concern his country. Madrid is not cherishing the same illusion, and press reactions there have once again shown just how easily the atmosphere in Franco-Spanish relations could become angry. This is a new and serious chill in the stormy relations which France and Spain have had for the past 40 years.

The serious incidents which took place in the eastern Pyrenees on Monday, 16 June, will clearly not improve matters. The destruction by a squad of French farmers of some 10 Spanish trucks loaded with fruits and various goods sparked off an immediate response from Spanish truckers who decided to block the roads into Catalonia, and did so successfully. The first incident of this type was reported 6 May, but the scope of Monday's incident and the context in which it took place are likely to stir up a new anti-French campaign on the other side of the Pyreness, while ETA [Basque Fatherland and Liberty] the Basque separatist organization, already seems intent on reviving its "vacation war" of summer 1979, taking French interests in Spain as its main target.

Monday evening Paris assured Adolfo Suarez's government that "the appropriate measures would be taken to avoid any repetition of these incidents." However, it is difficult to imagine convoys of Spanish trucks being permanently protected on French roads by the Republican security companies and helicopters, especially since the French farmers' organizations seem determined to pursue their action vigorously.

Already affected by a difficult winter and obtaining lower prices than last year, French fruit and vegetable producers seem once again very sensitive to Spanish competition. Relatively low wages and even lower employers' social security contributions enable the Spanish producers to produce at a much lower cost than those in the south of France.

"There is no longer any malaise between France and Spain," Mr Adolfo Suarez stated in Paris during his official visit last November. It is true that at that time Mr Giscard d'Estaing was proclaiming with equal conviction that "Spain's entry into the Common Market is not only a legitimate aspiration but is only natural." Paris and Madrid must once again face a serious review of their relations.

[Text] Talks are under way at the Quirinale [Palace] between President Pertini and the American delegation composed of President Carter, his adviser Brzezinski and Secretary of State Muskie. The Italian delegation also includes Foreign Minister Colombo. A meeting with Prime Minister Cossiga will be held later this morning. After meeting the pope at the Vatican tomorrow morning, Carter will leave for Venice where he will meet German Chancellor Schmidt on the eve of the summit of the most industrialized Western countries.

Conclusion of Talks

[Text] Talks between Presidents Carter and Pertini at the Quirinale have ended. Foreign Ministers Muskie and Colombo were present at the talks. Soon there will be a meeting and a working lunch with Premier Cossiga. Today's program includes a visit to the Forum, placing a wreath at the tomb of the unknown soldier and an official reception in the evening.

Topics of 'Cordial' Talks Noted

[Text] Here is a report by Claudio Angelini on President Carter's talks with President Pertini:

Great cordiality, exceptional friendship and perfect identity of views: the spokesmen of the Quirinale and the Farnesina [Foreign Ministry] have seldom used such clear and enthusiastic words in commenting on talks between the two heads of state but the climate created by Carter and Pertini has, it seems, overwhelmed traditional diplomatic prudence. There were great smiles before and after the meeting and jokes during the work. Thus Carter informed our president that last night he jogged 10 kms in the gardens of the Quirinale, Pertini replied that he cycled for at least 15 kms. And when the American head of state, referring to his conspicuous entourage, said "we have invaded the Quirinale," our president replied "you and your associates are always welcome".

However, let us have a look at the themes dealt with during the meetings, that is during the talks between Carter and Pertini on their own and at the successive enlarged session which included Foreign Minister Colombo, Secretary of State Muskie, Ambassadors Gardener and Pansa Cedranio, (Abbenvisti), Roenschler, Secretary General Maccanico and Farnesina experts.

The main topic was NATO and its strengthening. The specific problems included Afghanistan, Iran, the Mediterranean, the Middle East and bilateral relations. Carter said that Pertini was the first and only Western head of state to send a letter of protest to Khomeyni after the seizure of American diplomats in Tehran. He added that the great friendship between Italy and the United States was demonstrated in all international forums, including the United Nations and the Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development. He then paid tribute to our country for the activity carried out during the Italian presidency of the EEC. Pertini praised Carter for the clarity of the U.S. stands on the main problems of the present international situation. Explaining the European attitude toward the Middle East, Colombo said there was no conflict between the Community's agreement on the Palestinians and the Camp David agreements.

The talks lasted 40 minutes longer than envisaged and this, too, represented a confirmation of their importance and cordiality demonstrated by the two sides. At the end, Carter left the Quirinale and arrived at the Villa Madama [prime minister's office] by helicopter to meet President of the Council of Ministers Cossiga.

Meeting with Cossiga

[Excerpt] For the last 15 minutes, Carter has been talking to Prime Minister Cossiga at the prime minister's office. Here is a report by Angelo Haver:

The political themes already taken up during the first meeting at the presidential palace this morning are being dealt with more thoroughly during the talks which are now underway between Carter and Prime Minister Cossiga. They are examining problems which obviously could not have been taken up by our president of the republic because of his different juridical-constitutional powers in relation to the executive. This is not so for Carter who is, as we know, the head of both state and government. It is already well known what these topics are. Washington correspondents of the Italian newspapers recounted them this morning: relations with the Soviet Union after the invasion of Afghanistan; the Iranian question--which is still far from being solved; and the economic and especially energy crisis of the Western countries. Apart from the future of these problems, the question which perhaps worries Carter even more is the hegemonist role of the United States in the Western world, which some recent European initiatives seem to put into question. We shall see in the evening when the seat of government announces the results of the talks whether there is room for optimism and how to achieve the solution of these problems.

Visit's Effect on City

LD201342 Rome Domestic Service in Italian 1300 GMT 20 Jun 80

[Text] Carter is to begin a brief tour this afternoon. In the morning he first had talks with Pertini and then with Cossiga at the Villa Madama. This afternoon he will visit the Forum and perhaps the historic center. Then he will have a meeting at the Villa Taverna, the residence of the U.S. ambassador, with American diplomats in Italy. In the evening, there will be dinner at the Quirinale which will be attended by 250 guests, including party secretaries. Because of security measures there was traffic chaos in the center of the capital this morning, motorists who had not been warned about the itineraries of the official motorcades became angry. There were incidents between Italian and American journalists at the Villa Madama at the beginning of the Carter-Cossiga meeting. An American female journalist was manhandled.

Press Comment

AU191603 Rome ANSA in English 1530 GMT 19 Jun 80

[Text] Rome, June 19 (ANSA)--United States President Jimmy Carter will not be leaving his campaign for re-election behind when he arrives here tonight for a state visit to Italy, according to editorial curtain-raisers on the visit in leading Italian dailies today. Many commentators reckoned that the incumbent President will be keeping an eye out for Italian-American and Catholic votes when he is not tied down with the business of foreign affairs, energy, NATO and bilateral relations between Washington and Rome.

"Visits to foreign countries are a major resource that incombent chief executives have over their rivals," the Rome daily LA REPUBBLICA pointed out.

Milan's IL GIORNO daily also dwelt on the electoral interests characterizing Carter's visit, the first visit by an American President to Italy in five years: "A photograph (of Carter) standing next to Pope John Paul II, between (his wife) Rosalynn and (daughter) Amy, is worth much more than an official statement on 'Euro-missiles' for getting the votes of 49 million American Catholics, the paper said.

The Vatican announced yesterday that Carter and his family will be having a private audience with the pope Saturday.

Although Carter appears to have the Democratic nomination wrapped up, IL GIORNO said, his chances for success against his Republican Party rival, Ronald Reagan, are not bright, at least at this point in the campaign. The Milan daily estimated that Reagan would beat Carter by three to four percentage points if the elections were to be held today.

Rome's wide-circulation IL MESSAGGERO dwelt on the internal strife within the administration blotting Carter's visit. The daily reported that Energy Secretary Charles Duncan and Treasury Secretary William Miller "were not invited aboard the presidential jet". Carter's mission, the paper said, "already impugned with reservations about (Carter's) authority...and (his) electoral considerations", could not have gotten off to a worse start. The outbreak of personal friction and political dissent between Carter's major advisor and aides right before his departure for Rome was not expected to brighten the prospects of the visit, according to IL MESSAGGERO.

Many dailies turned their focus from the American to the Italian domestic scene in commenting today on relations between Washington and "its staunchest ally". "

"IL GIORNO suggested that Carter's three days in Rome will provide him with a good dose of loyalty before going on to Venice to face French President Valery Giscard d'Estaing and West German Chancellor Helmut Schmidt at summit talks between the leaders of the West's seven most industrialized states.

Turin's LA STAMPA daily printed the headline "Carter Comes to Rome Tonight To Strengthen the Alliance" while Florence's LA NAZIONE devoted a lengthy editorial to the growingly important role that Italy is playing in the Atlantic Alliance. According to LA NAZIONE, Italy's role (in the Alliance) grew when the focal points of world tensions switched from Central Europe to Central Asia and the Middle East.

Italy's undying loyalty to the United States was confirmed today in the ruling Christian Democrat Party (DC) organ's commentary on Carter's visit, which stated in part: "Carter will realize without a shadow of doubt that he has come to a friendly country, which has known how to keep up respectful, mutually-trustworthy, cooperative and alliance relations with the great American democracy. A cooperation based on intense trade...but even more so of frank and open relations marked by (Italy's) awareness of our security, independence and autonomy that necessarily need close... European and Western solidarity.

Rome's pro-Communist PAESE SERA took offense today at Carter's way of flaunting his sureness of success in Italy. According to the daily, Carter's visit will undoubtedly be a "sure success" but the U.S. President's self-assured statements to that effect "do not flatter us. All Italians should be indignant about that statement", the daily raged, stating in part: "Why should...the head of the major capitalist country of the West come to his first appointment with his Italian ally on Italian soil in such a clumsy manner... (Why should he) take it for granted ahead of time that he will get a blanket and easy agreement (from Italian leaders) on the key issues which have been fueling controversy and dissent between the United States and its friends and allies?"

Rome's rightwing IL TEMPO daily did not think it possible today to expect any "totally new or spectacular" stands to emerge from the Venice summit. The only think that can be expected the daily said, was "a clarity of judgement and intent", a confirmation of the West's political and economic stands and some "self-criticism about the mistakes that have been made."

FOREIGN MINISTER COLOMBO REPORTS ON VENICE TOPICS, MIDEAST

Address to Chamber Committee

AU191937 Rome ANSA in English 1925 GMT 19 JUN 80

[Text] Rome, June 19 (ANSA)--Italian Foreign Minister Emilio Colombo today reiterated that both Israel and Arabs must mutually recognize the others right to existence and security and that the legitimate rights of the Palestinian people must also be recognized. Colombo made the statement as he addressed the lower house Foreign Affairs Committee on last week's European Economic Community (EEC) summit and this weekend's summit of the West's seven most industrialized nations.

Speaking of the EEC Middle East policy statement, Colombo said that it reiterated "a position aimed at consolidating the positive steps made so far, thanks also to the Camp David accords." He said that this position "is not competitive with the 1978 agreements."

With respect to a comprehensive settlement of the Middle Eastern conflict, the foreign minister said that it is necessary that "the right to existence and security be mutually recognized by all the parties concerned, by Israel as well as by Arabs. "A premise for respect of this condition is justice for all people, therefore also recognition of the legitimate rights of the Palestinian people, for which in the Nine's view there must be an appropriate process of self-determination." Colombo also reiterated that an EEC fact-finding mission will make contacts with all the parties concerned.

The Italian diplomatic chief also spoke of the problem of Jerusalem which he said is "a serious hurdle in the talks between Egypt and Israel", adding that "no unilateral initiative aimed at changing the city's status is acceptable, while any form of agreement will have to guarantee free access for everyone to the holy places."

Speaking about the more recent developments in the Afghan crisis, Colombo said the EEC summit acknowledged "that it is increasingly clear that the popular resistance is authentically national and reiterated its call for an end to the Soviet military intervention" in the Asian nation.

Speaking of the upcoming Venice seven industrialized nations' summit, Colombo said one of its objectives will be to establish "specific orientations for the development of energy policies to reduce oil consumption before the end of this decade."

In conclusion, the foreign minister said that since development of the Third World "is essential for peace and to maintain well-being in industrialized nations, the economic summit should deal with the need to give new impetus to bilateral and international aid programs for energy projects in developing nations and to abolish hunger in the world."

Cabinet Discussion

ID191809 Rome Domestic Service in Italian 1700 GMT 19 Jun 80

[Excerpt] The government has examined the Italian attitude to the topics on the agenda of the forthcoming world summit. Here is a report by Angelo Haver from the Palazzo Chigi:

On the eve of Carter's talks with head of state Pertini and Prime Minister Cossiga and in view of the world summit on Saturday to examine the international problems on the basis of a report by Minister Emilio Colombo. Minister Colombo had already presented this morning to the Chamber's Foreign Affairs Committee an essential outline of his report. He had referred to the recent European summit in Venice and had underlined the problem of the relations between Europe and the United States as a result of the developments of the Palestinian situation and of the reaffirmed necessity to obtain a solution through contacts with all the interested sides and, therefore, also with the PLO.

Colombo's speech draws attention to the economic topics which will be at the center of the coming discussions in Venice. These topics will of necessity have repercussions inside our country particularly as regards the package of painful anti-inflationary measures which the government is preparing to launch. In Venice, the seven most industrialized countries of the world, Colombo said, will seek to orient themselves on the development of energy policies aimed at reducing the consumption of oil in the eighties. Moreover, he added, the immediate priority of the right against inflation at the international level will have to be reaffirmed, acting at the same time on containing demand and the expansion and rationalization of supply. The hopes of all of us, it is hardly necessary to say, are pinned on the happy outcome of these discussions which will come face to face with a very complex reality which will be difficult to control.

ROME RADIO COMMENTS ON HOPES FOR SUMMIT IN VENICE

[Untego Clemazia) commentary "Discussion Among the Allies]

[Text] The fact that our country is a border zone of the Western alliance and that, as such, it is the subject of a particular relationship with the leading NATO superpower represents something traditional which accompanies official meetings between the United States and Italy.

If this image is a short cut to the description of the most complex relationship tested by the Italian political evolution--which today really constitutes an impediment to the (?development) of bilateral relations in real terms--it is confirmed by the objective interest which the United States and Italy have at this moment, as partners in the Alliance, in defining the terms by which a group of allied countries can move in harmony without hegemony and isolated [word indistinct] flights.

Our alliance is based on understanding and not on submission, Carter said before leaving for Italy, and the hotbeds of international crisis--from strategic armaments to Afghanistan, from the U.S. hostages in Iran to the peace process in the Middle East and to the suspended detente with the Soviet Union--oblige the Atlantic countries to hold a profound debate in which everyone seeks to update the terms of his alliance. This is being done by Schmidt's Germany, by Giscard d'Estaing's France and by ourselves, and aims at a European diplomatic initiative which is not in opposition to the United States' tasks emanating from the international power relationship but which, so to speak, leads to a division of labor. Loyalty and fundamental principles are important inside free alliances which are founded on consensus, especially at the moment of crisis. In this sense, Carter will be able to (?gather) new elements which will allow him to clarify the picture of (?chosen) solidarity to the Atlantic Alliance.

This [words indistinct] will be followed on Sunday and Monday by the summit meeting in Venice of the heads of state and government of the most industrialized democracies in the world. With that prospect, Carter and those in charge of Italian politics will be able to assess (?in detail) the economic crisis which effects the most industrialized countries--each one in a different way--with heavy penalties and troubles. In fact, this very diversity of penalties--which means recession for one country, inflation or unemployment for another and all of these together for many countries--may result, in Venice and already during the bilateral talks in Rome, in a tendency to take a coordinated initiative in the economic field, including a new and useful united strategy towards the OPEC countries, which is a most topical problem in the present crisis.

Four days of talks in Rome and Venice on these problems may not be sufficient but they will serve to verify the degree of unity existing between the partners in the meeting. For this reason too, good wishes to the leaders in their work are also good wishes for our own future.

SIGNATURES OBTAINED TO REOPEN DONAT-CATTIN AFFAIR

AU200820 Rome ANSA in English 0810 GMT 20 Jun 80

[Text] Rome, June 20 (ANSA)--The required number of signatures have been collected to reopen the Donat-Cattin affair and to bring Premier Francesco Cossiga once again before a parliamentary commission to answer charges that he helped a suspected terrorist elude arrest.

The commission had already shelved the case when the majority of its members found the charges against the premier "manifestly unfounded". However, the case could be reopened if the signatures of at least one-third of the members of the two houses of Parliament were collected to demand an investigation before a joint session of the lower house and the Senate.

Last night the duty chairman of the house, Pierluigi Romita, officially announced that 394 parliamentarians had signed. The minimum number of signatures necessary was 318.

The investigating commission now has six months to draw up a report on the case to be presented to the two branches of the Parliament.

The crux of the allegations against Cossiga was that he tipped off Carlo Donat-Cattin, former deputy secretary of his own Christian Democrat Party, so that Donat-Cattin's 28-year-old son, Marco, could escape arrest. Marco Donat-Cattin is sought by police on charges of terrorism and in connection with political slayings as well. Both Cossiga and Donat-Cattin have adamantly denied these charges.

The parliament will eventually have to rule either to shut the case once and for all or to call for further investigation in which case the commission will have another 3 months to pursue its inquiries.

LCY DELEGATION MEETS WITH BERLINGUER, PCI AIDES

[Text] Rome--LCY Central Committee Presidium member Comrade Aleksandar Grlickov was received yesterday at PCI Directorate headquarters by PCI Secretary General Comrade Enrico Berlinguer. During the cordial and friendly conversation there was a broad exchange of opinions on the situation in the respective countries and on certain issues concerning the international situation and the development of relations within the international workers movement.

During the conversation emphasis was placed on the need to work in every way to facilitate negotiated solutions to the unresolved conflicts in various areas of the world, to impart a new thrust to the defense and disarmament negotiations and to develop international cooperation.

Comrades Berlinguer and Grlickov expressed both parties' desire to further develop their close relations and the relations of friendship and cooperation in all fields between Italy and Yugoslavia in the interests of both countries and both peoples.

Previously Comrade Grlickov and Comrade Borislav Milosevic, deputy director of the LCY Presidium's Department of International Relations, who arrived in Rome Friday, where they were met at Fiumicino Airport by Comrade Gian Carlo Pajetta, had a lengthy conversation with the following comrades: Directorate member and foreign affairs department chief Gian Carlo Pajetta; Directorate member and Chairman of the Central Committee Foreign Commission Paolo Bufalini and foreign section chief and deputy chief Antonio Rubbi and Rodolfo Mechini.

Yesterday Yugoslav Ambassador Marco Kosin gave a luncheon attended by Comrade Enrico Berlinguer and the Italian delegation. The guests left for Belgrade yesterday evening.

PCI OFFICIALS HOLD TALKS WITH EL SALVADOR OPPOSITIONISTS

ID170843 Milan L'UNITA in Italian 14 Jun 80 p 18

[Unattributed report on Revolutionary Democratic Front of El Salvador delegation Rome meeting with PCI leaders: "PCI's Commitment to Solidarity"]

[Text] Rome--Within the framework of the international initiative which the popular forces of El Salvador are carrying out in South America, the United States and Europe to inform world public opinion of the situation in their country, a delegation of the Revolutionary Democratic Front of El Salvador, composed of Oscar Acevedo, Rafael Guidos Vejar, Mario C. Marti, Mauricio Silva and Ruben Zamora, has met with PCI Directorate member and foreign affairs department chief Comrade Gian Carlo Pajetta and Comrade Renato Sandri of the PCI foreign section.

Since the assassination of the bishop of San Salvador, Arnulfo Romero, repression in El Salvador has become increasingly barbaric and generalized, with a daily average of over 40 people massacred by criminal gangs either in uniform or paid by the landowners to defend the iniquitous agricultural order and the privileges and profits of domestic capitalism and the multinationals.

The military government, which includes some Christian Democrats (and which enjoys economic aid, arms supplies and the presence of several dozen U.S. military advisers) is opposed by a range of political forces--which embraces the entire democratic alignment as well as all the trade union organizations.

The ruling right wants to plunge the country into civil war crushing the popular movement before its unitary advance becomes inexorable. The Front representatives asked that information and solidarity be developed in our country in support of their battle and against the reactionary upsurge which is threatening the entire Central American region. They indicated that while all EEC ambassadors have left El Salvador, the only diplomat to have remained in the capital to legitimize the ruling junta with his presence is the ambassador of the Italian Republic.

The PCI representatives assured the Front delegation that in both political and parliamentary forums, both at a national level and within the EEC, the Italian Communists are committed to multiplying their efforts to insure that the broadest understanding among all the democratic and antifascist forces can help defeat the raging repression in El Salvador and resolve, through profound regeneration and peace, the grave problems which afflict that country and Central America.

ID200741 Rome L'UNITA in Italian 15 Jun 80 pp 1, 19

[Apparent text of 14 June PCI Directorate Communique: "PCI Proposes Prompt Consultations for Councils"]

[Text] The 8-9 June elections have confirmed the PCI's great strength. It is important and positive that in such an extremely difficult test we have halted and in large areas of the country reversed the 1978-79 trend toward a decrease in votes for the RCI--a decisive force in safeguarding and developing democracy and transforming the country.

We have thwarted the Christian Democratic Party [DC] attempt to overthrow the major positive experiences of the leftwing democratic councils. The confirmation of the PCI's strength and the positive result achieved by the Italian Socialist Party [PSI] keep open the possibility of consolidating and extending the 1975 swing in regional, provincial and municipal administrations.

The voting reveals great complexity. The PCI's significant recovery in the major urban areas from Turin to Naples and Taranto and throughout central northern Italy has been accompanied by internal differences and the aggravation of worrying difficulties in the south. The DC, while gaining over its 1975 results, has suffered considerable losses from last year's elections and has suffered a further decline in the major cities. The PSI has made general progress while benefiting, however, from very varied, and to some extent conflicting, elements.

Though the percentage of the electorate that voted was very high, the proportion of abstentions and blank and spoiled ballots was politically significant and extended far beyond the irresponsible campaigns encouraging people not to use their votes or to render them invalid. This phenomenon reflects not so much a protest as worrying signs of detachment and mistrust of the representative institutions. It is up to all the democratic forces to reestablish--especially in the eyes of the new generations--a clean, correct and efficient image of democracy. It is the Communists' task to disprove the irresponsible lie that all the parties are the same by politically reasserting the PCI's distinct political and ideological nature.

Following the elections there remain arduous problems to be resolved in the field of foreign, economic and domestic policy. The test of actions has shown that the present government is pursuing erroneous and dangerous approaches. The PCI will continue its opposition battle in the most steadfast and rigorous manner and will use all its resources in tackling the country's fundamental needs. Foremost among these is the need for a policy of detente, balanced disarmament and international cooperation. At the same time there must be a full mobilization to deal with a worrying economic situation characterized by inflation, in the direction of development and social justice. Another enduring fundamental task is to continue and win the antiterrorist battle. There must be an increased commitment to the democratic regeneration of the state with full recognition and the completion of the system of autonomies. The civil rights laid down in the Constitution must be implemented more thoroughly and securely and an answer must be given to the demand for cultural improvement and a more civilized life. These are the objectives of the Communists' struggle for a change in the country's political leadership.

The PCI Directorate confirms the line aimed at building leftwing democratic councils in the regions, provinces and municipalities, since these solutions have proved that they meet the citizens' interests and the need for regeneration in the theory and practice of the administration of public affairs. The election results enable the democratic councils to be consolidated and expanded. The differing political and parliamentary positions of the leftwing forces must not hinder the possibilities of convergences, understanding and cooperation in the councils, provinces, cities and regions of decisive importance, or the quest for a broader unitary effort to regenerate Italian society.

On the basis of the local institutions' autonomy, which is a fixed point in the constitutional order, the Communists urge the promptest possible consultations with the PSI and the other leftwing and democratic forces--the Italian Social Democratic Party, the Italian Republican Party and the Proletarian Unity Party--to create, on the basis of specific programs and within the context of observance of the equal status of all political forces, the largest number of leftwing majorities and democratic councils.

Where such solutions prove impossible, the PCI will exercise its own opposition on the basis of program platforms based on specific proposals to resolve the local communities' problems, regenerate government methods, combat corruption and immorality and increase the citizens' participation.

In both cases the process of forming the majorities and councils must take place as a major political event in which the workers, citizens and public opinion must be urged to participate.

The PCI Directorate extends its warmest thanks to all voters who have expressed their confidence in the Communist policy and candidates and to all the organizations and party members who worked so hard and enthusiastically in the election campaign.

The results achieved must be examined most carefully in all areas so as to immediately take the necessary initiatives in political terms and in terms of strengthened organization, partly by imparting a new thrust to the campaign to recruit new members to the party and to the Italian Communist Youth Federation. Special attention must be given to the Communists' policy and presence in the south. Within the framework of the necessary examination of our capacity to implement a just policy of social alliances on a national scale--an assessment in which the entire party must feel involved--there is a pressing need for a reassessment of the party's action and platform for the south, the real extent of its links with the masses in the south, of its approaches in organizational work and of the party's necessary aspect as a force promoting a new political and social process, a new leadership class and a broad democratic mass fabric.

The party's debate throughout the country must stimulate action with respect to the most serious problems most closely affecting the masses. To this end the most immediate opportunity for mobilizing and holding a dialogue with the citizens is the campaign for the communist press.

The PCI Directorate has decided to convene the Central Committee and the Central Control Commission on 24 June.

RELATIONS ESTABLISHED WITH SAUDI ARABIA; PLO RECOGNIZED

LD191153 Lisbon Domestic Service in Portuguese 2300 GMT 18 Jun 80

[Text] Diplomatic relations between Portugal and Saudi Arabia were established, coming into effect yesterday. A statement from the Council of Ministers and the Foreign Ministry announcing this said that the governments of Portugal and Saudi Arabia, desirous of giving due expression to the valuable historic, political, economic and cultural tradition common to the two countries, have decided to establish diplomatic relations at ambassadorial level.

The contents of this statement were read by the secretary of state for foreign affairs at a news conference chaired by Pinto Balsemao, assistant minister to the prime minister. Azevedo Coutinho said that the Portuguese Government is in favor of the Palestine Liberation Organization opening an office in Lisbon. The two government members stated that throughout the negotiations on establishing diplomatic relations, Saudi Arabia never made Portugal's attitude to the PLO a bargaining point. The matter was not even broached, according to Pinto Balsemao, who defined the Portuguese Government's stance on the PLO as one of recognizing the PLO as the representative of the Palestinian people and their right to nationhood.

Pinto Balsemao said that the negotiations for the establishment of diplomatic relations had been successful because of the Saudi Government's approval of the economic and social system ensured for the Portuguese people by the Democratic Alliance government. The minister also laid stress on the commercial benefits of what he termed as this latest diplomatic link of Lisbon, recalling the high profitability to which the link will lead.

Answering questions on the plight of the Portuguese fishermen held by the POLISARIO Front, the minister said that the Portuguese Government does not recognize the Front as a state; hence it is impossible to resolve the issue at the interstate level. The secretary of state for foreign affairs said that the government is dealing with the issue through various diplomatic channels.

The news conference was told that Prime Minister Sa Carneiro and Foreign Minister Freitas do Amaral will be visiting Saudi Arabia before the end of the year.

MINISTER COMMENTS ON EEC ENTRY NEGOTIATIONS, FRENCH STANCE

LD200915 Barcelona LA VANGUARDIA in Spanish 14 Jun 80 pp 3-4

[Unattributed report on 12 June press conference in Madrid given by Spanish Minister of Relations with the EEC Leopoldo Calvo-Sotelo: "We Have Parried the Blow"]

[Excerpts] Madrid, 12 June--"A week ago I said that the situation was grave, after hearing French President Giscard d'Estaing's remarks. Now I can state that we have parried this blow." This was stated by Minister of Relations with the EEC Leopoldo Calvo-Sotelo at a press conference following the Council of Ministers meeting this afternoon which analyzed the final document of the European summit in Venice.

Calvo-Sotelo stated that it was feared a week ago that the negotiations would be interrupted. "But the negotiations are continuing," he said, "with no interruption or pause. It is true that the EEC has internal problems and that it must resolve them, but it can and should simultaneously resolve its problems and negotiate with Spain."

The minister also said that it would be rash to assert that the timetable which has been laid down will be adhered to, but it would also be rash to say that the negotiations will be delayed for a year, "because that would be taking for granted what is not likely today, although possible."

Answering some questions put by journalists, Calvo-Sotelo emphasized: "It is true that I cannot reply as clearly as a few months ago, because it would be rash not to take into account the events which have occurred, but I can tell you quite confidently that the negotiations are continuing without interruption and that the issue of Spain was not discussed in Venice, because, according to the document on the meeting, no new development has occurred. I said a few months ago that the negotiations with the EEC would be lengthy and that Europe required considerable patience but was a definite goal, and today I repeat the same words."

Continuing with the issue of Europe, the minister was asked whether he is "expecting other blows," after the one he says he has parried. "These are lengthy and difficult negotiations, and there could be others, but the fact that this issue was not formally raised in Venice must be assessed positively. The Elysee Palace stated a few days ago that France would not take the issue to Venice if it did not have other countries' support. France has not had that support, and the matter has rested there. But I cannot forget that statements have been made, which have perhaps been interpreted in an exaggerated manner here, and it must be borne in mind that the EEC Council of Ministers will meet again on 30 June and that further problems could arise, although I also hope that they will not be conspicuous or significant."

"Nobody Has Aligned Himself With Giscard"

The minister was also asked about the possibility of Belgium and Germany supporting Giscard's stance, and he replied that "none of the other eight countries has aligned itself with Giscard. What we know is that they have expressed their surprise and displeasure at those statements, and that they have expressed this with nuances of various degrees. I realize that the EEC countries cannot bring their disagreements to light."

OREJA COMMENTS ON NATO MEMBERSHIP PROMPT REACTIONS

LD200903 Madrid EL PAIS in Spanish 17 Jun 80 p 15

[Excerpts] Foreign Minister Marcelino Oreja's remarks to EL PAIS forecasting Spain's NATO membership before 1983 and the raising of the issue in 1981 have prompted a chain of political reactions both inside and outside Spain, their common denominator being general surprise, which extended even to the higher echelons of the Union of the Democratic Center [UCD].

As for reactions within Spain, emphasis must be placed on the general surprise affecting even the governing UCD. High-ranking representatives of the party and the administration itself were taken by surprise by Oreja's remarks. On the right, the Popular Alliance and New Force were pleased with the statements. On the left, the initial reaction was indignation and opposition to the Atlantic option and to the government's desire to secure this simply by means of a parliamentary majority.

In the absence of Spanish Socialist Workers Party Secretary General Felipe Gonzalez, Political Relations Secretary Enrique Mugica told EL PAIS that "Marcelino Oreja's remarks about Spain's NATO membership are a demonstration of frivolity and irresponsibility. To link the issues of EEC and NATO membership implies acknowledging that negotiations with the EEC have not been conducted vigorously enough, and now the intention is to pay the price of this failure by joining NATO by means of a simple majority in the Congress of Deputies. We demand a referendum.

"Such an important decision taken by such a fragile majority would prompt a deep split in public opinion. We do not see why Spain's NATO membership should secure a more lenient attitude from France on the EEC issue when it is the very country least tied to NATO.

"Marcelino Oreja is making these remarks just a few days after Defense Minister Agustin Rodriguez Sahagun said that the process of moving nearer to NATO should be carried out cautiously. It is also curious that the subject of NATO membership is being raised when one of the NATO countries, Britain, still has the colony of Gibraltar."

Rightwing leaders Manuel Fraga and Blas Pinar expressed their clear approval of NATO membership.

HUANG HUA HAS TALKS ON INTERNATIONAL SITUATION WITH OLESEN

LD191503 Copenhagen AKTUELT in Danish 17 Jun 80 p 8

[RITZAUS BUREAU report: "Kjeld Olesen Tells Chinese Foreign Minister: Great European Involvement in Middle East Desirable"]

[Text] Copenhagen--Foreign Minister Kjeld Olesen expressed Danish concern Monday over the Soviet military intervention in Afghanistan.

At a meeting with Chinese Foreign Minister Huang Hua, who on Monday began a 3-day visit to Denmark, Kjeld Olesen said, according to Foreign Ministry officials, that it is necessary to show resolve in the Afghanistan crisis but at the same time to work toward a political solution.

The Chinese foreign minister was sharply critical of Soviet foreign policy at the almost 4-hour meeting. He mentioned Kampuchea and Afghanistan as examples of the aggressive policy, which will spread if it is not stopped.

The Chinese delegation showed interest in the EEC proposal for a political solution to the crisis in Afghanistan. At the same time the Chinese foreign minister gave indications of a positive attitude towards the results of the Islamic conference in the Pakistani capital, Islamabad, where the Islamic nations proposed the establishment of a politically independent Afghanistan.

The meeting between the two foreign ministers was characterized by the tense international situation. According to RITZAUS BUREAU the Danish foreign minister expressed the view that greater European involvement in the Middle East would be desirable, especially with regard to the problems connected with the establishment of an autonomous Palestinian state.

The Chinese delegation stressed at the meeting the need for great economic support from the industrialized countries for the developing countries. Kjeld Olesen voiced his agreement with this view, but pointed to oil price rises in recent years as a factor which has further complicated the relationship between the two groups. At the same time the Danish foreign minister pointed out that Denmark is one of the countries that has lived up to the UN goal of aid contributions to the developing countries of 0.7 percent of GNP.

At the request of the Chinese, Kjeld Olesen gave an account of the decision to deploy 572 medium-range missiles with nuclear warheads on European soil. The Danish foreign minister said that he agreed with the NATO decision but suggested that the missiles ought to be used in disarmament talks with the Warsaw Pact countries. The foreign minister also expressed his concern over the presence of Soviet SS-20 missiles in Eastern Europe.

Huang Hua stressed the positive value of trade agreements with the EEC and expressed hopes for further trade cooperation in the future.

At the Foreign Ministry dinner at the Langelinie Pavilion in Copenhagen on Monday evening the Chinese foreign minister's speech of thanks was also marked by the tense international situation. "The Chinese and Danish people are peace-loving, but we must not forget that black clouds are at this moment hanging over the globe. An important Chinese objective is to counter these aggressions and at the same time to defend world peace," the Chinese foreign minister said.

Huang Hua also voiced hopes for closer trade cooperation between Denmark and China. "The Chinese people are working hard to modernize the country. For this reason we must learn from other countries like Denmark with advanced science and technology," Huang Hua said in his speech of thanks to Foreign Minister Kjeld Olesen.

In addition the Chinese foreign minister yesterday made the surprising announcement that immediately after his official visit to Denmark he would travel to the FRG for an unplanned visit. Both Beijing and Bonn emphasize that Huang Hua's visit is to be seen as part of the normal routine of consultations between the two governments, but observers in Bonn are making much of the fact that Huang Hua's visit is taking place only a few days before West German Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt sets off for Moscow for talks with Soviet state and party leader Leonid Brezhnev. It is thought that Huang Hua will seek to familiarize himself with the West German position before the German-Soviet summit and that the Chinese Government will seize the opportunity to warn the most important Western European nation of the danger the Chinese see in Soviet foreign policy.

POLISH LANDING CRAFT EXPELLED FROM NATIONAL WATERS

[Mogens Auning report: "Polish Landing Craft Turned Away by Danish Naval Unit"]

[Text] A roughly 1,000-ton Polish landing craft of the so-called "Polnochniy" class was turned away by Danish naval units when it entered Danish territorial waters between North Sjaelland and Hesseloe. The episode took place on Wednesday evening around 1800 hours. The Polish ship was engaged in one of the exercises involving the circumnavigation of Sjaelland that the Warsaw Pact nations hold intermittently.

When the landing craft wanted to pass north of Sjaelland it violated the Danish state's regulations on the passage of foreign ships through Danish waters. According to these, foreign warships must pass north of Hesseloe, but the Polish captain set a course south of the island to emerge into the Samsoe belt north of the Sjaelland bar. Danish frigates, torpedo boats and minelayers were operating in the area on Wednesday as part of the major annual "Danex" naval exercise. When it became clear that a ship from an Eastern power was on Danish territory, the missile frigate Peder Skram approached the landing craft and pointed out the territorial violation. The Polish ship had by this time almost reached the Sjaelland bar and with an escort of Danish ships was forced to continue on its way out into international waters in the great belt.

Ships of the "Polnochniy" class are the largest landing craft in Poland's large navy. They can carry six tanks and are themselves armed with both guns and missile-firing equipment.

SWEDEN

ULLSTEN INTERVIEWED ON EUROPEAN, GLOBAL ISSUES

LD181007 Paris LE MONDE in French 17 Jun 80 pp 1, 5

[Alain Debove interview in Stockholm with Foreign Minister Ola Ullsten: "The European States Should Adopt a 'More Independent Approach'"; date not given]

[Text] [Question] How does a neutral country like Sweden view the invasion of Afghanistan by Soviet troops?

[Answer] We are very critical. During the talks which I had with Mr Gromyko in Moscow at the end of May, I emphasized four points:

1--We do not think there is any reliable information indicating that there was foreign intervention in Afghanistan before the Russians entered the country;

2--There can be no solution to the Afghan crisis before the Soviets' unconditional withdrawal;

3--Afghanistan's future should be defined and established by an independent and nonaligned government;

4--Finally, the conflict can only be solved politically, and we hope that it will be possible to find a solution. I think that the Russians made an error of judgment. They are in danger of becoming bogged down in Afghanistan. They do not have the population's support and are having to face a fairly strong resistance which will probably cause problems for them.

[Question] What political solution could be envisaged?

[Answer] A solution which would contain, for instance, a clause guaranteeing the principle of noninterference by foreign countries in Afghanistan. Such a clause is not necessary per se but could be envisaged if the Soviets promise to withdraw immediately in exchange. Moscow's present stance of trying to obtain guarantees first is quite unacceptable.

[Question] Is it possible to hold the view that this invasion should have no effect on the situation in Europe?

[Answer] It is clear that the Soviet intervention in Afghanistan affects the situation in Europe since the international climate and relations between the great powers have deteriorated. This is the first time since World War II that the Soviets have moved their positions forward using their own troops and hence extending their zone of power. We have witnessed a radical change: We have moved from a period of detente into a period of a harsh and cold propaganda war which has notably put an end to a series of negotiations on disarmament. The intervention in Afghanistan jeopardizes and threatens to ruin the results of detente and especially its main result: the normalization of relations between Eastern and Western Europe. In addition we think it important for the Europeans themselves to take initiatives in the disarmament sphere; however, that presupposes the superpowers' agreement, and if they are no longer in a position to conduct a dialogue the chances of achieving results are reduced. In our view the question of disarmament in Europe is extremely important. The present level of military arsenals is unacceptable.

[Answer] This is a good initiative which we fully support. We cannot accept the Soviet viewpoint in asking NATO to revoke these decisions without stopping deployment of the SS-20's. We are not bound to any bloc but we do not think it is possible to discuss such bases. It is unrealistic. Mr Schmidt's proposals, however, strike me as reasonable and the Soviets should be able to consider them. What interests us Swedes is for negotiations to start between NATO and the Warsaw Pact which would initially make it possible to limit the number of medium-range missiles to the present level.

[Question] Does Sweden think there is still a balance between the Soviet Union and the United States in the world and in Europe?

[Answer] I do not think anybody can answer that question with any certainty. The mechanism of the arms race has created its own balance but at an even higher level so that it threatens peace more than it safeguards it. This is primarily true of Europe, but the world today is so small that confrontations on our continent would have repercussions on the rest of the world and vice versa. As regards Europe, I would like to point out that the CSCE made it possible to establish a kind of gentlemen's agreement between the superpowers on the behavior to follow on this continent. It would be desirable to define a similar code for other regions of the world. The Third World countries should not, as at present, be subjected to constant pressure and be the victims of rivalry between the superpowers. This code of conduct does in fact exist in the UN Charter but nobody pays any attention to it.

For a European Conference on Disarmament

[Question] What hopes do you place in the Madrid conference?

[Answer] First we hope it will take place--and I think it will because nobody would dare to take the responsibility for canceling it. Of course there is a danger that the conference will be limited to speeches and to a propaganda war without constructive results. This danger exists and in this context a more independent line by the European states toward the superpowers would be welcome. It would be a good thing for the Madrid meeting--this would at least be a specific and important result--to recommend organizing a European conference on disarmament.

On this point France and Sweden have common interests, and I think it is possible to move our respective positions even closer. Our two countries think that such a conference should be carefully planned and produce results. In our opinion the timetable proposed by the Soviet Union, which wanted such a conference to take place before Madrid, would lead to failure. We must not be in too much of a hurry. I think that a country like France, which does of course belong to a bloc but enjoys a relatively independent position within that bloc, and we Swedes, who are neutral but deeply committed on disarmament questions, could together with other states, make a constructive contribution. France has proposed that the conference be held in Paris. We are prepared to welcome it in Stockholm. The essential thing is that it should take place but holding it in a neutral capital would have definite advantages.

[Question] On Saturday, 14 June, you had a long conversation in Stockholm with Iranian Foreign Minister Qotbzadeh, who was the Swedish Social Democratic Party's guest. How do you view the situation in Iran?

[Answer] We understand the Iranians' feelings about the shah's regime and the role played by the Americans during that period. However, we certainly cannot excuse the seizure of hostages, which is a violation of international conventions and is helping to aggravate an already tense situation. Nor can we accept the executions which are still being carried out in Iran. We are closely following the course of events and trying to play an active role encouraging a settlement of the crisis which threatens to turn into a dangerous East-West conflict. The United States is undoubtedly in a difficult and delicate situation. I can understand its reaction, such as economic sanctions and the attempt to release the hostages, but I find it hard to justify them.

WEEKLY REPORTS THREAT AGAINST KIPRIANOU'S LIFE DURING TRAVELS

NC200642 Nicosia THE CYPRUS WEEKLY in English 20 Jun 80 p 1

[Excerpts] It can now be revealed that President Kiprianou lived under constant threat against his life during his recent visits to Czechoslovakia and East Germany.

The threats came from people demanding the release of two Iraqi Palestinians, Samir Khadir and Zayid al-'Ali, who are serving life sentences in Nicosia's central prison for murder.

The governments of the two host countries were informed about the threats, it is reliably learned. Extra security precautions were enforced at Prague Castle and the Niederschoenhausen Palace in Berlin where the president and his party stayed during the visits.

An official source said in Nicosia yesterday: "As far as we know, the danger remains."

And a police spokesman told THE CYPRUS WEEKLY: "We are taking all precautionary measures following some information received."

"The police will not allow any kind of blackmail," the spokesman added.

The two convicted men have been in prison since February 1978--the day after Yusur as-Siba'i, an Egyptian politician and newspaper editor and a close friend of President as-Sadat, was assassinated in a corridor of the Cyprus Hilton. Their lawyer, Mr Levkos Kliridhis, has been seeing the two convicted men regularly in prison.

He said yesterday: "I am making every possible effort to secure their release. I am negotiating and consulting with all the appropriate authorities."

Other sources in Nicosia said that the consultations were at an advanced stage and that arrangements were already being made for the release of the two men, but this was denied by a government source.

The Palestine Liberation Organization's representative in Nicosia yesterday discounted the possibility that any Palestinian groups might be behind the threat. "The PLO has excellent relations with the Cyprus Government and so do all the other Palestinian groups," he told THE CYPRUS WEEKLY.

Confirmation By Spokesman

NC201115 Nicosia Domestic Service in Greek 1030 GMT 20 Jun 80

[Text] Replying to a question in connection with today's report in THE CYPRUS WEEKLY about threats on President Kiprianou's life and that security measures were taken during the president's recent visit to Czechoslovakia, the government spokesman said that indeed a report had been received that an Iraqi organization might proceed with some action connected with the detention of the two Palestinians. The spokesman added that following this report suitable security and precautionary measures are being taken. Responding to a question on the House debate on the purge, the spokesman said that when the House debate is concluded the president will make a statement.

KIPRIANOU ADVISES MINISTERS TO BE FRUGAL, ECONOMIZING

NC201133 Nicosia Domestic Service in Greek 1030 GMT 20 Jun 80

[Text] President Kiprianou has instructed the members of the Council of Ministers to show frugality and prudent administration and to more effectively serve the people. An official statement to this effect says the following: Within the framework of the desired frugality and prudent administration, President Kiprianou has instructed the members of the Council of Ministers to do everything possible to curtail the number of trips outside Cyprus to those absolutely necessary and to intensify efforts to better and more effectively serve and resolve people's problems. The same applies for the officers of the ministries as well as for all state services.

Within the framework of this policy the president expressed to the members of the Council of Ministers his wish that his arrival and departure ceremonies from Cyprus be attended by members of the Council of Ministers in rotation, and only by necessary state officials so that fuel can be saved. Furthermore, both the ministries and the various government departments will then be able to serve the people without interruption. The president has given instructions that the same policy be followed in the case of trips by ministers outside Cyprus.

Finally, the statement says that the president has abolished the inspection of the honor guard when he leaves or returns to Cyprus, except for official visits or when this is dictated by the protocol of the country which the president visits.

PAPAIOANNOU CONTINUES CRITICISM OF PRESIDENT KIPRIANOU

NC191140 Nicosia KHARAVYI in Greek 19 Jun 80 pp 1, 7

[Speech by AKEL Secretary General E. Papaioannou in Limassol on the evening of 18 June]

[Excerpts] Cyprus is at the most crucial period in its long history. As a people we are at the crossroads. Our future will depend on the road we will choose. Internationally the political atmosphere is heavy.

The titanic struggle that the unsubmitting Cypriot people have been waging for years is inseparably connected with the struggle of all the other people for freedom, peace, democracy, social progress and socialism.

Why So Much Importance To the Line

AKEL has never claimed that it can save Cyprus by itself. It has always stressed that Cyprus' salvation will be the result of the rallying together and of the united struggle of all the patriotic, democratic forces of the people based on the line and tactics approved by the National-Ministerial Council under Makarios' chairmanship.

International Conference

AKEL has always maintained that the international aspect of the Cyprus problem will be resolved at an international conference within the UN framework. At such a conference we shall demand the abolition of the treaty of establishment signed with Britain. On the basis of this treaty the British imperialists have acquired their "sovereign" bases. We shall also demand the abolition of the treaties of alliance under which Turkey and Greece have acquired the right to keep military contingents in Cyprus, with the right to intervene under certain circumstances.

We shall demand the abolition of the British bases and the removal of all foreign troops from Cyprus territory without exception. We shall demand the replacement of the treaties of guarantee and alliance with guarantees from the Security Council.

But do not believe it will be easy to hold an international conference within the UN framework. Many great efforts as well as struggles will be needed in order to convince the United Nations to agree to hold such a conference, particularly when it is well known that Turkey and the NATO countries are hostile toward such a conference.

Internal Aspect of the Cyprus Problem

However, we shall not resolve the internal aspects of the Cyprus problem either at an international conference or at a five-party conference or at a Camp David-type conference. We object to the interference of foreigners--and what is more of imperialists--in the solution of the internal aspects of our problem. We, Greeks and Turks alike, will resolve this aspect of our problem at the intercommunal talks under the auspices of the UN secretary general.

Why did the plenum of the AKEL Central Committee and the Central Control Committee decide to disassociate their responsibilities from those of the president of the republic and his government? This is so because after 3 years of bitter experience with President Spiros Kiprianou, AKEL became convinced that this is what it should have done.

AKEL does not ascribe to President Kiprianou the same responsibilities that it ascribes to imperialism, NATO, the Turkish Government, the chauvinistic circles of Turkey, and the reactionary Turkish Cypriot leadership headed by Rauf Denktas. AKEL has never equated the responsibilities of President Kiprianou with the responsibilities of those individuals we have mentioned and who are mainly responsible for the continuing deadlock and for the fact that no constructive intercommunal talks have resumed.
Imperialism, and particularly American-British imperialism, and NATO, does not want to see the Cypriots--Greeks and Turks--resolve by themselves the Cyprus problem under the auspices of the UN secretary general because they want to solve it behind the dark scenes of NATO orat at a conference similar to Camp David. And the solution that imperialism favors for the Cyprus problem is a NATO solution--a solution that would partition Cyprus and convert it into a strong bridgehead for NATO; a solution that would bring to power the rightwing fascist reaction that will strike at AKEL and the progressive, democratic forces of the people; a solution that would be imperialist, reactionary and anti-Cypriot.

President Kiprianou applies, internationally, a nonaligned foreign policy and we not only agree with this policy but, in our opinion, it is imperative that this policy be as anti-imperialist in content as possible. However, his inconsistency on the line that he is taking toward the Cyprus solution as well as the other Cyprus domestic problems leads inescapably to an anti-Cypriot solution and consequently to the nullifying of our nonaligned foreign policy. Therefore, the president's policy should not be examined from one aspect only, but from all aspects.

These are the exact reasons why AKEL, on the basis of its policy statement, decided to disassociate itself from its responsibilities once it was convinced that the president and his government were inconsistent not only toward the Cyprus issue but also toward other serious problems of the people.

With regard to the economic and other problems of the people, the president and his government not only failed to implement their promises for a more popular policy but, moreover, the president's policy made the rich richer and the poor poorer. The president and his government speak about "moderation," but the only ones that are forced to carry out political moderation are the poor working classes of the community. The rich spend in a night of entertainment as much as a poor family earns in practically 1 year. And where are the examples that the government should give?

Who Cooperated With Democratic Rally [DISI]

AKEL has not had and does not intend to have any cooperation with DISI. There are some circles, however, who pretend that they see no difference between AKEL and DISI on the issue of the line of cooperation with DISI at the 1979 village elections. These circles are not AKEL but the leaders of EDEK and DIKO [Democratic Party]. More specifically, in a village where AKEL, because of the support of a great majority, contested the office of a village headman we had DISI-DIKO-EDEK cooperation against AKEL. However, EDEK cooperated many times with DISI against both AKEL and DIKO. AKEL's slanderers must remember that AKEL will never cooperate with DISI. However, there is no guarantee whatsoever that both the EDEK and DIKO leadership will not repeat again in the future what they have done during the 1979 village elections.

Against the Makarios Line

The EDEK leadership has been fighting the Makarios line from the time that the National-Ministerial Council under Makarios' chairmanship worked out this line and tactics. EDEK slogans saying that biregional federation is equal to treachery can still be seen painted on some buildings. They have even called Makarios a traitor and said that he has been deceived by Clifford.

Thus, it is obvious that AKEL cannot possibly cooperate with such leaders and such a line.

AKEL maintains that the key to the resumption and the successful holding of the intercommunal talks is in the rapprochement of Greek and Turkish Cypriots. AKEL believes that the line for rapprochement is truly a line based on anti-imperialism and genuine liberation becuase it isolates imperialism and foils its plans; because it unites Greeks and Turks against the common enemy--imperialism and foreign occupation; and because our struggle is not waged against the Turkish Cypriots but against imperialism and occupation and for liberation.

However, some circles including the EDEK leadership do not agree that the Turkish Cypriots are waging an anti-imperialist and liberation struggle. But when Ozgur's Republican Turkish Party [RTP] appeals to the Turkish Cypriot soldiers--as it has recently done--to meet their Greek Cypriot counterparts with flowers, what else is it doing other than a revolutionary struggle against occupation and imperialism?

We hail the courage, heroism and patritism of the RTP and extend a brotherly hand over the lines of confrontation and reply: We are ready for the anti-imperialist fraternization included in the message of the RTP; we are ready for a joint struggle to shake off imperialism and the foreign Turkish occupation.

But it is important that the government prove by deeds how it views rapprochement. Until today the government has done nothing to implement the measures for rapprochement. It has not yet worked out a comprehensive program for rapprochement that will simultaneously serve as a program for joint Greek-Turkish Cypriot struggle.

Not Also Responsible

It is for all these reasons that AKEL decided that it cannot also be held responsible for a course that leads to catastrophe. It is because of the insufficiency and inconsistency of the policy of the president and his government on all the country's basic problems that after 3 years--3 years during which AKEL supported the president and his government with the expectation that they would fulfill their promises--it regrets to note that both the president and his government have disappointed both the people and AKEL.

Some circles believe that the existing differences can be easily bridged. We pray that this were so but unfortunately these are substantive differences and they concern the line and tactics, and the whole approach of the question of purge, as well as of the economic and other problems.

Radical Change

AKEL believes that because of the way things stand today only a radical and qualitative change in the whole situation can lead us out of the stalemate. And we are in a stalemate not only in the case of the Cyprus problem but also in the case of other problems of the country. The government machinery has never been in as bad a condition as it is today. The people face hardships even for the most insignificant issue. The state of affairs is such that the people wonder whether the state is in a state of dissolution. There is general indifference and sluggishness in the state machinery, as if the state has been paralyzed. Fresh inspiration and fresh breezes are needed. There is need for radical, qualitative change.

And this change will not be brought about by the reactionary forces of the Rally [DISI] but by the consistent action of the patriotic and democratic forces. Some circles pretend that they do not understand what we mean by the phrase: Rallying all the patriotic and democratic forces of the people wherever they may be. The pro-DISI paper I SIMERINI has even said that we encourage the formation of a new rightwing party: But it is not within the principles or the competencies of the working people's party--AKEL--to encourage the formation of any new party and particularly of a rightwing party.

We mean what we say. AKEL has always been ready to cooperate with all the patriotic and democratic forces of the people but always on the basis of the line and tactics for a Cyprus solution in accordance with the four guidelines of the Makarios-Denktas agreement and the 10 points of the Kiprianou-Denktas agreement. But AKEL wants deeds not words because this is precisely what the people want. The people are fed up with words, each one is judged from his deeds. "Deeds are stronger than words," said a philosopher.

FOREIGN MINISTER CRITICIZES FRG AID TO TURKEY

DW200713 Cologne Deutschlandfunk Network in German to East and West Germany 1615 GMT 19 Jun 80

[Correspondent Von Huebenet interview with Foreign Minister Konstandinos Mitsotakis; date, place not given--recorded]

[Text] [Question] The military intervention of Soviet troops in Afghanistan, the developments in Iran and in the Middle East have considerably increased the strategic importance of Turkey for NATO, thus, involuntarily--at least for the time being--thrusting the solution of bilateral problems between Greece and Turkey somewhat into the background. How do you, Mr Foreign Minister, assess the intention of some NATO countries for this reason to intensify the economic and military aid for Turkey?

[Answer] It is evident that the recent international events have emphasized the importance of Turkey. Two facts, however, must not be forgotten: First, important international events are not only taking place in the Middle East, but also in the Balkan area, events which will be of great long-term importance and which will also emphasize the role of Greece. Second, you must view the area of Turkey and Greece as a geographic entity because the defense of Turkey would be inconceivable without Greek territory. Therefore it would be shortsighted to see Turkey's defense alone and ignore the concomitant Greek factor. As far as economic aid to Turkey is concerned, we have made it clear more often than not that it is definitely not in Greece's interest to see the social and economic system of Turkey collapse. Yet, at the same time, it is necessary to keep in mind that the shift in military balance between Greece and Turkey in the Aegean Sea, through either excessive arms aid or indirectly through economic assistance--which is the same since the latter could be misused for military purposes--creates dangers to which we are particularly sensitive.

[Question] The Greek public criticizes the intention of the Federal Republic to set aside DM540 million in military aid for Turkey over the next 3 years while Bonn, at the same time, will grant Athens military assistance of only DM60 million. Can this intention negatively affect relations between Bonn and Athens?

[Answer] It is true that the Greek public has reacted very critically to the news that the Federal Republic plans to grant Turkey special military aid which amounts to a proportion of nine to one compared with the corresponding aid to Greece. In a democratic country where the voice of the people is heeded it is particularly significant when I say that the Greeks feel profoundly disappointed by the decision of the Federal Republic. It should not be surprising that German-Greek relations will suffer as a result. People will probably tell us that our accession to the European Community has gained us so many advantages that it would only be appropriate now to balance these advantages with corresponding concessions to Turkey. I just cannot follow this train of thought. Greece's entry into the Community, definitely aided by the Federal Republic, will surely bring advantages; but, by the same token, it will face a number of commitments and burdens. Our accession is not a present given to us but a mutually balanced transaction. It is inconceivable for this accession to be held against us just to create a situation which may well impair the security of our country.

VIGILANCE AGAINST GREAT POWER 'PLOTS' ON CYPRUS URGED

AT171755 Athens Domestic Television Service in Greek 1830 GMT 16 Jun 80

[Report by Khristos Filippidhis on the "Political Profiles" program]

[Excerpts] The Greek character of Cyprus has never been challenged by anyone since ancient times. It has been the harsh fate of Hellenism that the Greek character of Cyprus has been challenged in our own century. In other words, the word "fate" is a form of speech. This fate is primarily the result of eternal division among the Greeks themselves.

Unthinkable mistakes in tactics and unbelievable mistakes in politics and diplomacy both on the part of the Greeks on mainland Greece and also of the Cypriots themselves, led to the present outrageous situation--in other words, that the Turks, the last element one could expect, now appear as coowners of the island.

The Greek Cypriots started the heroic struggle against colonialism which prepared the ground for the island's self-determination. Suddenly, without anyone realizing how, the Turks later became the regulators of the fate of Cyprus.

Once again Greek policy became the tool of the plots of the great powers in the area. From then on Attila was only one step away. It was only a matter of time and opportunity.

However, we have not learned from our mistakes. We continue to fall into the traps set for us--for the sake of the great powers--by the United Nations organization. The ridiculous farce of the alleged intercommunal talks has continued for 6 years while it is obvious that this process is aimed at four goals, none of which serve Greece:

Goal 1--To help President Carter submit his obligatory bimonthly report to Congress, in other words, to help his allegation that a solution to the Cyprus issue is being promoted so that U.S. military aid to Turkey need not stop. This is an American goal.

Goal 2--This is a Russian goal. Perpetuation of the intercommunal talks which do not have and cannot have any result is also of interest to Moscow. In this way the division within the southeast wing of NATO continues and, at the same time, Russia can play the game of more easily approaching both the Greeks and Turks due to the open rift between them.

Goal 3--This is a Turkish goal. By perpetuating intercommunal talks forever the Turks gain valuable time and strengthen their de facto occupation of 40 percent of Cypriot territory while at the same time they appear as the legal claimants to the whole island.

Goal 4--This is once again an American goal. For reasons of more general strategy in the eastern Mediterranean, Cyprus must be neutralized as an individual state entity so that there is no danger of it creating problems in the sensitive triangle of the U.S. bridgehead of Israel, NATO Turkey and pro-U.S. Egypt.

This last strategy, however, has never been a secret. Only those who did not want to see it failed to do so. Kissinger, at the time of Makarios, once described Cyprus as a candidate for being the Cuba of the Mediterranean. The message was clear. Perhaps even Makarios himself failed to understand it.

In the summer of 1973 I met Denktas in the Turkish zone of Nicosia and we chatted for awhile. He was emphatic. We will never permit the union of Cyprus with Greece, he said. He also expressed the view that Makarios and Grivas were role-playing by appearing as enemies in order to promote a united Enosis more easily.

How wrong Denktas was. On that very same night in the archbishop's palace, Makarios told me: Grivas has sworn my personal eradication.

Perhaps the Turks thought the Greeks were deceiving them. The Greeks, however, with their eternal division, virtually provided grist for the Turkish mill. In 1974 we had the paranoic as well as the certainly criminal climax of this division. Whether they were influenced by foreign agents or whether they were influenced by their won passion, those who perpetrated the 1974 coup should have imagined the consequences.

Everyone hastened to reap the benefits: the Americans, in order to neutralize independent Cyprus through virtual partition; the Russians, in order to create a rift within the Atlantic Alliance--and this is why they did not intervene just as in 1956 during the occupation of Suez by the British and French, and the Turks, naturally, in order to promote their expansionist plans.

This series of mistakes naturally had begun much earlier, at the time when many Cypriots did not want a united Enosis, some because Greece belonged to NATO, others because they would lose positions and offices if Cyprus simply became a Greek province, and still others because their business activities would be more profitable in a small, independent, neutral country.

The blood of the brave ones in the Cyprus struggle opened the way toward Cypriot self-determination but only the Turks benefited, finding themselves suddenly as co-owners of the island without ever having dreamed of such a thing. Perhaps such a mistake has never been committed ever before in the ages of Greek history.

Let us hope, however, that the new examples of division which are once again appearing in Cyprus will be overcome in time. The Greeks in Cyprus and in Greece, irrespective of political beliefs, must cease to be influenced by all kinds of foreigners who directly or indirectly promote only their own interests. They must at long last unite and Cyprus must be saved, even if only at the last moment.

FOREIGN MINISTRY CALLS KILLING OF CITIZENS BY IRAQ 'SAVAGE'

TA191631 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1600 GMT 19 Jun 80

[Text] The Foreign Ministry has announced that the shooting of 10 Turkish citizens by Iraqi soldiers at the Iraqi border region on 1 June can only be described as a savage incident. Iraqi Ambassador to Ankara Taha 'Aziz (Hassan) was summoned to the Foreign Ministry today due to certain claims he made on the subject during a news conference today. According to a statement issued by Foreign Ministry Spokesman Ambassador Savlet Aktug, the Iraqi ambassador was reminded that the shooting of Turks who crossed the border is not a legal right as he claimed. The Iraqi ambassador was informed that this act violates international laws as well as the agreements between the two countries.

Details Released

TA191943 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1900 GMT 19 Jun 80

[Excerpt] Foreign Ministry Spokesman Ambassador Savlet Aktug said that the Iraqis had claimed that it was impossible for the Iraqis to have known the nationality of the persons they killed and that those who crossed the border were the first to start firing. He added that not being able to determine the nationality and identity of those who crossed the border could not be sufficient reason to kill them. Aktug added that it was definitely determined that the Turkish citizens who crossed the border were not carrying arms and that shots were fired at them from a helicopter.

Noting that one person was killed as a result of this, Aktug said that Iraqi soldiers who came out of the helicopter which landed made the Turkish citizens kneel down and shot nine persons, sparing three children. Aktug continued: The Foreign Ministry strongly denounced the statement made by the Iraqi ambassador which sounds like interference in Turkey's domestic affairs and in the duties of the Turkish Armed Forces. There is no doubt that Turkey would not want to create an opportunity for anyone to damage Turkish-Iraqi relations. However, it is clear that statements such as the one made by the ambassador might damage relations between the two countries when a decision has been reached to conduct a joint investigation. In addition, an ambassador and the authorities he represents should know that expressing views on the administration of the country he is accredited to is not compatible with the status of an ambassador.

PLO REPRESENTATIVE COMMENTS ON TIES WITH PALESTINIANS

[Report on statement by PLO representative Abu Firas in Istanbul; date not given]

[Text] Abu Firas, PLO representative in Turkey, made an exclusive statement to HURRIYET in Istanbul in which he said: "Israel has a finger in the terroristic acts in Turkey." He went on to say: "However, the Turkish nation will soon realize who their enemies are. You cannot darken the sun for a long time." The PLO representative in Turkey then stated that the Palestinians expected greater understanding from the Turkish public for their cause. He said: "We cannot part with each other. Can you separate the arm from the body? Turkey is the body in the Middle East and we are the arms."

Addressing a gathering in Istanbul, Abu Firas further said: "The world Zionism tried to establish a Jewish state in Palestine during the Ottoman era, but it failed.

But during the period that followed the occupation of Palestine by Israel, the royal regimes--particularly those in Iraq, Egypt and Jordan--collaborated with Israel in silencing the Palestinian people. However, the Palestinian revolution, which immortial leader 'Abd an-Nasir had described as "the most honorable image in contemporary Arab history," has emerged stronger from every struggle it has waged. In 1967 we waited in vain for a telephone call from 'Abd an-Nasir to say that Cairo had surrendered. But years later, it was Anwar Sadat who not only ran to Begin, but also personally handed Cairo's golden key to the Israeli leader.

JUSTICE PARTY TO BOYCOTT ASSEMBLY SESSIONS

TA191326 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1300 GMT 19 Jun 80

[Text] In its meeting today, the Justice Party [JP] Joint Assembly Group decided not to attend the joint session of the Senate and National Assembly or the National Assembly meeting today. The statement issued by the joint assembly group noted that the decision was unanimous. The statement noted: Our groups have unanimously decided not to attend the joint Grand National Assembly meeting and the National Assembly meeting to be held on 19 June 1980 on the grounds that a shadow was cast on the will of the National Assembly on 17 June 1980 when a parliamentary debate was conducted without holding a roll call as though there was a majority, thus attacking the national will. The public is respectfully informed.

NEVSEHIR GOVERNOR ACCUSES RPP OF STARTING FUNERAL INCIDENT

TA191708 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1600 GMT 19 Jun 80

[Text] Nevsehir Governor Fevzi Alaloglu said that RPP legislators acted irresponsibly during incidents which occured at the funeral of RPP provincial leader Zeki Tekiner in Nevsehir yesterday. Pointing out that all the necessary measures were taken on occasion of the funeral ceremony, Alaloglu said: The funeral ceremony was organized by the party and accordingly measures were taken by us. However, this regretable situation was created when deputies reacted to various attempts to pick a quarrel by personally firing shots.

In statements to the HURRIYET and Mediterrean news agencies, Alaloglu said that, according to initial information and intelligence reports, three RPP deputies were among the first to shoot and that one of these was even warned by a gendarme captain. Alaloglu also noted that there was no sign indicating the shots were fired at the crowd attending the funeral from a building site.

HEADS OF INDUSTRIALIZED NATIONS CONFER IN VENICE

Schmidt, Carter Meet

LD211828 Hamburg DPA in German 1719 GMT 21 Jun 80

[Excerpt] Venice--Before the actual summit talk, Chancellor Helmut Schmidt and U.S. President Jimmy Carter met for an exchange of views in Venice on Saturday evening. The chancellor, at whose suggestion the talk took place, went to see the U.S. President at his hotel on La Giudecca. The talk was attended by Secretary of State Edmund Muskie and Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher. The chancellor has also planned to have dinner with Canadian Prime Minister Pierre Trudeau.

The reason for the talk between Schmidt and Carter was the letter which the U.S. President sent to the chancellor at the end of last week in connection with the latter's trip to Moscow.

Schmidt, Carter Comments

LD211958 Hamburg DPA in German 1939 GMT 21 Jun 80

[Text] Venice--There appear to be no unbridgeable differences of opinion between Bonn and Washington on the central foreign and defense policy issues of the Western alliance. U.S. President Jimmy Carter reached this conclusion on Saturday evening after a 90-minute talk with Chancellor Helmut Schmidt in Venice.

Carter, who only last week had reminded Schmidt in a letter about the NATO position on medium-range missiles in Europe, told journalists after the talks: "I am convinced that the Federal Republic stands fully behind the NATO decision." According to Carter the two partners also agreed on a position on the Afghanistan question, according to which all USSR troops must be withdrawan from the occupied country.

Schmidt, after the meeting with the President, which was extended by 30 minutes beyond the originally planned time, said "I have nothing to add to the President's statement."

The two statesmen also discussed in the U.S. President's hotel on La Giudecca the chancellor's trip to Moscow, planned for the end of this month. Details were not given by the two politicians.

Spokesman: 'Open' Carter-Schmidt Talks

LD212124 Hamburg DPA in German 2050 GMT 21 Jun 80

[Text] Venice--Following the talks between U.S. President Jimmy Carter and Chancellor Helmut Schmidt, Government Spokesman Klaus Boelling told newsmen that "the really good, open talk among friends who can rely on each other," had shown that even an "identity of views" existed between the two governments.

The 'irritation' concerning Carter's letter had been (?discussed) in an "open and friendly manner." This letter would not have come about, Boelling said, if Schmidt's remarks at the Essen SPD Party Congress had been known in Washington. The chancellor had then made absolutely clear that he would not consider "a moratorium" on the implementation of the NATO decision made in Brussels in December. Thus, there had "actually been no call for that letter."

Schmidt and Genscher had informed Carter and Muskie in detail about the purpose of the Moscow trip, Boelling said. There had been "no critical remarks" from the American side, either from (?Carter) or (?from) Muskie. Genscher and the U.S. secretary of state will be meeting for a further talk in Venice, the time for which has not yet been set. All sides regarded the meeting as "really worthwhile," Boelling said.

Giscard Meets With Schmidt

Japanese Delegates Meet Press

OW211259 Tokyo KYODO in English 1253 GMT 21 Jun 80

[Text] Venice June 21 KYODO--Japanese Foreign Minister Saburo Okita said here Saturday he did not foresee an agreement on sanctions against Moscow for its invasion of Afghanistan coming out of the seven-nation summit opening Sunday. Speaking to Japanese reporters, he said no such agreement was likely, although the summit of seven industrial democracies would renew a call for Soviet troops to pull out from Afghanistan.

Okita, who is filling the place of the late Prime Minister Masayoshi Ohira as Japan's chief delegate, arrived in the morning with Finance Minister Noboru Takeshita and Yoshitake Sasaki, minister of international trade and industry. The Japanese foreign minister also saw it unlikely that the summit leaders would delve into the question of Mideast peace.

Takeshita said he was not considering easing the current demand control measures against inflation. "We'll stick to this position at the summit," he said.

Sasaki said the question of Japanese car exports to the United States had already been settled between the two countries and was not fit to be taken up at the summit conference. Okita said, however, the car export issue will have to be discussed if U.S. Secretary of State Edmund Muskie brings it up during a planned tete-a-tete with him.

Paris on USSR Letter, Giscard-Carter Talks

LD211852 Paris Domestic Service in French 1700 GMT 21 Jun 80

[Text] The Soviet ambassador in Paris yesterday afternoon asked to be received by the president of the republic in order to give him an important communication from his government.

President Giscard d'Estaing had already left for Venice to attend the industrialized countries' summit, so Mr Chervonenko was received by the secretary general of the presidency of the republic, Jacques Wahl, who reported the contents of the Soviet message to President Giscard as soon as he arrived in Venice. This message is a sequel to the Warsaw talks and is concerned with the level of Soviet troops stationed in Afghanistan.

The Carter-Giscard talks which take place tomorrow following the unexpected Warsaw meeting between the French president and Mr Brezhnev will not be without interest. We have asked Dominique Souchier, who is one of our special correspondents in Venice, whether he can supply us with further information:

The fact that there has been, on the eve of this summit in Venice, a message from the Soviets is not surprising in itself. After all, when two people get together to speak about a third, it is normal that the third person should make his presence felt, one way or another. As you know, Europe and the United States want to seize the opportunity of this new summit of the industrialized countries to discuss politics, East-West relations and Afghanistan.

This, in fact, is the reason for the message since it concerns the number of troops stationed in Afghanistan.

Nor is the choice of addressee surprising--Valery Giscard d'Estaing is the only head of state taking part in this summit who has seen Leonid Brezhnev since the Soviet intervention. You will remember his visit to Warsaw; France, the president explained on that occasion, must be the interlucutor of the superpowers. Valery Giscard d'Estaing will be meeting Jimmy Carter tomorrow, and this will be the first meeting between the two for more than a year.

Letter on Troop Withdrawals

LD221020 Paris Domestic Service in French 1000 GMT 22 Jun 80

[Text] It has just been learned that, at the luncheon of Western heads of state and government who attend the Venice summit, the president of the republic will inform the summit's participants of the content of the message Leonid Brezhnev sent to him on Friday night. Elysee spokesman Jacques Blot has just announced this, adding that this Soviet message to France concerned the withdrawal of military units stationed in Afghanistan and gave more detailed information than the communique published by TASS this morning.

The Elysee spokesman said a short time ago that there is a link between the transmission of this message to France and the Giscard d'Estaing-Brezhnev meeting on 19 May in Warsaw. One can see in this the proof that communications between the Soviet Union and the Western world continue to function after this meeting.

No Immediate Comment on Letter

WA220800 London REUTER in English 0748 GMT 22 Jun 80

[Excerpts] Venice, June 22, REUTER--President Carter and leaders of the main non-communist industrial democracies opened an economic summit today a few hours after Moscow's announcement that some Soviet units were being withdrawan from Afghanistan.

There was no immediate comment on the brief Soviet announcement as the leaders of the United States, France, West Germany, Britain, Italy, Canada and Japan met on a heavily guarded Venetian island. But Western officials noted that the announcement did not say how many of the estimated 80,000 Soviet troops in Afghanistan would be withdrawn.

Informed Western sources reported during the past few weeks that the Soviet Union was increasing the strength of its forces in Afghanistan. The sources noted that the Moscow announcement coincided with the start of the economic summit here and a meeting in Switzerland of a three-member committee of the Islamic Conference. The recent Moslem conference in Islamabad strongly attacked the Soviet action in Afghanistan and called for the withdrawal of Moscow's forces.

The first indication of the withdrawal of an unspecified number of Soviet troops to reach the West appears to have been a message from President Leonid Brezhnev to French President Valery Giscard d'Estaing which reached Paris on Friday, informed sources said.

Statement on Pullout From Afghanistan

NC221747 Paris AFP in English 1745 GMT 22 Jun 80

[Text] Venice, June 22, (AFP)--The summit of the major Western powers here today condemned the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan and called for the Moscow-announced withdrawal of troops from that country to be "permanent" and "complete."

The demand came in a separate statement by the leaders of the seven most industrialised non-communist countries on the first day of their two-day summit. It was released to a news conference here by Italian Prime Minister Francesco Cossiga.

Countries attending the summit are the United States, Canada, Japan, Britain, France, Italy and West Germany. The "seven" said the Soviet occupation of Afghanistan was "incompatible with the will of the Afghan people for national independence, as demonstrated by their courageous resistance, and with the security of the states of the region".

It was also "incompatible with the principles of the United Nations Charter and with efforts to maintain genuine detente. It undermines the very fundations of peace, both in the region and in the world at large".

The "seven" fully endorsed the United Nations General Assembly resolution adopted last January and the views expressed by the Islamic Conference "at both its recent sessions" the text said.

"Afghanistan should be enabled to regain the sovereignty, territorial integrity, political independence and non-aligned character it once enjoyed. We therefore call for the complete withdrawal of Soviet troops and for the Afghan people to be left free again to determine their own future".

The statement added: "We have taken note of today's announcement of the withdrawal of some Soviet troops from Afghanistan. In order to make a useful contribution to the solution of the Afghan crisis, this withdrawal, if confirmed, will have to be permanent and continue until the complete withdrawal of the Soviet troops. Only thus will it be possible to re-establish a situation compatible with peace and the rule of law and thereby with the interests of (?all nations.) We are resolved to do everything in our power to achieve this objective. We are also ready to support any initiative to this end, such as that of the Islamic Conference. And we shall support every effort designed to contribute to the political independence and to the security of the states of the region.

"Those governments represented at this meeting which have taken a position against attendance at the Olympic games vigorously reaffirm their position," it added.

Hostage Taking Condemned

NC221948 Paris AFP in English 1940 GMT 22 Jun 80

[Text] Venice, June 22 (AFP)--The seven-nation Western summit here tonight implicitly condemned the holding of U.S. diplomatic personnel as hostages in Iran in a joint statement issued here.

The statement, without explicitly referring to the about 53 Americans held in Iran, said heads of state and government of the United States, Britain, Canada, France, West Germany, Italy and Japan "vigorously condemn the taking of hostages and the seizure of diplomatic and consular premises and personnel in contravention of the basic norms of international law and practice".

They urged all governments to "take appropriate measures to deny terrorists any benefits from such criminal acts". They agreed to "provide to one another's diplomatic and consular missions support and assistance in situations involving the seizure of diplomatic and consular establishments or personnel".

The seven leaders said they were determined to "deter and combat" the taking of hostages and attacks on diplomatic premises and personnel. They recalled that "every state has the duty under international law to refrain from organizing, instigating, assisting or participating in terrorist acts in another state or acquiescing in organised activities within its territory directed towards the commission of such acts, and deplore in the strongest terms any breach of this duty".

In a separate statement, the "seven" said that "hijacking remains a threat to international civil aviation and that there can be no relaxation of efforts to combat this threat". They said they "look forward to continuing cooperation with all other governments" towards this end.

The "seven" voiced satisfaction at "the broad support of the international community for the principles set out in the Bonn declaration of July 1978 as well as in the international conventions dealing with unlawful interference with civil aviation. The increasing adherence to these conventions and the responsible attitude taken by states with respect to air hijacking reflect the fact that these principles are being accepted by the international community as a whole", they said.

Statement on Refugee Problem

NC222046 Paris AFP in English 2043 GMT 22 Jun 80

[Text] Venice, June 22 , (AFP)--The seven-nation Venice summit tonight issued a vigorous appeal to governments in Indochina, Cuba and Afghanistan to cease pursuing "policies which drive large numbers of their people from their own countries."

In a joint statement on the worldwide problem of refugees, the "seven" said: "However great the effort of the international community, it will be difficult to sustain it indefinitely. The problem of refugees has to be attacked at its root. The heads of state and government therefore make a vigorous appeal to the governments responsible for it to remove the causes of this widespread human tragedy and not to pursue policies which drive large numbers of their people from their own countries."

Expressing their "deep concern" at the plight of the ever-increasing number of refugees throughout the world, the "seven" noted that "hundreds of thousands have already left the Indochinese peninsula and Cuba, many of them taking the risk of fleeing across the open seas." The leaders recalled that Pakistan and Iran had taken in "almost one million refugees from Afghanistan," and said there were "several million" refugees in Africa.

"The heads of state and government note with great regret that the refugee population continues to grow and that, despite major international relief efforts, their suffering continues," the statement added.

"They pay tribute to the generosity and forebearance with which countries in the regions affected have received refugees. For their part, the countries represented at this summit have already responded substantially to appeals for assistance to and resettlement of refugees.

"They will continue to do so, but their resources are not unlimited. They appeal to others to join with them in helping to relieve this suffering".

Schmidt on World Crises

LD221945 Hamburg DPA in German 1859 GMT 22 Jun 80

[Excerpts] Venice--The seven leading Western industrial nations have this evening in Venice again condemned the Soviet occupation of Afghanistan and have called on Moscow for a complete withdrawal from this country. Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt had drawn the attention of those taking part in the conference to the complex connection which, in his view, exists between the crises in Afghanistan, in Iran and developments in the Middle East. There is the danger that these crises "could merge into a single large-scale crisis." The chancellor underlined the particular importance of the Islamic countries in overcoming the present world problems. Government Spokesman Boelling said that Schmidt received from the other heads of government "the Allies' full backing" for his trip to Moscow planned for the end of the month. The chancellor had set out to the summit the aims of his Moscow visit [words indistinct].

Discussion of Oil Supplies

[Andreas Whittam Smith dispatch: "Venice Move for Summit With Oil Producers"]

[Text] Venice--The industrialised nations of the West are considering whether to engage in direct negotiations with oil producing countries about oil supplies. This idea was taken up by each of the heads of government attending the economic summit meeting being held in Venice but Mrs Thatcher appears to be cautious about the proposals.

The leaders were meeting under the chairmanship of the prime minister of Italy, Francesco Cossiga. They included President Carter, Giscard d'Estaing of France, the German chancellor, Helmut Schmidt, the Prime Minister of Canada Pierre Trudeau and Japanese ministers.

The plan being discussed is that a summit meeting be arranged between three parties, the industrialised countries, the oil producers and the lesser developed countries. They would consider the price of oil and its availability. There is French support for the idea that communist governments be represented.

Mrs Thatcher told the Venice meeting that the world had to grapple with the continuing rise in oil prices. This would require massive investment in energy resources, though the task was made difficult by the onset of recession. Referring to the huge balance of payments surpluses achieved by members of the Organisation of Petroleum Exporting Countries, the prime minister said she was concerned by the redistribution of power as well as of money that was taking place. The question, Mrs Thatcher agreed, was "how to get alongside the oil producers."

She made it plain that she did not favour encouraging communist nations to give more aid to poorer countries in view of the political requirements that were attached to such help. Apart from the traditional British scepticism towards summit meetings, this is one reason why the prime minister was notably cool about the establishment of a summit involving oil producers, industrial nations and possibly the Soviet bloc.

The seven leaders spent Sunday morning discussing economic problems before turning to political questions. Concern about the effects that non-stop increases in oil prices were having, both in terms of inflation and recession, was the dominating issue.

President Giscard proposed setting new energy targets for the seven participants on the grounds that the figures agreed at the Tokyo summit last year for 1980-85 had been too lax because of world recession. He said that stricter targets should be set for the period running up to 1990. By then the seven nations should have managed to save the equivalent of 20 million barrels of oil per day--that is about two-thirds of OPEC's present production. The president also wanted a monitoring group to be set up to supervise achievement of the new targets.

As well as looking at political measures, the seven leaders were outspokenly critical of recent OPEC price decisions. Chancellor Schmidt said that the oil producers should be reminded of their "grave responsibility." OPEC should either give grants to poorer countries or sell oil at a reduced price. He said that some nations were using their entire export earnings just to meet recent increases in oil prices. The German chancellor added that it was unacceptable for the West to provide 90 per cent of the aid going to lesser developing countries and get most of the blame for their problems. In the afternoon finance ministers and energy ministers, who had listened but not contributed to the morning session, were set to work completing the drafting of the economic sections of the communique due to be published tonight.

Cossiga Address on Energy

[Giuseppe Chisari report from Venice]

[Excerpts] The answer of the seven heads of state and government to the TASS announcement of a forthcoming withdrawal from Afghanistan will surely not be kindly received in Moscow. The announcement does not give a clear picture of the Soviet contingents involved. In a joint declaration read to the journalists by Cossiga, as chairman of this summit, the Western attitude has been forcefully reaffirmed: The Soviet military occupation of Afghanistan is unacceptable either today or in the future, and it is incompatible with the will for national independence of the Afghan people.

Having overcore the Afghan hurdle without internal arguments or polemics, the summit sessions are returning to the usual topics of the summit, which is not for nothing termed economic. The introduction was made this morning by Prime Minister Cossiga, who indicated in the energy session the crucial problem for everyone: There is need to reduce consumption, he said, and turn to alternative sources. But in the politics of energy there is a limit to the attitude of the producing countries. Cossiga criticized the recent increase in the price of crude oil decided in Algiers. That decision, he said, continues to create a climate of uncertainty and instability in the entire world economy. The entire package of main economic problems will be reexamined tomorrow.

Draft Final Declaration

NC230630 Paris AFP in English 0618 GMT 23 Jun 80

The chiefs of state and government meeting here say that "we will continue to give our highest priority to insuring the health and safety of the public and to perfecting methods for dealing with accumulation of spent fuel, disposal of nuclear waste, and minimizing the risk of nuclear proliferation..." And they add that "together we intend to double coal production and use by the early 1990's."

The leaders of industrialized nations believe that during the next 10 years, they will be able to produce the equivalent of 15 to 20 million barrels a day of oil in the form of other energy sources. Reliable sources here stressed today that half of this cut in oil consumption will come from greater use of coal, a third from growth in nuclear power, and the rest from renewable energies--especially the sun.

The seven participating nations also agree to:

--Ban construction of new oil-burning power stations except under exceptional circumstances.

--Increase tax provisions aimed at reducing oil use in industry.

--Encourage investments making it possible to economize on energy in housing and commercial buildings.

--Speed up the establishment and use of norms to reduce autonobile gasoline consumption and to adopt pricing decisions on gasoline with such reduction in view.

The seven countries also stated that the price of oil taken from their territories must be based on world prices.

"The centerpiece of our discussion has been energy," the joint statement said. "It is only one of many problems facing the world, but without a solution to it, we cannot deal with inflation, unemployment, protectionism, monetary instability and the threat of stagnation.... All these problems are interrelated, but reducing our demand for oil is necessary to success in other areas, particularly in controlling inflation." The battle against inflation remains "the top priority" of the seven nations at the summit, they said. They also endorsed the resolution adopted by the countries of the Organization of Economic Co-operation and Development (OECD) last month.

Taking up the conclusions of the meeting of the International Energy Agency last month in Paris, the "seven" said that the role of oil in their energy needs will go from 53 per cent today to 40 per cent in 1990.

Concerning the problems of developing countries, the "seven said all industrialized countries, including communist ones and oil producing countries," are responsible for assuring that the Third World has the means for economic growth and social progress. The "seven" said communist countries have made an "inadequate contribution" to world development. The "seven" demanded that industrialized nations, including oil exporting nations, do everything to increase their aid.

In the statement they welcomed the Brandt commission report and said its suggestion of a North-South summit could be useful--at a suitable time.

PAPERS COMMENT ON SOVIET TROOP PULLOUT ANNOUNCEMENT

DW230741 Cologne Deutschlandfunk Network in German to East and West Germany 0505 GMT 23 Jun 80

[Press review]

[Text] MANNHEIMER MORGEN stresses the following point: If Brezhnev had not set off his surprise bombshell just prior to the Western summit meeting in Venice, his message to President Giscard d'Estaing on the withdrawal of some units of the Soviet occupation army from Afghanistan perhaps would have really conveyed the impression that the Kremlin is now preparing the complete pullout to avoid irking the West any further. But it is quite obvious that this time it is just a disturbing maneuver.

Freiburg's BADISCHE ZEITUNG adopts a similar attitude toward this development: Had Moscow indicated its readiness for a partial pullout from Afghanistan essentially earlier, such a signal possibly would have had some effect in the West, for the West had been waiting for quite some time, veritably longing for a signal that might have served as a starting point for defusing the crisis. The unexpected announcement now that it is intended to withdraw several Soviet troop components from Afghanistan will hardly have this effect.

NEUE OSNABRUECKER ZEITUNG stresses this facet: The heads of government gathered in Venice have received the signal from Moscow with due skepticism and caution. The timing of the Soviet announcement on the partial withdrawal of the invasion army from Afghanistan makes it obvious that this must not be taken immediately as a significant change of attitude in the Kremlin. Perhaps more units are still in Afghanistan than are required for quelling the resistance against the foreign occupiers. These facts must not be ignored in the assessment and judgement of Soviet intentions.

HANNOVERSCHE ALLGEMEINE notes: The partial withdrawal from Afghanistan promised by the Kremlin is a cheap move for the Soviet Union. Nothing will change the power conditions in the occupied Central Asian country, and yet the Moscow initiative is not completely insignificant politically. This is the first time that the Kremlin has indicated a step toward evacuating Afghanistan without raising any preconditions, thereby signaling that it does not uncompromisingly insist on its maximum demands in this problem.

Duesseldorf's RHEINISCHE POST writes: The direct dialogue which Moscow seeks with European countries while bypassing the leading U.S. power definitely may be interpreted as an attempt to cause dissension in the Western camp. But beyond that the Soviets obviously do not see in Carter a suitable interlocutor with whom one might debate issues of world politics. It is therefore not surprising that the U.S. President in Venice is pulling all stops to consolidate the confidence of the Europeans again. We cannot but wish him success in this respect. The states of the free world must counteract the military preponderance of the Soviet Union.

PRESS DISCUSSES SCHMIDT-CARTER MEETING IN VENICE

23 Jun Press Review

DW230805 Cologne Deutschlandfunk Network in German to East and West Germany 0505 GMT 23 Jun 80

[Press review]

[Excerpts] AACHENER VOLKSZEITUNG writes: The most remarkable role in the discord of the West is played by Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt.

Some 2 days before he talked to U.S. President Jimmy Carter in Venice he had strongly criticized him in a Washington POST interview. Yet the reprimanded Carter took the chancellor by the hand in Venice. Maybe he thought the following: If the German chancellor goes to Moscow, he must bring back something tangible to impress his voters for the October elections. Maybe he will nevertheless dissociate himself from the decision to close the arms gap. This cannot be ruled out.

KOELNISCHE RUNDSCHAU notes: It was high time that the U.S. President and the German federal chancellor met and talked to each other, as a prelude of the Venice summit, so to speak. If all misunderstandings have been eliminated, as the German Government spokesman said, one must ask oneself: Was all that necessary? It was known for weeks that they would meet in Venice this weekend and that Helmut Schmidt would go to Moscow only afterwards.

BREMER NACHRICHTEN maintains: The matter was indeed astonishing. The Europeans do not at all feel like recipients of orders anymore, but as partners with equal rights. The U.S. administration ought to have understood that long ago. But, as regards Carter, and particularly his adviser Brzezinski, this does not seem to have been the case prior to Venice. The talk was therefore most necessary.

WESTDEUTSCHE ALLGEMEINE ZEITUNG of Essen states: It is obvious that ways of thinking are different on this side of the Atlantic and on the other. They correspond to the different exposures to danger. Washington emphasizes closing the arms gap while Bonn emphasizes suggestions of negotiation linked to it. The chancellor's ideas were supposed to create leeway in this respect; it was supposed to make it easier for the Soviets to save face. This leeway has been curtailed now. Schmidt's task during his Moscow visit has not become easier.

Reconciliation Doubted

DW230902 Munich SUEDDEUTSCHE ZEITUNG in German 23 Jun 80 p 4

[Commentary signed: th.: "Summit of Tutorage"]

[Text] The President and chancellor sat down at the Venetian discussion table even prior to the opening of the world economic summit. This reflected the urgency of the exchange of ideas as well as the superfluousness of an epistilary controversy, especially when they get together a few days later anyway. But in any event, Carter's pencil obviously had been beguiled less by the intention of friendly consultation than by security advisor Brzezinski who obviously also wanted to show to America's new Secretary of State Muskie, too, who is calling the shots in the White House. How else could the U.S. ambassador in Bonn shortly before describe the state of German-American relations entirely differently--surely not without coordination with the State Department?

It may also be this unpredictability of current U.S. policy which made Schmidt react so irritably and start out, first of all, with a half hour's tutorage for Carter in Venice, having earlier censored him in the Washington POST as an inexperienced newcomer on the world political stage. After all, the German side argues with a certain bitterness, was it not the chancellor who urgently pointed out during the SALT II talks between President Ford and party boss Brezhnev in Vladivostok that the Americans should not pay sole attention to the intercontinental missiles threatening the United States but also to the Soviet medium-range missiles targeted on Western Europe?

Be that as it may, such mutual tutorage does not do much good. This discourages them, and it is doubtful whether the Carter-Schmidt dialogue really proceeded as well as the government spokesman dutifully averred.

After all, Schmidt is not the only one who feels insecure with respect to the observance of agreement by the Carter administration. Indeed Moscow knows why it wrote a letter to Giscard d'Estaing as an overture to the Venice summit meeting and why it disseminated news reports on the sending home of some units of the Red Army from Afghanistan.

Narrow 'Basis of Confidence'

[Eberhard Wisdorf commentary: "Whitewash for the Cracks"]

[Text] The world economic summit did not begin under good auspices. It was only a dialogue between U.S. President Carter and Chancellor Schmidt which clarified the controversy or at least put whitewash over the crack that had emerged between Bonn and Washington as so often before during the terms of the two heads of government.

On the one hand, Schmidt deserves understanding for his displeasure. The erraticism of U.S. policy, permeated with preachy categories of morale and punishment and often determined by the hard line of security adviser Brzezinski, shows a lack of steadfastness from Bonn's view. But what is the picture like which the Europeans themselves offer? There has been no solid concepts at all on many questions concerning Western reaction to the Soviet invation of Afghanistan.

All reservations notwithstanding, the chancellor must live with Jimmy Carter as a partner, possibly for another 4 years. It is not just foreign policy which offers a broad field of differences. They may well emerge also in economic and energy policies as a result of further recessionist tendencies in the world economy, even though a chorus of harmony for general formulas will still predominate in Venice.

Once again, information gaps and the press had to take the blame in Venice. Meanwhile, this cannot gloss over the fact that the basis of confidence between Bonn and Washington, as well as between Europeans and Americans, is not very broad. In mutual regard, however, the Europeans must play the greater part. This emerges from the role of the United States as the nuclear protective power, and this is where limitations exist for manifestations of independence.

On 'Surprise' Schmidt Interview

DW230824 Mainz ZDF Television Service in German 1950 GMT 21 Jun 80

[Correspondent Albrecht dispatch from Venice]

[Excerpts] To go by all that had preceded the Schmidt-Carter meeting in the way of discord, misunderstandings, and surely also some concrete and genuine differences of opinion, this meeting was not just any get-together but a particularly critical station in U.S.-German dialogue.

And the rather frank interview of the chancellor with the Washington POST came like a bang this morning; it came as a surprise after the attempt of several days to play down the significance of the critical letter of President Carter.

In any event, the interview was the talk of the town on the eve of a conference whose expediency must not be taken for granted from the outset.

Interference in FRG Elections

DW230834 Cologne Westdeutscher Rundfunk in German 1710 GMT 21 Jun 80

[Excerpts from Peter Bender commentary]

[Text] Carter's public admonishment of Schmidt to exercise loyalty to the Alliance means considerable aggravation of the chancellor's talks in Moscow we cannot but wonder whether this is what the White House intends to do. But this is not all. Admonishing Schmidt publicly to exercise loyalty to NATO also means having him appear in the Federal Republic as requiring such admonition, as being not quite reliable in his dealings with the East. Carter thereby alludes to Schmidt the same things that Kohl and Strauss insinuate. This means that the U.S. President is interfering in the election campaign to the advantage of the CDU/CSU. The personal relationship of the two will be burdened even more than it is already.

FRG-U.S. Politeness

[Commentary by Venice correspondent signed RDS.: "Venetian Politeness"]

[Text] Once again German-American misunderstandings have been eliminated. Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt used the Venice world economic conference for a frank talk with American President Jimmy Carter on the recent irritations among the Alliance partners. As early as in March both "friends" had eliminated some debris from mutual relations on the occasion of Schmidt's visit to Washington.

The cordial handshake in Venice reminded one again of the short-lived character of these demonstrations of unity. Government Spokesman Boelling characterized the discussion by saying that at no earlier meeting had they dealt with each other so frankly and unceremoniously as at this time when the friendly relations between Carter and Schmidt permitted such action. If this is so, this kind of Venetian politeness makes one hope for a longer duration of agreement.

This time it will be more necessary than ever. After all, it was not a coincidence that the Moscow letter to French state President Giscard d'Estaing on the possibility of Soviet troop reductions in Afghanistan had been delivered to the Elysee Palace on the eve of the Western summit.

The great seven will start their 2-day summit tour in Venice with economic and energy policy discussions, but the public can be certain that more explosive matters will be discussed behind closed doors than just economic prospects.

Venice offers the German Government chief 1 week prior to his Moscow visit, a most welcome opportunity to assure himself of the interests and the agreement of his government colleagues--even more so after the Moscow message to Paris. But this exchange of opinion demonstrates it clearly once again that the federal chancellor will not go as an emissary to the Soviet capital. His interests have other main points than those of his friend Giscard and others than those of his newly won "friend" Jimmy, even if he has issues in his goverment luggage in which the U.S. President is interested.

The timing of Moscow's recent letter diplomacy indicates that it has been aiming, last but not least, at the vanity of the Western big shots assembled in Venice. One of the main functions of the Venice meeting, which still is called the "world economic summit," will be to prevent the creation of new misunderstandings and to not hurt anybody's feelings.

COMMENTATOR VIEWS SUMMIT EFFECTS ON SCHMIDT MOSCOW VISIT

[Article signed Rm: "Venetian Mildness"]

[Text] The Venice meeting of the Western statesmen has been loaded with much ballast. An arrogant letter by Carter to Schmidt, an icy answer by Schmidt, both framed by the lush vines of indiscretion. And then, like the ringing in of the Venetian meeting, the talk of the chancellor with a paper, slated for the President. It is almost a duty for a Western citizen to hope that there will be some rapprochement between Carter and Schmidt. But only very small children will believe the Bonn assurances that everything is fine now after the talk in the hotel room in Venice.

Relations between the American and German government chiefs remain tense. It seems, however, that both have mustered restraint in order to avoid further aggravations. Schmidt told Carter that the Federal Government will stick with the NATO decision to close the arms gap. Carter will rely on this now, but will have to take Schmidt on his word. The American President now has accepted that Schmidt will go to Moscow. Nothing indicates even today that the visit will produce much good for the West. But audiences with Brezhnev in this world crisis seem to be something like some later anointing for great European statesmen. Giscard uses every opportunity to praise his surprise meeting with the Soviet party chief in Poland as something important and valuable. Even the unclear Moscow announcement that some units will be withdrawn from Afghanistan is now supposed to retroactively justify the dubious excursion which was supposed to impress people. In view of this, the German federal chancellor cannot be expected to renounce his visit to Moscow.

Schmidt could limit the disadvantage the visit creates for the West by talking to Brezhnev in the right way: indicating that the West cannot but make Moscow pay for the Afghanistan invasion until the troops have been withdrawn. But the Washington POST reports that the chancellor has joined Brandt's opinion that the West must not punish the Soviet Union for the occupation of Afghanistan, an occupation, however, which is unacceptable. What logic! If the West does not make Moscow pay for the occupation of Afghanistan, then it will have to accept it--and who knows what else.

DIE WELT VOICES SKEPTICISM ABOUT VENICE RESULTS

[Peter Gillies article: "The Search of the Seven for Cadence"]

[Excerpt] It is not only economic but also political bad weather clouds which are looming over the summit. The journal STERN reported that Schmidt was supposed to be called on the carpet. The forthcoming trips of the German chancellor to Moscow and to East Berlin, his statements concerning the closure of the arms gap, which are subject to interpretation, require mollifying enlightenment if Carter already feels induced to write letters in an allegedly "rough tone." Yet the political topics in Venice are much broader: security problems of the eighties, the Afghanistan invasion by the Soviets, the unsolved Iran crisis, the Middle East conflict, and the North-South dialogue.

After the last EC summit conference, also held in Venice 10 days ago, nobody can claim now that the European Community is speaking with one strong voice. [paragraph continues]

The internal financial problems with the agricultural market as well as the statement on the right to self-determination for the Palestinians contradict this. The EC rather presents itself with laborious formula compromises and without any energy and security policy of its own.

The laboriously patched-up truce of the Europeans and the present relationship with the United States must be viewed against the background of approaching elections. Giscard D'Estaing and Schmidt are faced with them as is Carter. The communiques, nationally supportive [staatstragend] albeit noncommittal, will be assessed as expressions of vigorously shaped world politics only by benevolent people.

PRC'S HUANG HUA TALKS WITH GENSCHER, SCHMIDT

LD2C1206 Hamburg DPA in German 1100 GMT 20 Jun 80

[Text] Bonn--Chancellor Schmidt and Chinese Foreign Minister Huang Hua met for an exchange of views in Bonn today. The most important subject was thought to be the international crisis situations in Afghanistan, Iran and the Middle East. Earlier, Huang Hua continued his talks with Federal Foreign Minister Genscher. In the afternoon the visitor from Beijing will be received by Federal President Carstens.

The second day of Huang Hua's working visit to Bonn opened with an exchange of views with Zimmermann, head of the CSU Group in the Bundestag. Zimmermann said afterwards that the Chinese side takes a very sober, serious view of the world situation. He agreed with Huang Hua that the countries of the world must face the global Soviet offensive strategy with a long-term, well-coordinated concept. Regarding China's appeal that the countries of Europe, especially the Federal Republic, close ranks with the United States, the CSU politician said he hoped that the present Federal Government would act accordingly.

Details on Talks

LD201537 Hamburg DPA in German 1430 GMT 20 Jun 80

[Excerpt] Bonn--Chancellor Schmidt and Chinese Foreign Minister Huang Hua are agreed that the current crises in Afghanistan, the Middle East and Iran must be assessed in an overall political context. This was stated by the government spokesman in Bonn today at the end of a 2-hour intensive exchange of views between the chancellor and the guest from Beijing. Huang Hua was later received by Federal President Carstens.

The chancellor and the Chinese foreign minister called for equal partnership between Europe and the United States. Huang Hua welcomed the Middle East policy of the European Community and its cooperation with the Southeast Asian group, ASEAN. Both sides stressed their great interest in deepening German-Chinese consultation and cooperation.

In earlier talks with Huang Hua, Federal Foreign Minister Genscher referred to the Moscow visit which the federal chancellor will make in 10 days time and in which he will accompany Schmidt. According to the Foreign Ministry, reference to the Moscow visit was made in connection with explanations given by Genscher concerning the state of East-West relations and Bonn's efforts to achieve progress on arms control and subsequent equilibrium. Genscher accepted an invitation to visit China.

BARRE ADDRESSES BUSINESSMEN, SUPPORTS REORGANIZED EEC

NC202203 Paris AFP in English 2146 GMT 20 Jun 80

[Excerpts] Trier, West Germany, June 20 (AFP)--French Prime Minister Raymond Barre suggested in a speech here today that the European Economic Community (EEC) must change radically if it accepts new members.

"The Community is going to grow from nine to 12 members in the next few years," Mr Barre said. "It is difficult to see how it can function in the same manner as it did when it has six or nine members."

The French prime minister, speaking to the Association of Chambers of Commerce and Industry, said that the EEC would have to reorganize its financing so that some countries would not confront "intolerable" burdens while others reaped unfair benefits.

Mr Barre appeared to suggest that France favored a Europe "a la carte", where there would be room for greater differences among the member countries. He asked if all of the members should "be bound to do everything at the same time and in the same fashion."

The prime minister's comments were seen here as an endorsement of proposals by West German Chancellor Helmut Schmidt at the recent EEC summit meeting in Venice, Italy. Mr Schmidt suggested a reorganization of the EEC to spread more evenly the burdens and the benefits of the West European union among the member states.

In his speech today, Mr Barre said that both countries "should have that place in the construction of Europe that is reserved to them by history. This place is, in France's view, central."

But the prime minister said that "common sense" obliged the EEC members to "recognize that it is not possible to negotiate seriously with Spain and Portugal" because of the unsolved problem of the Common Market's financing.

Observers in Paris said that Mr Barre appeared to be following up President Giscard d'Estaing's "trial balloon" with another and that both signal a major French reappraisal of the nature of the EEC.

Discusses Afghanistan With Francois-Poncet

LD211654 Paris Domestic Service in French 1600 GMT 21 Jun 80

[Text] Afghanistan was discussed today by the French and Chinese. Chinese Foreign Minister Huang Hua had a 3-hour meeting in Paris with Jean Francois-Poncet. As he was leaving the Quai d'Orsay, the Chinese minister stated that he had spoken about the Soviet occupation of Kabul. In his opinion, the Soviet soldiers are there to stay. At the same time, in Beijing the press today--on the eve of the Venice summit--denounced a Western trend toward appeasement of the USSR.

Comment on Meeting

NC211704 Paris AFP in English 1657 GMT 21 Jun 80

[Text] Paris, June 21 (AFP)--Afghanistan was the main subject of a 3-hour meeting here today between Chinese Foreign Minister Huang Hua and French Foreign Minister Jean Francois-Poncet, Mr. Huang Hua confirmed. "We touched upon international problems of major importance, at the center of which is Afghanistan," Mr. Huang Hua said, as he left the Foreign Ministry building after the luncheon meeting. He said that he and Mr. Francois-Poncet also discussed the situation in the Indochinese peninsula and especially in Cambodia, as well as North and South Korea.

Mr. Huang said that he had no knowledge of the new China news service criticism of French President Valery Giscard d'Estaing's visit to the Soviet Union last month or of West German Chancellor Helmut Schmidt's plans to go to Moscow on June 30. He added, however, that all those who have held, or plan to hold, talks with the Soviet leaders "have the same opinion: The USSR is not going to pull its troops out of Afghanistan. The Soviet Union is now indulging in political blackmail."

According to an authoritative French source, Mr. Francois-Poncet did not regard Mr. Huang Hua's remarks as a criticism of France's desire to maintain a dialogue with the Soviet Union or of President Valery Giscard d'Estaing's meeting with Soviet leader Leonid Brezhnev in Warsaw. The source added that the Chinese minister, on the contrary, was anxious to obtain information on the French and Soviet leaders' talks.

Observers here said that both France and China condemned the Soviet intervention in Afghanistan although both countries differ as to the means of settling the problem. They also said that the Chinese attitude toward East-West detente had evolved since the visit of Chinese Premier Hua Guofeng visit to West Europe last year. According to the observers, China is now less hostile to detente.

Mr. Huang Hua w s accompanied by Yao Guang, China's ambassador to Paris. Among those included in the alks on the French side were Gabriel Robin, the Foreign Ministry's director of political affairs.

EGYPTIAN ECONOMY MINISTER VISIT RESULTS IN FINANCIAL PROTOCOLS

NC211910 Cairo MENA in Arabic 1413 GMT 21 Jun 80

[Excerpts] Paris, 21 June--French Prime Minister Raymond Barre received in his office today Egyptian Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Economy and Planning Dr 'Abd ar-Razzaq 'Abd al-Majid. Dr 'Abd al-Majid stated after the meeting that it had been very beneficial and that he was happy to have had the opportunity to meet with Mr Raymond Barre.

He added that during the meeting they discussed the results of his visit to France in the light of the number of protocols and agreements signed between Egypt and France. He said that the total value of the protocols which were signed during this visit was about 2 billion French francs. The protocols pertain to the financing of the Cairo subway project, the renovation of the telephone network, and other projects.

Dr 'Abd al-Majid affirmed that these agreements symbolize the role which France is playing in the Middle East in general and in Egypt in particular. He said that the signing of these agreements gives us the hope that during the eighties the relations and solidarity between France and Egypt would be reinforced and made more effective in order to contribute to the improvement of the conditions not only in Egypt but in the Middle East as well.

Dr 'Abd al-Majid said that one of the important subjects he discussed with the French prime minister was France's contribution to making Alexandria a financial center for the Mediterranean area. He said that a study has actually been prepared in this respect. He expressed Egypt's desire to play a leading role in it.

PCF WEEKLY DEPUTY EDITOR RESIGNS OVER 'POLITICAL' DIFFERENCES

[Unattributed report: "Mr Francois Hincker Leaves REVOLUTION"]

[Text] Mr Francois Hincker, deputy chief editor of the PCF weekly REVOLUTION, sent a letter to Mr Guy Hermier, editor of this publication and PCF Politburo member, on Tuesday, 17 June, in which he announced his resignation from all his duties on the publication.

The conflict is the result of Mr Hermier's refusal to publish a polemical article by Mr Hincker replying to a series of articles by Mr Lucien Marest on the PCF's cultural policy. Mr Hincker thinks that Mr Marest, who he says occupies "a quasi-official position in the intellectuals and culture section of the Central Committee," expressed in his articles positions which call into question the PCF's line on creative activity. "The subject of this conflict," Mr Hincker stressed in his letter of resignation, "is political not personal."

CARTER CONCLUDES VISITS WITH LEADERS, DEPARTS ROME

Banquet Hosted by Pertini

[Excerpt] A banquet given by the head of state in honor of the guest ended a short while ago. It proved to be an important event not only on the [words indistinct] plane but also an occasion for Pertini and Carter to address each other with the traditional exchange of greetings.

The two toasts, the two speeches were rich in content and provided a further exposition of the topics dealt with in today's meetings. Pertini said that Western solidarity must be translated into concerted and consistent attitudes. He expressed his keen solidarity with the United States on the question of the hostages in Tehran and condemned the intervention in Afghanistan. He spoke above all about Europe, criticizing those countries which [words indistinct] with reference to Germany and especially France. He thanked the United States for its support and protested against the countries that have carried out discrimination [words indistinct] role and importance.

Carter dealt with three topics: the invasion of Afghanistan as a strategic challenge to the vital interests of the West, the energy crisis and inflation, and the Atlantic Alliance. He said that the West did not wish to return to the cold war but could not hold back from condemning the Soviet invasion. He assured that he will work for the ratification, as soon as opportune, of SALT II.

Radical Leader Turned Away

AU211355 Rome ANSA in English 0830 GMT 21 Jun 80

[Text] Rome, June 21 (ANSA)--The only party leader who was not present at the reception for United States President Jimmy Carter at the Quirinale Palace here yesterday evening was the Radical Party's Secretary Guiseppe Rippa. Like all the other party leaders--including Christian Democrat Party Secretary Flaminio Piccoli or Communist Party Secretary Enrico Berlinguer, he received an invitation. But he got turned away for the writing on his brow: the words, "one percent". When the majordomo saw the words, Rippa was turned away. Rippa wrote the phrase on his forehead to remind the personalities present of the United Nations resolution requiring the industrialized nations to pay one percent of their income to help the struggle against world hunger.

The Radical Party is currently sponsoring a series of ten referendums in Italy on topics ranging from the banishment of crimes of opinion to the repeal of medieval articles in the penal code. The Radicals, primarily a vocal civil rights group, pointed out later that the writing on Rippa's brow was only "emblematic and in no way offensive to anyone".

Joint Statement

LD201858 Rome Domestic Service in Italian 1700 GMT 20 Jun 80

[Excerpts] Carter's talks with President of the Republic Pertini and Prime Minister Cossiga have ended. Here is a report by Angelo Haver:

The political substance of the visit rests on the outcome of this morning's talks and is contained in a long joint press declaration by the U.S. and Italian sides.

The questions that were being asked before the summit in Venice--to be attended by seven of the most industrialized countries--and following the other Venice summit called the European summit concerned relations with the USSR after the invasion of Afghanistan, the economic and energy crisis of the Western countries and the Iranian crisis.

But, all these specific topics there was another question of basic importance, namely, the question of the United State's hegemonistic role in the Western world which certain recent European attitudes and unilateral initiatives on the part of France and Federal Germany seem to challenge. The tone and contents of the joint declaration provides answers which the journalists following Carter describe as reassuring. We shall now (?sum up) the essential points of the declaration.

The exchange of views has been described as fruitful. The meetings between Presidents Carter and Pertini and between Carter and Cossiga are regarded as constructive. These meetings were also attended by Secretary of State Muskie and Foreign Minister Colombo. The relations between the two countries are described as very close.

The Soviet invasion of Afghanistan is deemed to be a serious threat to peace which requires a global strategy on the part of the West to convince the USSR of the need for a speedy and complete withdrawal of its troops.

The need has been recognized for a greater European commitment in the sphere of NATO in view of the U.S. effort for a security structure in the Persian Gulf and Southwestern Asia. There is mutual satisfaction with NATO's decisions in the realm of building adequate field nuclear forces, that is to say the Euromissiles.

Appreciation has been expressed for Italy's support for the international efforts to bring about the liberation of the hostages in Iran, a situation which is harming the restoration of the international prestige of that country. American pledges itself to bring about global peace in the Middle East on the basis of the Camp David accords which, in Carter's opinion, form a valid structure for ending conflict in that part of the world.

Prime Minister Cossiga expressed full agreement with the objective of a global and lasting peace, which is just for all--for Israel as well as for the Arab countries and the Palestinian people. Both sides have agreed that detente can be achieved on the condition that its global and indivisible features be recognized as indispensable.

With regard to the serious economic and energy problems confronting the Western world and with reference to the Venice summit, it has been agreed to further increase the already close bilateral relations within the framework of a global strategy of peace and security and for combating hunger and injustice in the world. The decision of the two governments has been announced to cooperate in designing the biggest installation in the world for the conversion of solar energy into electric power. The plant will be installed in the Province of Puglie.

Press Comment

AU211600 Rome ANSA in English 1525 GMT 21 Jun 80

[Text] Rome, June 21 (ANSA)--Italian papers focused today on U.S. President Jimmy Carter's current visit to Italy.

Turin's LA STAMPA said that Italy confirmed itself as a solid ally of the United States while remaining faithful, at the same time, to its commitments to the European Community. An independent Europe is not something that will occur tomorrow, the paper said, but remains a goal of prime importance. In the meantime, close ties with the West's biggest power becomes "a primordial condition of equilibrium", LA STAMPA said.

For IL MANIFESTO, the paper to the left of the Communist Party, Carter's Rome stopover served to draw up a joint strategy with the Italian Government for the Venice summit of industrialized nations which starts tomorrow. The impression the paper received was that Carter can count on Italian Premier Francesco Cossiga for support at the summit of the big seven: U.S.A., Canada, Britain, France, Italy, Germany and Japan.

Milan's IL GIORNO said that the Carter-Cossiga talks seemed also to have dissolved the impression of a certain lack of harmony provoked by the statement on the Mideast issued by the Community Nine last week. The question was how much this counted economically and politically for both Italy and the United States, the daily said.

Rome's LA REPUBBLICA wrote that "after the visit of Jimmy Carter in Italy there is no doubt: Because of the role it plays in the Atlantic Alliance as well as in the framework of the EEC, the Cossiga government has come to be considered the United States' most loyal ally". More than once the French and the Germans have disappointed the Carter administration, the paper said, the former with their devil-may-care initiatives and the latter with their stubborn defense of their Ostpolitik's "fragile gains", the paper continued.

Rome's PAESE SERA, which is close to the Italian Communist Party, wrote in an ironic vein that it is a pity for Carter that all his government allies were not as loyal and attentive as the Italian Government. It was even more of a pity for Carter, however, that Italy has such a weak, not to say nonexistent foreign policy, the paper said. Together with Italy's fragility and instability this makes it pretty much an ally that is good for nothing, the daily concluded.

Rome's IL TEMPO said that the Italo-American alliance was bursting with health. The talks that Carter has had in Rome with head of state Sandro Pertini, Premier Frencesco Cossiga and Foreign Minister Emilio Colombo have helped verify the role that Italy plans to take in the West's overall strategy, according to the daily. The visit also confirmed a link which on the eve of the U.S. presidential elections could prove useful to Carter, IL TEMPO reasoned.

The Communist Party daily L'UNITA spoke of the "ostentatious alignment" Italy showed towards the U.S. An alignment which was "even more alarming in that it represents a calculated blow to the back of the other European nations, equally allied to Italy and members of the same community, who have patiently and astutely sought to develop an autonomous initiative capable of interpreting Europe's own interests in the present international crisis". L'UNITA also saw this effusive show of solidarity as an inept attempt to paralyze the already difficult diplomatic mission that West German Chancellor Helmut Schmidt is about to undertake in Moscow.

Commentary Stresses Accord

LD210958 Rome Domestic Service in Italian 0600 GMT 21 Jun 80

[Untego Clemanzai commentary]

[Text] The problem of Atlantic solidarity in the light of the U.S. President's talks in Rome. Here in the studio is Untego Clemanzai:

The discussions and the initiatives and even the disagreements which shape the relations inside an alliance of free countries have been drawn together, which is a justification for being allies. This is the full meaning of the talks in Rome for the U.S. President and for those in charge of Italian policies. It is a positive result also on account of the fact that it was not taken for granted. It is easier now to rebuild the basic hypothesis of American foreign policy. It is also simpler now to evaluate the Italian capacity to express the needs of autonomous yet unitary contributions on the part of the Allies. This tendency, which constitutes the oustanding result of the present phase of discussions among the Allies, is confirmed by the flashpoints of international crisis.

Afghanistan is regarded as an unavoidable route to comprehensive and global detente, valid for all and everywhere, yet the emphasis being on the need for detente itself. Iran, with its problem of freeing the hostages, which is regarded as prejudicial, is a point of respect for international law, but at the same time emphasis is laid on the will to respect the comprehensive choices of the Iranian people.

As for the Mideast peace talks, emphasis is laid on the validity of the Camp David accords, but it is recognized that peace in the region must involve all the parties concerned and hence also the Palestinians in order to be effective for all concerned.

The new NATO strategic arms are regarded as essential for maintaining the balance of forces among the superpowers, but they are not sufficient in themselves to guarantee peace. In brief, there is agreement between Italy and the United States, but this agreement does not overcome the crisis points. However, it does strengthen global negotiations on the world scene.

There is one certainty. The greater the degree of consensus on national policies, the stronger the Alliance. Among the Allies, in brief, there is a scheme of no privileges and no penalties. In the present international balance of forces, this is by no means a marginal contribution to the strengthening of peaceful equilibria.

L'UNITA 18 Jun Commentary

[Unattributed commentary: "Carter Too Proves Us Right"]

[Text] For the love of our country, we would like to imagine that the prime minister and the foreign and defense ministers felt embarrassed and irritated by the unacceptable coarseness of the references to the Italian situation made by the White House spokesman. And we would also like to imagine that they will be demanding an explanation from the authoritative guest who is about to arrive. One is prompted to wonder what might have happened if Brezhnev had publicly welcomed the Christian Democratic Party's electoral defeat in 1975. It would have been termed an affront to the nation--and rightly so.

But we will not pursue that argument any further. What is much more important is the substance, which is certainly no less coarse than the form. And the substance of the statement, intended to describe the purpose of the U.S. President's visit, lies in an imperialist and patronising view of international relations, especially relations with the Allies. Italy is good because it has fallen in line without complaining and because it has removed the Communists from the threshold of government. Italy is in fact very good because with a "steadfast stance" it has said "yes," without counterdemands or reservations, to missile rearmament. Italy is indeed exemplary because it places its "strategic position" at the service of U.S. strategy in the Mediterranean and with respect to the Middle East. It is not surprising that Eurocommunism is annoying to those who have such a view of Europe.

Grave, too, is the reference to Yugoslavia, grouped with the "good guys" because of its "resistance to Soviet pressure" and the future possibility that it might try to destabilize the Eastern bloc. What coarseness and short-sightedness!

Socialist Yugoslavia is nonaligned and independent and accepts "pressure" from nobody. Is it possible that Washington cannot see how much Eurocommunism there is in this?

Throughout the statement, the "bastion" Italy is viewed as nothing more than an unchanging pawn without any will of its own. Who encouraged the Americans to form such an idea of us? For having criticized the government's specific acts of foreign policy we have prompted charges of factiousness, pro-Sovietism, of wanting to injure solidarity, the Italian Socialist Party, and so forth. Well, here is further proof that we were right. The issue was not and is not a conflict between Westerners and non-Westerners; it was not and is not a matter of questioning alliances, but of questioning our position in the alliances, Europe's role, the policy being pursued and also national dignity, sovereignty and security. This will be the test bed for the orientation of every democratic force and especially every leftwing force.

Meeting With Pope

LD211532 Vatican City in English to Central and West Europe 1345 GMT 21 Jun 80

In his discourse, in reply to the greetings extended to him by the American President, John Paul II told him how greatly his visit was appreciated. I am pleased to see in it, he said, an indication of your country's profound respect and esteem for ethical and religious values. The pope then continued: All fields of human endeavor are enriched by true ethical values. There is no sphere of activity that does not benefit when religious values are actively pursued. The political, social and economic domains are authenticated and reinforced by the application of those moral standards that must be irrevocably incorporated into the tradition of every state. After stressing the church's collaboration in the protection and promotion of human rights, John Paul II said: Mr President, I wish to assure you of my deep interest in every effort aimed at the betterment of humanity and devoted to world peace. In a particular way the Middle East and the neighboring regions occupy our common attention, because of the immense importance they hold for international well-being. I offer my prayers that all worthy endeavors at reconciliation and cooperation may be crowned with success.

The question of Jerusalem (?is critical) to a just peace in those parts of the world, since this holy city embodies interests and aspirations that are shared by different peoples in different ways. It is my hope that a common monotheistic tradition of faith will help to promote harmony among all those who call upon God. I would renew my earnest plea that just attention be given to the issues affecting Lebanon and to the whole Palestinian problem. The pope then continued, in his own words:

[Begin John Paul II recording] The Hole See is aware of the worldwide aspects of the responsibility that falls to the United States. It is likewise conscious of the risks involved in facing this responsibility. But. despite all inconveniences and problems, despite human limitations, governments and good will must continue to work for peace and for international understanding in the control and reduction of armaments, in the promotion of the North-South dialogue and in furthering advancement of developing nations. [end recording]

Referring to his recent visit to Africa, the pope pointed out the need to safeguard and reinforce African stability, independence and rightful autonomy. John Paul II then concluded with the following words:

[Begin John Paul II recording] As I mentioned, my contacts with the people of the United States are vivid in my memory: enthusiasm and generosity, the will not to fall into (?enslaving) materialism, in the pursuit of the common good at home and in the international field, and for Christians the need to communicate justice and the peace of Christ--these are the forces that the Holy See encourages for the benefit of humanity. [end recording]

For his part, President Carter in his address expressed the deep admiration of the American people for the pope's efforts in favor of peace, the promotion of human rights and against hunger in the world. He also thanked him for his efforts on behalf of the 53 United States hostages in Tehran and gave his assurances that the American Government would do its utmost to avert the danger of nuclear destruction.

In his meeting with the American community in the Clementine Hall, Mr Carter praised the pope's moral leadership and concluded: As head of the United States and as a Christian, I am happy to present to you John Paul II, who works for peace and against violence, hunger and injustice. The pope in turn praised the heritage of the American people, but stressed that it incurs a responsibility. As a people, he said, you have a shared responsibility for preserving freedom and for purifying it.

[Text] U.S. President Carter is going to Venice where he will take part in the summit of the seven most industrialized countries, which will open its sessions tomorrow. This morning after ending his state visit to Italy where he paid tribute to the memory of Aldo Moro, Carter had talks in the Vatican with John Paul II for over an hour.

Minister of Foreign Trade Manca has given an interview to L'EUROPEO dealing with Carter's talks in Rome and relations between Italy and the United States. The Socialist Party spokesman believes there is a need to reaffirm Italy's role as an Atlantic partner of the first rank and to reestablish with Washington an organic and loyal relationship without questioning the role the United States has to play in Europe. According to Spadolini, Secretary of the Republican Party, there cannot be a really autonomous political role for the European Community outside solidarity and close agreement between the Nine and the United States.

KIPRIANOU DEPARTS FOR TALKS IN ATHENS, MAKES STATEMENT

NC230744 Nicosia Domestic Service in Greek 0700 GMT 23 Jun 80

[Text] President Kiprianou left for Athens this morning where he will hold talks with Greek President Karamanlis and the Greek Government on the latest Cyprus developments and the handling of the issue in the future. President Kiprianou is accompanied by Foreign Minister Rolandhis.

In a statement prior to his departure, President Kiprianou stressed that he attaches particular importance to the talks he will have with Greek President Karamanlis, Prime Minister Rallis and his government because, he added, we have reached a stage of the Cyprus problem where we should examine together, in a general review of the latest developments, how the issue should be handled in the future. He also said that he will discuss with the Greek Government what steps should be taken next both with regard to the efforts to resume the inter-Cypriot dialogue and to other measures. These steps or methods of handling the issue have been made imperative by the latest developments.

The president of the republic pointed out that this is his first visit to Athens since Mr Karamanlis assumed the office of the Greek president and Mr Rallis the office of prime minister. Mr Kiprianou stressed that Cyprus, as always, places many hopes on the support and solidarity of Greece which constitutes the main prop of our struggle. He added: This support has thus far been indeed multifaceted and the Cypriot people are grateful for it.

The president of the republic was seen off at Larnaca Airport by House President Mikhailidhis, who will be acting for him during his absence; the commerce minister on behalf of the Council of Ministers; the Greek charge d'affaires, members of the House of Representatives, the National Guard and police chiefs and other officials.

[From the "Radical" column: "Nimetz's Mission "]

[Text] Beginning today U.S. Assistant Secretary of State Nimetz will be an official visitor in Athens for 4 days and will have successive meetings and working sessions with top government personalities--as has been reported--to prepare for the meeting of our foreign minister, K. Mitsotakis, with his U.S. counterpart, Muskie, which will take place next week in Ankara within the framework and on the sidelines of the NATO meeting there. Nimetz's capacity or rather "speciality"--he is competent on issues of military "aid" and technology--and the prolongation of his stay in the Greek capital at the request of the U.S. Government confirm that his mission is much broader and the issues to be discussed are more serious than the details of a protocol for the meeting of two ministers. The Americans are in a hurry for our country's reconfinement within the NATO military wing, which the New Democracy government also desires, but the Americans link this with new, much heavier concessions, on the part of Greece so that their new cold war plans against the countries of the Middle and Near East can be absolutely served. The Americans demand exclusive control over a large part of the Aegean, the opportunity at any time to install bases on certain Greek islands, which they consider to be suitable as replacements for the aircraft carriers of the 6th Fleet, and the consolidation and expansion of the status of their other bases. The last thing on Washington's mind is our country's independence and its sovereign rights within its territory and the fate of our country's people in case the U.S. Pentagon's military adventurism makes our country the target of reprisals. For this reason, as the day of the NATO meeting in Ankara approaches, where the Americans believe--NATO Secretary General Luns expressed some optimism on this--that the solution will be found for Greece's return to the Atlantic Alliance's military structure, they are increasing their pressure and extortions against our country. Nimetz is the bearer of specific extortionist proposals from Washington, which wants to know first hand, before the Ankara meeting, the details of a possible Greek reaction so that there can be suitable preparation backstage at the Turkish capital. It is certain that as long as official Greece remains attached to the doctrine of "we belong to the West" and as long as it begs for return to NATO, the Americans will not give up their efforts to involve our country in their criminal plans. On the contrary, they will increase their machinations and extortions.

MITSOTAKIS: RETENTION OF U.S. BASES DEPENDS ON RETURN TO NATO

AT211400 Athens I VRADHINI in Greek 21 Jun 80 p 1

[Excerpt] In a firm, realistic and blunt manner next week Greece will place before the West its responsibilities for the continuing crisis in the Alliance's southeastern wing and the more general danger of a possible upset in the balance of forces in the Aegean area.

Indicative of the Greek Government's determination is Foreign Minister Konstandinos Mitsotakis' statement that "if Greece does not return to the NATO military wing, the retention of the U.S. bases (on Greek territory) will be very difficult because their presence here is based precisely on the prerequisite that Greece be a member of the Alliance."

It is foreseen that this categorical position--which is subject to absolutely no misinterpretation--wil be repeated by Mitsotakis to his U.S. counterpart Edmund Muskie, whom he will meet at 1600 on Tuesday, a few hours after their arrival in Ankara to participate in the Alliance's spring ministerial council on 25-26 June.

The issues of the U.S. bases and our country's return to the Alliance's military wing are predicted to be two of the principal issues the two ministers will discuss, of course, in addition to the full scope of Greek-U.S. relations, the situation in the area, and so forth.

Actually the Greek Government does not seem to be prepared to begin substantive talks with Washington--when the latter asks--on the new agreement for the bases if the issue of our return to NATO has not previously been resolved.

As authoritative sources have stressed, we are now ready only for preparatory or exploratory talks but not for talks on the substance of the issue.

AKROPOLIS CRITICIZES AID TO TURKEY DURING 'CRISIS'

AT201342 Athens AKROPOLIS in Greek 20 Jun 80 p 2

[From the "Laconic" column: "The West's Crisis"]

[Text] All these meetings and talks which have recently been taking place, with President Carter's tour of Europe the most significant among them, have a common denominator. They are intended to confront the manifold and multilateral crisis through which the Western world, specifically its defense organization, is passing because of a great deal of mistakes, omissions, negligence or bad handling. If we attempt even a desultory analysis of the causes which have provoked it, we would go very far. However, it is now commonly acknowledged that the older concord and unanimity among the countries of the West, especially between Europe and the United States, no longer exist. Differences have manifested themselves that are not so much due to economic reasons but to political ones and an atmosphere of mistrust, hesitation and doubt has been cultivated. In any case, the countries of the West understand that in this critical period which the world is passing through their survival depends on the restoration of their unity, the charting of a common policy and a more harmonious and effective coordination of their efforts to neutralize the dangers which threaten them. However, it appears that the achievement of this desirable goal is not so easy. Assessments of dubious correctness continue to be made and certain countries continue to make decisions that are incomprehensible to say the least. This is especially apparent in the southeastern wing of the Western defense system which is the most critical in the current international conditions. Instead of asking Turkey to face up to its responsibilities and bringing it in line, some countries have been entrapped by its selfish game. They cannot understand that this country does not give a hoot about the Alliance but simply exploits it, trying to suck as much as possible from it. After all, at the same time it profits from the Soviet Union; it has succeeded in becoming fourth on the list of countries aided by the latter, that is, it receives aid greater than that given even to certain countries of the Eastern bloc. Naturally, Moscow does not work on Turkey's behalf. It helps and encourages it in the game it is playing because its own aims in the Aegean and generally in the eastern Mediterranean are also served. True, it is Turkey which has paralyzed the southeastern wing of NATO and can create even more serious issues among the Western world with its chauvinistic policy. Yet certain states in the Alliance spend hundreds of millions of dollars to continue a policy that will be to the detriment of the West whereas with the same money they could put an end to and repair the damage which Ankara has caused to the southeastern sector of their defense.

ERKMEN ON UPCOMING NATO MEETING, TALKS WITH MITSOTAKIS

TA222025 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 2000 GMT 22 Jun 80

[Text] Foreign Minister Hayrettin Erkmen has said that the approach to be taken to the solution of the problems between Turkey and Greece will be discussed at the meeting he will hold with Greek Minister of Foreign Affairs Konstandinos Mitsotakis, who will arrive in Turkey to attend the NATO ministerial council meetings.

In a statement to the ANATOLIA News Agency, Erkmen said Turkey did not oppose Greece's return to the NATO military wing and that this was an issue concerning NATO and Greece. Erkmen reiterated that Turkey does not recognize Greece's claim to a 10-mile airspace over the Aegean.

Noting that aid to Turkey and Portugal will be discussed at the NATO ministerial council meetings to begin in Ankara on Wednesday, Erkmen said: We have said earlier and we are still saying that the aid to be extended to Turkey within the NATO framework is insufficient.

FOREIGN MINISTRY REJECTS GREEK AEGEAN AIRSPACE CLAIM

TA201629 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1600 GMT 20 Jun 80

[Text] It has been announced that Turkey does not recognize the claim that Greece controls 10 miles of airspace over the Aegean. In a statement issued in Ankara, Foreign Ministry spokesman Savlet Aktug recalled that Greece has, for some time, been claiming that it controls 10 miles of airspace--extending from the shore--over the Aegean. Aktug noted that there were reports and commentaries in the Greek press that the Greek airspace, which is claimed to be 10 miles, was violated during the recent Seawolf-80 exercise conducted by the Turkish Armed Forces in the Aegean. Pointing out that Turkey certainly does not recognize Greece's claim of a 10-mile airspace, Aktug said: Greece's claim of a 10-mile airspace is tantamount to violating international airspace. During the recent Seawolf-80 exercise Turkey acted, as before, in accordance with the principle that the Greek airspace is 6 miles and will continue to conduct its future military exercises in the same manner.

RPP DISTRICT LEADER KILLED IN ISTANBUL; ECEVIT SENDS MESSAGE

TA221640 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1600 GMT 22 Jun 80

[Text] Istanbul Deputy Mayor and RPP Beyoglu District leader Bulent Demir has been killed by terrorists in Istanbul's Kasimpasa District. According to information obtained by TRT correspondents from security directorate officials, unidentified armed murderers attacked Demir while he was speaking with a friend at his father's grocery store on (Vatikani) Street. Officials said that Demir died instantly and that Gulsum Karademir, Mehmet Tarakci and Zeki Karakartal, who were at the scene of the incident during the attack, were wounded. The murderers, who escaped after the incident, are being sought.

RPP leader Bulent Ecevit sent messages of condolence to the victim's wife, Kamuran Demir, and to RPP Istanbul provincial leader Fikret Gundogan. In his telegram, Ecevit said that those who are trying, one by one, to eliminate RPP members, whom they see as the most powerful obstacle on the path to fascism, will not be victorious because the endless source of our strength is the loyalty of the Turkish people to democracy and its determination to keep democracy alive.

According to information obtained from Siverek Public Prosecutor Zeki Cetin Atakan, an armed terrorist arrived at Karatasli's house around 1600 today. The terrorists shot and killed Karatasli. Officials said that an extensive operation is being conducted in the district in order to capture the terrorist, who has been identified.

RPP CITES NEVSEHIR INCIDENTS AS THREAT TO DEMOCRACY

Ecevit on Harassment

TA201507 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1400 GMT 20 Jun 80

[Text] RPP General Administrative Council met today and discussed the Nevsehir incidents. A statement was issued at the end of the meeting. Reading the statement to the press, RPP leader Bulent Ecevit said that the Nevsehir incidents constitute a new stage in the scheme to destroy democracy. Ecevit noted that the incidents were well-planned and well-timed attempts of a massacre and that they occurred before the eyes of reporters and public officials. Reading a part of the General Administrative Council statement, Ecevit said:

[Begin Ecevit recording] The Nevsehir incidents show once more whether elections can be held in a country where the leaders of the main opposition party--which has not been involved in any kind of terrorist incident--are being killed one after the other, where the opposition party's members of parliament are not able to attend a funeral without risking death; where policemen are not able to protect their own lives; where certain governors pretend not to hear the shots being fired near them; where one's telephone is cut off when one is calling the state forces; and where citizens are scared to go out into the streets and even sit inside their homes and shops. As long as those who propose to hold elections relying on the use of force and not on the people continue to remain in power, it is impossible to hold elections or ensure the survival of democracy. [end recording]

Secretary General Ustundag on 'Coverup'

TA222017 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1600 GMT 22 Jun 80

[Text] RPP Secretary General Mustafa Ustundag has said that the Nevsehir incidents were a preplanned attempt to trap and massacre [RPP members]. Speaking at a news conference in Ankara, Ustundag said that those persons who ordered the RPP provincial leader killed also had the people and the RPP parliamentarians at the funeral procession shot at from surrounding buildings which were under construction.

Ustundag said: This incident was a bitter one for our democracy. Our people were deeply grieved because of this incident. The whole world was grieved. However, the head of the government, the interior minister and the Nevsehir governor are doing everything in their power to cover up the incident and to divert the people's attention away from apprehending the culprits of this treacherous, barbaric incident witnessed by thousands of persons and journalists. It seems as though they are encouraging murder gangs to repeat their attacks.

Ustundag described statements made by the interior minister and the Nevsehir governor on the incident as examples of unprecedented irresponsibility. He added that photographs of the incident proved that statements made by officials did not correspond to reality. Noting that the Nevsehir governor had usurped his office, Ustundag called for an investigation concerning the governor. He added: Our actual respondent on the issue will be the government and the prime minister. He concluded by saying that the Turkish people were aware of realities and that the day was close when it would ask for an account of the deeds performed by the government.

TURKES CRITICIZES ATTEMPTS TO TOPPLE GOVERNMENT

TA211758 Anakara Domestic Service in Turkish 1600 GMT 21 Jun 80

[Excerpts] Nationalist Action Party [NAP] leader Alpaslan Turkes has said that attempts to topple the government at a time when steps are being taken to resolve the economic crisis will again lead the country to an impasse. Addressing a meeting in Izmit today, Turkes said his party views the country as an entity within the borders of the Turkish Republic regardless of party or sect differences.

Turkes said there are movements aimed at destroying democracy by dividing Turkey from within and that these movements are originated by communists. Noting that the source of the existing anarchic situation in Turkey lies with the fact that RPP leader Ecevit is not well understood and that Ecevit and his colleagues are separate entities within the party, Turkes continued: Our citizens affiliated with the RPP are our brothers who want to keep alive the multiparty democracy which favors the unity of the Turkish nation. However, Ecevit and his colleagues are separate from the main body of the RPP. Pointing out that sensible and patriotic RPP members should save their party from invasion, Turkes said: If they cannot succeed in this, then they should abandon the invaders to their own fate and leave the party.

The NAP leader said the people were disappointed with the 7-month-old Demirel government. However, noting that the Demirel government was successful in many fields, that foreign loans are being extended and that Turkey's debts are to be postponed, Turkes said if Ecevit assumed power he would not be able to solve any of the country's problems. Turkes added that, therefore, his party will continue to support the government.

FACTORY WORKERS CLASH, OTHER INCIDENTS REPORTED IN KARAMAN

TA201716 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1600 GMT 20 Jun 80

[Text] One worker was killed and four workers were wounded, two of them seriously, during an armed clash which broke out among the workers in a yarn and textile factory in Konya's Karaman District. According to information received by a TRT correspondent from Karaman Public Prosecutor Mecmettin Biricen, factory workers Abdullah Demirci, Arif Avsar and Muammer Aslan received various wounds. Demirci died at the Karaman State Hospital. The other wounded workers were taken to the Konya Social Security Hospital.

Following reports on the incidents in the factory, a group of people partially destroyed certain shops in Karaman. A gendarme commando unit was brought from Konya when the workers prevented the security forces from entering the factory. The gendarme commando unit entered the factory and extensive security measures were also taken in the district.

ISRAEL'S YITZHAQ RABIN VISITS KREISKY

AU200925 Vienna DIE PRESSE in German 20 Jun 80 p 2

[Text] Vienna (GPE)--Yitzhaq Rabin, former Israeli prime minister and Labor Party official, arrived in Vienna on Thursday, 19 June, for a short visit to Chancellor Kreisky. The chancellery refused to comment on the contents of the talk. However, at his press conference last Wednesday, 11 June, Kreisky had referred to Rabin, among others, as "a political talent" in Israel. On the same occasion, Kreisky had spoken of Begin's regime as sinking, and expressed the hope for an early change in government. Kreisky has been trying for quite some time--also internationally--to work up sympathy for an Israeli Government led by the Labor Party.

It is hereby made clear that such reports are unfounded and that neither the question of East Timor nor of any mediation between Portugal and Indonesia were raised at the meeting between the prime ministers of Portugal and the Netherlands or at the meeting between the Portuguese prime minister and the Dutch foreign minister.

ENVOY TO BE ABSENT FROM MOSCOW DURING OLYMPICS

LD201337 London PRESS ASSOCIATION in English 1245 GMT 20 Jun 80

[By Tom McMullen, PA diplomatic correspondent]

[Text] Britain's ambassador to the Soviet Union, Sir Curtis Keeble, will not be in Moscow for the Olympic games, Foreign Office Minister Mr Douglas Hurd said today. Mr Hurd, who was answering a parliamentary question gave no official explanation, but Whitehall officials said Sr Curtis's absence would be in line with government policy which was against British participation in the games. He will be on leave during the games, but will remain in London afterwards for consultations, and then return to Moscow when they are all over.

Officials said that the embassy would provide normal consulate facilities in Moscow for British visitors encountering trouble with the Soviet authorities. But staff at the embassy have been advised not to attend any of the events in the Olympics. Officials said that the embassy would not be providing any social entertainment for British athletes taking part in the games.

VENICE SUMMIT ISSUES FINAL DECLARATION, MEETING ENDS

Statement on Energy, Inflation

NC231421 Paris AFP in English 1419 GMT 23 Jun 80

[Text] Venice, June 23 (AFP)--The "big seven" non-communist industrial powers today sharply condemned successive large oil price increases by members of the Organisation of Petroleum Exporting Countries (OPEC). The final "declaration" of the Venice summit said this had led to "even higher inflation and the imminent threat of severe recession" in the West, and had "undermined and in some cases virtually destroyed the prospects for growth in the developing countries." The statement said:

"We believe that these consequences are increasingly coming to be appreciated by some of the oil exporting countries. The fact is that the industrialised countries of the free world, the oil producing countries, and the developing countries without oil depend upon each other for the realisation of their potential for economic development and prosperity. Each can overcome the obstacles to that development, but only if all work together, and with the interests of all in mind".

The "seven" said: "The economic message from this Venice summit is clear. The key to success in resolving the major economic challenges which the world faces is to achieve and maintain a balance between energy supply and demand at reasonable levels and at tolerable prices.

"The stability of the world economy, on which the prosperity of every individual country relies, depends upon all of the countries concerned, recognising their mutual needs and accepting their mutual responsibilities".

The declaration said dominating issues at the summit were "the price and supply of energy and the implications for inflation and the level of economic activity in our own countries and for the world as a whole".

"Unless we can deal with the problems of energy, we cannot cope with other problems", the "seven" said.

Other key points of the declaration were:

Inflation: "The reduction of inflation is our immediate top priority and will benefit all nations. Inflation retards growth and harms all sectors of our societies. Determined fiscal and monetary restraint is required to break inflationary expectations. Continuing dialogue among the social partners is also needed for this purpose. We must retain effective international coordination to carry out this policy of restraint, and also to guard against the threat of growing unemployment and worldwide recession".

"We must break the existing link between economic growth and consumption of oil, and we mean to do so in this decade. This strategy requires conserving oil and substantially increasing production and use of alternative energy sources. To this end, maximum reliance should be placed on the price mechanism, and domestic prices for oil should take into account representative world prices. We must rely on fuels other than oil to meet the energy needs of future economic growth. We will seek a large increase in the use of coal and enhanced use of nuclear power in the medium-term, and a substantial increase in production of synthetic fuels, in solar energy and other sources of renewable energy over the longer term".

"We underline the vital contribution of nuclear power to a more secure energy supply. The role of nuclear energy has to be increased if world energy needs are to be met.

"We continue to believe that international cooperation in energy is essential. All countries have a vital interest in a stable equilibrium between energy supply and demand. We would welcome a constructive dialogue on energy and related issues between producers and consumers in order to improve the coherence of their policies".

"We are deeply concerned about the impact of the oil price increases on the developing countries that have to import oil. The increase in oil prices...will...put at risk the whole basis of their economic growth and social progress unless something can be done to help them. We approach in a positive spirit the prospect of global negotiations in the framework of the United Nations and the formulation of a new international development strategy. A major international effort to help these countries increase their energy production is required. We believe that this view is gaining ground among oil-exporting countries.

"We welcome the report of the Brandt commission. We shall carefully consider its recommendations.

"The democratic industrialized countries cannot alone carry the responsibility of aid and other different contributions to developing countries: It must be equitably shared by the oil exporting countries and the industrialized communist countries."

Monetary problems: "We look to the international capitol market to continue to play the primary role in rechanneling the substantial oil surplus funds on the basis of sound lending standards. Private lending will need to be supplemented by an expanded role for international institutions, especially the International Monetary Fund (IMF).

"We reaffirm our commitment to stability in the foreign exchange markets. We note that the European Monetary System (EMS) has contributed to this end."

"We are resolved further to strengthen the open world trading system. We will resist pressures for protectionist actions, which can only be self-defeating and aggravate inflation. We endorse the positive conclusion of the multilateral trade negotiations and commit ourselves to early and effective implementation. We urge the more advanced of our developing partners gradually to open their markets over the coming decade. We reaffirm our determination to avoid a harmful credit race."

GISCARD ON SOVIET TROOP WITHDRAWAL

LD231824 Paris Domestic Service in French 1700 GMT 23 Jun 80

[Excerpt] In Venice, where the summit of the seven richest Western countries has just ended, Mr Giscard d'Estaing duly noted the reports from Moscow on the Soviet troop withdrawal from Afghanistan, reports which were firsthand since the French president had direct contact with the Kremlin chief:

[Begin Giscard recording] During the talks I had in Warsaw with Leonid Brezhnev, among the points we dealt with was the proposal I made to him on the establishment of a timetable for the withdrawal of Soviet forces from Afghanistan. In fact, at the time of the Soviet authorities' first statements, they had indicated that their intention was not for these forces to remain there permanently, but the way for them to prove this was to establish a timetable involving the withdrawal of these forces in stages. We were thus forewarned on Friday evening that there would be a first withdrawal; this withdrawal applies to manpower of a certain size. [end recording]

Thatcher Assesses Results

LD232147 London BBC Television Network in English 2000 GMT 23 Jun 80

[Excerpts] The discussions on the Olympics and the Soviet Union's involvement in Afghanistan which dominated the first day of the Venice summit gave way today to the seven leaders' primary concern--the world economic order. They have set beating inflation as their top priority, and that can be done only by reducing their dependence on imported oil. A joint declaration from Britain, America and their five allies commits the industrialized nations to big cuts in consumption and there are positive moves to help them meet the targets. From Venice our economics correspondent Mark Rogerson reports:

That Mrs Thatcher was able to take time out for sightseeing perhaps shows that there was rather more agreements and rather less arguments at this summit than most. Her visit to the church of (Toccelo) charmed the locals as much as she was charmed by them.

As for the final session this afternoon, it was dominated by energy, as might have been expected, and all seven of the summit leaders expressed their concern at rising oil prices and their effect on the Third World. The Japanese summed it up: We are all in the same gondola.

Our political editor John Simpson took up with Mrs Thatcher the possibility of a summit meeting with the OPEC oil producers:

[Begin Thatcher recording] I think what we have to do is to bring home to some of the OPEC countries the seriousness of the action they are taking. After all, it is difficult enough for us, who are comparatively wealthy countries, to find enough to pay for the increased price of oil. It is even more difficult, you know, for the poverty-stricken countries to find enough to pay for oil. And it means that every single export they have has to go just for paying oil and sometimes they are still in debt. It is no good lending money to them. They cannot afford to pay the interest on it.

So I think we have to say to our OPEC friends: Look, it is putting the manufacturing countries in difficulty, but it is really meaning terrible privation for the developing countries and that is a fact that you must take into account. And, please, use some of the extra money you have got for putting back in grants and help to the developing countries. Some of them are already doing it, and what we are saying is please do more of it. [end recording]

On the political front the summit has had much greater significance. The friction between the United States on the one hand and the French and the Germans on the other has been greatly reduced, and certainly Mrs Thatcher believes that the Western alliance is in a much better state:

[Begin Thatcher recording] The Alliance is very, very together. I believe it has been much, much more together than public comment would admit. We've all of us recognized that we're the free democratic world and unless we stick together then things will be very difficult for all of us. And in everything we do we try to reach the greatest measure of agreement to support one another. So I am not in the least bit worried about that, indeed very heartened. [end recording]

Carrington Interview

LD240311 London BBC Television Network in English 1910 GMT 23 Jun 80

[Interview by correspondent Fred Emery with British Foreign Secretary Lord Carrington in Venice on 23 June--carried on the "Panorama" program]

[Text] [Emery] I asked Lord Carrington a question that's uppermost in the Carter administration's mind--that if it's a national liberation struggle against the Soviet Union in Afghanistan, shouldn't the West help arm what we now call the Afghan freedom fighters?

[Begin recording] [Carrington] (?That) will have to be considered in the future. But you will have noticed that the standing committee of the Islamic Conference issued a communique yesterday--(?not for us)--and also the resistance groups, the Afghans, issued a statement, both of which talk about the Afghan liberation movements. And there is no doubt about it that there is a Soviet Army of occupation, that there is a government in Afghanistan which is a Soviet puppet and which doesn't meet the wishes of the Afghan people. So we obviously have to think very carefully about what we do next.

[Question] Well, what should we do next?

[Answer] Well, I think we go on, first of all, on the basis of trying to get the neutral and nonaligned and independent Afghanistan--an idea incidentally which is catching on. It certainly caught on with the Islamic Conference; it's catching on with other countries in the Third World. I think in a situation like this in many ways the Third World is better placed to put pressure on the Soviet Union than we are. Our views, I suppose, in a sense are rather predictable. It is rather unusual for the Soviet Union to find themselves in the dock with the Third World opposed to them and this is what is happening. And I think that the pressure that can be brought upon the Soviet Union that way is something which is quite important. So let us see how (?it goes).

[Question] I would like to move you to what appeared to the outside--to the press outside watching this summit meeting--to be one of the missing subjects: What ever happened to Iran? I mean, that was a subject of some crisis in the Alliance only a few weeks ago and yet it appears barely to have been discussed here.

[Answer] Well, what we are doing at this summit is that--there was broadly speaking a sort of agenda in which Afghanistan obviously came up because it was relevant to a great many other things; it was relevant particularly to East-West relations and the cracks that you were talking about earlier on. And that was obviously something that had to be discussed. But apart from plenary sessions of the summit, when the leaders were there, we all have of course been talking to each other and there have been various groups of people having breakfast, lunch and dinner together. And, for example, foreign ministers have been having lunch and dinner together all these days and we have been talking about these sort of things informally at dinner. It doesn't appear in the communique but it's been discussed.

[Question] But do you now have guarantees, firm guarantees from the Americans that you will be consulted before the Americans do anything about, say, rescuing or even any sort of military (?operation)?

[Answer] Well, that was not what we were talking about, and then what we were talking about was the consultation procedures in the Alliance, (?something) not quite as easy as some people think. I would judge that there was a lot of consultations, that there were all sorts of different (?forums) in which everybody was consulted and nothing was ever followed up properly--but there were a lot of consultations. But I think that we've got to set that right--get the consultation procedures right. And I think that as a result of this summit and as a result of talks with the foreign ministers, there is a much clearer idea. At one point I remember Mr Muskie said last night: You know, the telephone is a useful instrument. And so it is.

[Question] (?Returning) to the beginning, I said: Had the summit done any more papering the cracks in the Alliance [words indistinct]? How would you characterize the state of alliance after the Venice summit?

[Answer] I don't think--well, you see you (?don't) talk about the Alliance in the same way (?I do) because you've got the Japanese here and we're not talking about the military alliance. But I think that there is a very much greater understanding as a result of this meeting of the problems of Europe and American problems. I mean, there has been a frank discussion about them. We are now going on--all foreign ministers are now going on tomorrow--to Ankara and there we really will talk about the Alliance. And Mr Muskie will be there, and we will all be there, and I think that this is a good prelude. And I hope that we shall have as good a meeting in NATO as we have had here.

[Question] But is the Western alliance--and not just NATO, the Western alliance--in much better shape after this or just a little better?

[Answer] I don't actually take the view that it is in as bad shape as you are making out. I think that there were some difficulties; I think that the difficulties are less as a result of this. [end recording]

Schmidt-Genscher Press Conference

DW231845 Hamburg DPA in German 1735 GMT 23 Jun 80

[Text] Venice--Following its conclusion, all countries participating in the economic summit of the seven most important Western industrial states, and also the EC Commission, stressed the foreign and economic political importance of the 2-day Venice summit.

Chancellor Helmut Schmidt, who together with French President Giscard d'Estaing was the "inventor" of these annual top-level meetings, described the summit as a "successful event." He said that this was no "soft soap." It is not normally the purpose of these summits to make operational decisions, but it was important to reach a (?truly) common assessment on decisive world economic questions. This applies particularly to questions relating to energy problems and the North-South conflict.

Schmidt said that the oil bill has risen 15-20 times since the first oil price explosion in 1973-74. This has particularly affected the developing countries. It is in the common interest [word indistinct] to induce these countries to lean toward the West. Therefore, at the conference he pointed to the need for a "clear development strategy." He mentioned the "serious moral deficit" of the East bloc countries which, in view of oil price developments, have so far not been sufficiently involved in aid to poorer countries.

At the same press conference as Chancellor Schmidt, Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher stressed that the Venice meeting was one of the seven's most important summit conferences with regard to foreign policy. The Afghanistan declaration in particular once again clarified in "concentrated form" the common standpoint of north Europe and North America, of the Federal Republic and the United States and also of the NATO Alliance. It was also made clear that there is not only a North-South problem with an East-West aspect, but also an East-South problem, as the Islamic Conference has already made clear.

The seven were united in their concern and made it unmistakably clear that "more and more states are tending to solve their internal political problems by driving out unpopular groups."

In reply to a question on the role played at this summit by Japan, which was represented by the foreign minister of a "government no longer in office," Chancellor Schmidt said in the ensuing discussion that he had been "impressed" with how the Japanese had continued the line of the late Japanese prime minister, Masayoshi Ohira, who had forged close contacts between Japan and Europe. The intention is to make these contacts even more "closely woven" in the future in order to do everything possible, from the European standpoint, to keep Tokyo "in the picture."

Schmidt on East-West Issues

LD232334 London BBC Television Network in English 1910 GMT 23 Jun 80

[Interview by correspondent Fred Emery with FRG Chancellor Helmut Schmidt in Venice on 23 June--carried on the "Panorama" program]

[Text] [Emery] Well, last night's communique on Afghanistan--a hasty reaction here to the surprise announcement of Russian troop withdrawals--was designed to put an end to speculation that any differences persisted among the Allies. It was an unusually strong statement and it called for the first time for total Russian withdrawal and also joint Western support for Afghan national resistance. On the basis of this statement there wouldn't seem to be much room for discussion with the Russians until they've withdrawn all their troops. But next week the West German leader Helmut Schmidt is going ahead with his visit to Moscow. Early this evening I talked to him.

[Begin recording] [Schmidt] I wish I knew--it is not so easy to predict, but certainly it is very necessary that Mr Brezhnev gets the same set of messages by the Western alliance as a whole--by the seven summiteers in Venice, by the French President Giscard d'Estaing meeting Brezhnev 3 weeks ago in Warsaw, and by myself.

[Question] Can there be detente though when the Afghanistan fighting is going on, when the Olympics boycott is continuing?

[Answer] I think one has to bear in mind that at the time of the Vietnamese war reaching its peak, nevertheless, Americans and Soviets were negotiating SALT II. This is not unusual. It may not be called usual either but there are certain historic precedents. On the other hand, if Afghanistan is not going to be brought to an end, it would certainly overshadow not only West-East relations, but even more so, relations of the Soviet Union and the Third World, the 42 Islamic states, the more than 100 states of the nonaligned group of the developing countries. And it is not just that they run the risk of getting into some difficulties with us Westerners; they are running the risk of getting into difficulty with 100 states in the world, as has been shown at the United Nations in that vote that was taken earlier this year.

[Question] Do you feel that you now have President Carter's support in your approach to Mr Brezhnev?

[Answer] I am ascertained [as heard] that I have his support, but not only since today or yesterday. I have no doubt about it.

[Question] Why then were you reported to be astonished by the letter he sent to you?

[Answer] The letter had nothing to do with the Soviet Union. It had something to do with the conflicting press reports which the President had seen. And I think I am entitled now, after a long talk with President Carter and Secretary Muskie, Secretary Genscher and myself, I am entitled to say that the quarrel about that letter is meaningless, does not have any importance, and that there has never been doubt about the substantial agreement between the two governments.

[Question] Is there any difference in your position on cruise missiles?

[Answer] No.

[Question] And the American one?

[Answer] No. My position has been clear and publicly defined even earlier--a couple of years earlier than the American Government did so.

[Question] Yes, but since the NATO decision you have made it seem that we should use the next 3 years to negotiate or try to negotiate.

[Answer] Yes, and this is the common position of NATO as a whole, and not only use the next 3 years but start with those negotiations as early as possible. So far it is the Soviet side that has said they are not willing to negotiate. I have the feeling that they are in the process of coming round to be willing to negotiate a mutual limitation of Eurostrategic weapons, perhaps in the framework of the oncoming SALT III negotiations. I have to find out when I am in Moscow how far this process has matured in the meantime.

[Question] What differences are there between your view of dealing with the Soviet Union and those of the United States?

[Answer] I do not think that there are basic differences; there are differentiations as regards interests. You know the United States of America is not a divided nation, there are not 16 million Americans living in a place where the Soviet Union is present with a great army and another 2 million Americans living even more eastward. But this is true of the German nation. We have since 10 or 11 years strived for correct and normal relations with the Soviets because it is to the favor of the Germans living on the other side. It is also the favor of the Poles and the Hungarians and others. Of course, if the world lapses into more and more tension it will certainly make itself felt also in Europe. But right now, after the Russians have notified everybody that they withdraw something less than 10 percent of their troops out of Afghanistan, I don't think that one should be without any hope. If they stick to that decision, if it is being made permanent, if other steps into the same direction follow leading to a total withdrawal from Afghanistan, then there would be no obstacle at all in carrying on cooperation between West and East as has been the case after the Helsinki conference. [end recording]

Further Schmidt Remarks

[Excerpt] Venice--Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt said he was sure that success would be achieved in decoupling economic growth from energy consumption.

"There is a good chance of actually achieving the objective set for 1990," he said. The oil problem typified the present world economic situation. The chancellor also stressed that cooperation with the developing countries had been discussed in greater detail than at any previous economic summit. This topic would also be on the agenda of the next summit. Schmidt also spoke in favor of a North-South summit, with a limited number of participants, in which he offered to participate himself.

Touching on his planned visit to Moscow, the chancellor said he had not requested any mandate for it at the summit. The Federal Government would be speaking for itself in Moscow, but the agreement of all the participants had been achieved. "We have received the confirmation of our colleagues," the chancellor said.

Lambsdorff 'Satisfied' With Results

LD231533 Hamburg DPA in German 1415 GMT 23 Jun 80

[Excerpts] Venice--The saving of oil to gain energy, the combatting of inflation, the maintenance of free world trade and the strengthening of Third World countries are the most important aims which the participants in the summit meeting in Venice of the seven most important Western industrial nations have set themselves for the 1980's.

FRG Economics Minister Lambsdorff appeared satisfied with the outcome of the summit. The Federal Republic's ideas had been taken into account. In addition, the minister viewed as a success the fact that the "seven" had for the first time dealt with energy policy in depth.

Italian Participants Comment

AU240906 Rome ANSA in English 0800 GMT 24 Jun 80

[Text] Venice, June 24 (ANSA)--Italian Premier Francesco Cossiga told newsmen last evening that the seven nation summit talks conducted here Sunday and Monday were "dominated" by a sense of mutual confidence and an awareness of the responsibilities of the seven industrialized nations. Cossiga met the press flanked by Foreign Minister Emilio Colombo, Treasury Minister Filippo Maria Pandolfi and Industry Minister Antonio Bisaglia. In another reference to the general atmosphere prevailing during the talks, the premier reported that substantial unity emerged in discussions on the economic problems of the 1980's.

"It was aware of a general attitude of firmness," Cossiga added and explained, "but this attitude is not intended as an act of difiance. We did not renounce the goal of peace which we wish to pursue through detente."

In reply to some specific questions, the Italian head of government spoke of the trip to Moscow scheduled for West German Chancellor Helmut Schmidt and his talks with Kremlin leaders. "He will not say anything that couldn't be said by any of the other participants of the Venice summit," according to Cossiga. The West German stance on the modernization of the Atlantic Alliance missile system in Europe, a topic certain to be taken up in Schmidt's Moscow talks, has not changed in reference to the commitments undertaken earlier by the Bonn government, the premier said.

Fielding another question, Cossiga announced that the Italian Government will arrive at a number of decisions in the economic area in the near future and will take into consideration the guidelines agreed to in Venice.

The premier also told newsmen that the heads of state and government in Venice did not discuss the situation in the Middle East.

Bisaglia, who took part in the summit talks along with his colleagues in the Cabinet, said that as regards the switchover from petroleum to alternate energy sources like nuclear power, Italy is trawling the other industrialized nations. After referring to the desire of Italy's leaders to close this gap, the industry minister expressed the view that it will soon be possible to gather a huge consensus in Parliament on this problem.

Addressing himself to a question on the transfer of resources from the public to the private sector, the treasury minister said that the language in this area of the Venice final document is aimed at "reducing the share of capital utilized by the public sector... that is, a reduction in current expenditures". In practice, Pandolfi explained, the governments of the seven industrialized nations will shift some of the financial resources previously earmarked for public agencies into financing private initiatives to beat back the danger of a full-scale recession.

The foreign minister, in reply to a question on the NATO council scheduled for Wednesday in Ankara, said that as regards certain sectors the assembly can be considered a continuation of the Venice summit in NATO quarters and named as the overall objectives of the Atlantic Alliance the strengthening of the Western democracies, the defense of the Alliance, a study of the commitments made and the revival of detente.

Summit Ends; Leaders Depart

LD232016 Rome Domestic Service in Italian 1900 GMT 23 Jun 80

[Excerpts] The Western summit in Venice has ended.

Summing up the economic and political aspects of the summit, Prime Minister Cossiga said that the meeting had been dominated by a sense of reciprocal trust, and an attitude of united firmness had emerged in tackling the economic challenge of the 1980's.

The participants at the summit have already begun to leave Venice, with the exception of President Carter who tomorrow will be going to Belgrade for talks with the Yugoslav leaders, and Canadian Prime Minister Trudeau who, also tomorrow, will be going to Rome to meet with Cossiga.

PARIS TALKS ON TURKISH DEBTS TO OECD ADJOURNED TO 8 JUL

TA201233 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1200 GMT 20 Jun 80

[Text] It has been announced that the Paris talks on the postponement of Turkey's debts to the OECD countries were suspended until 8 July due to technical reasons. The head of the Turkish delegation at the talks, Turgot Ozer, who is the prime ministry under secretary and the state planning organization deputy under secretary, told TRT that the 3-day talks had been successful. He pointed out that the meeting was postponed until 8 July because the representatives of the OECD countries needed time to consult their respective governments in connection with the Turkish proposals.

LEADERS ARRIVE IN ANKARA FOR MINISTERIAL COUNCIL MEETING

Luns Notes Significance of Location

TA222022 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1600 GMT 22 Jun 80

[Text] NATO Secretary General Joseph Luns has arrived in Ankara to attend the NATO ministerial council meeting that will begin on Wednesday. At Esenboga Airport he was received by Foreign Ministry Joint Security Affairs General Director Nusret Kandemir. In a statement at the airport, Luns said holding the NATO spring meeting in Ankara was significant from the viewpoint of the Iranian and Afghan issues. He added that the Afghan problem was on the ministerial council agenda. He noted that international problems, East-West relations and the NATO scientific cooperation program will also be discussed during the ministerial council meetings. He concluded by saying that Turkey's economic situation and measures taken to solve current difficulties will also be reviewed.

Luns on Aid to Turkey

TA231100 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1000 GMT 23 Jun 80

[Text] NATO Secretary General Joseph Luns has said that the military, economic and financial aid extended to Turkey by Western countries should be further increased. Luns, who is currently in Ankara for the NATO ministerial council spring meetings, which will begin on Wednesday, was replying to questions by a TRT correspondent.

Luns said that NATO is playing an encouraging role in securing aid to certain members of the Alliance. Pointing out that the wealthier countries within NATO also have economic problems, Luns noted that, despite this, it is important to increase the amount of aid which is currently being extended. Noting that the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan is highly detrimental to East-West relations and to global political detente, Luns said: NATO is ready to do everything possible in a bid to rescue what remains of detente. However, the Soviet Union should renounce its aggressive policies. Luns noted that Iran, Afghanistan and the Middle East are not included within NATO's sphere of responsibility and that the Alliance does not intend to broaden its sphere of influence in order to secure stability in those regions.

The NATO secretary general said that he welcomed Foreign Minister Hayrettin Erkmen's statement that Turkey is not obstructing Greece's return to NATO's military flank. Luns noted that the settlement of the problems between Turkey and Greece and the latter's return to the military wing in order to fulfill its defense duty in NATO's southeastern flank would serve Turkey's interests as well. Luns added that the unofficial meetings on the subject of Greece's return to NATO's military wing, which were started some time ago but were stalled due to the presidential elections in Greece, will probably be resumed within the next few days.

Luns' Meeting With Erkmen

TA232103 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 2000 GMT 23 Jun 80

[Text] NATO Secretary General Joseph Luns who is in Ankara for the NATO ministerial council spring meetings called on Foreign Minister Hayrettin Erkmen at 1800 today. In a statement before the meeting, Luns said he thought that the preparations in Ankara for the spring meetings were sufficient. He also said that he was pleased the meetings are to be held in Turkey, a country that has always proved its loyalty to the organization.

In a statement to the press after the meetings, which lasted 90 minutes, Foreign Minister Erkmen said the secretary general had briefed him on the reports he would submit to the conference. Erkmen said that Luns would submit two reports, one on the lack of political consultations within the organization and another on the international political situation. The foreign minister pointed out that he and Luns had agreed on the reports. Erkmen then said that Turkey must be strong economically and politically if it is to fulfill its undertakings within the NATO framework.

Erkmen noted that they also discussed Greece's return to NATO's military wing. Replying to another question, Erkmen said Greece's return to NATO's military wing was an issue between the organization and itself. However, he added, Greece wants to return with a special and new agreement. We expressed our views on the issue. Recalling that during its December meeting in Brussels the NATO ministerial council had decided to extend military aid to Turkey, Greece and Portugal, Erkmen said that this aid must be extended to increase Turkey's military power and protect its economic balance. Asked to comment on Greek Foreign Minister Mitsotakis' remarks that Greece wanted to eliminate the word "war" from Greece-Turkey relations, Erkman replied: We did not use the word "war". He who used it should eliminate it.

Muskie Arrival Statement

TA241025 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1000 GMT 24 Jun 80

[Text] U.S. Secretary of State Muskie arrived in Ankara at 1130 today. In a statement at Esenboga Airport, Muskie said that West-East relations and Soviet occupation of Afghanistan will be discussed at the NATO meetings which are to begin in Ankara tomorrow. A reporter asked Muskie his view on the withdrawal of Soviet troops from Afghanistan. Muskie said that there is currently no sufficient reason to be optimistic regarding the Afghan issue and added: We are waiting for a full Soviet withdrawal from Afghanistan.

Many bilateral contacts will be held during the NATO ministerial council meetings. Some of these contacts have already been decided upon. Foreign Minister Hayrettin Erkmen will meet separately with the French, Greek and U.S. foreign ministers. Muskie is expected to be received by Prime Minister Suleyman Demirel today. He will also confer with Greek Minister of Foreign Affairs Konstandinos Mitsotakis. The U.S., French, British and FRG foreign ministers are to hold a joint meeting this evening.

KREISKY ON MIDDLE EAST TALKS, CSCE MADRID FOLLOWUP

LD231409 Brussels LE SOIR in French 19 Jun 80 p 3

[Pol Mathil report: "'Time Is Against Detente,' Says Kreisky"]

[Text] "Contrary to what a Lebanese newspaper is claiming, I did not call Mr Begin an 'extremist chauvinist.' Despite this, nobody can deny that Mr Begin has not made too much of an effort to find a solution to the Palestinian question and that Mr as-Sadat has not yet found in Israel the partner that he deserved...."

Mr Bruno Kreisky was in Brussels last Tuesday [17 June] at the invitation of the "Enterprise of the Future" association to speak on the theme "no unemployment, no strikes, no inflation..." (in Austria, of course).

However, these problems occupied only the smallest part of the press conference given by the Austrian chancellor before his appearance in front on the economists, the journalists being more interested in the lack of a miracle in his diplomatic initiatives than in the Austrian economic miracle. Speaking on his stance in favor of the PLO and Mr 'Arafat, Mr Kreisky refused to present himself as "mediator," but stressed that, being the head of a neutral government and vice president of the Socialist International, people often ask him for his advice. The fact that Mr Begin is definitely not among the "askers" does not botner Mr Kreisky excessively: The "Nine's" Venice statement contains, he said, some "necessary truths revealed, unfortunately, 6 months too late." But, the chancellor said, "better late than never...."

Too late, since time, in Mr Kreisky's view, is against detente. Certainly, Europe at the moment has not yet transformed itself into a camp of confrontation, but Afghanistan is not a local problem and, in the long term, detente cannot remain "divisible." The Soviet intervention in Afghanistan was badly calculated. Moscow has been surprised by the resistance on the spot, by the resistance of the Islamic world and by its own international isolation, particularly at the United Nations. Henceforth, any initiative toward a political solution must be encouraged. "I support the idea of Mr Schmidt's journey to Moscow. Moreover, if I were of another opinion, I would not tell you anyway...."

This note of caution and sincerity can only have given more weight to the chancellor's concern at prospects for the Conference on "Security and Cooperation" in Europe to be held this fall in Madrid. The chancellor is against the idea of a postponement, an idea which was circulating unofficially in Brussels some time ago. However, he does not know what to do to stop it from degenerating into a clash of polemics and a sterile settling of scores. An experienced tactician, Mr Kreisky is now proposing to divide this conference into several sessions at least one of which is to be held...after the American elections.

"We are a long way from the Soviet-American embraces in Vienna," the chancellor sighs nostalgically. "The spirit of Helsinki will not be enough for Madrid," he concluded, before proceeding to talk about a country with no unemployment, with no inflation and which, in 1979, experienced...66 seconds of strikes. In short, about Austria where, unlike on the international scene, miracles are still possible....

PAHR WELCOMES USSR TROOP WITHDRAWAL FROM AFGHANISTAN

AU231035 [Editorial Report] Vienna DIE PRESSE on 23 June 1980 carries on page 2 a 500-word roundup--attributed to REUTER, AFP and to the AUSTRIAN PRESS AGENCY--of international reaction to the USSR's announcement of a partial troop withdrawal from Afghanistan, which contains the following passage: "In the first comment Foreign Minister Pahr spoke of a 'step undoubtedly taken in the right direction,' but he stressed that the withdrawal of some troop units is not an adequate basis for solving the problem."

NUCLEAR POWER COOPERATION AGREEMENT WITH USSR SIGNED

AU200955 Vienna WIENER ZEITUNG in German 20 Jun 80 p 7

[Summary] A cooperation agreement with the "Austriatom" nuclear engineering consortium, in which the Vew, Waagner-Biro, Andritz and SGP companies are represented, was signed at the Vienna Trade Ministry on 12 June by Viktor Krotov, USSR minister of power machine building. The Voest-Alpine Corporation is also a party to the agreement. "The agreement provides for technical-scientific cooperation in the building of nuclear power plant components, as well as for cooperation in conventional power plant construction and in the heavy diesel engine sector. Cooperation is also envisaged in third markets. In a short speech in the presence of Trade Minister Staribacher and the directors general of the "Austriatom" member firms the Soviet minister declared that the cooperation agreement was the basis for a concrete intensive cooperation. In the fall, an Austrian delegation of company representatives is to discuss concrete projects with Soviet specialists."

PORTUGAL'S FREITAS DO AMARAL PAYS OFFICIAL VISIT

[Unattributed report: "Portugal's Vice Premier in Vienna"]

[Summary] Yesterday, 20 June, President Rudolf Kirchschlaeger received Diogo Pinto Freitas do Amaral, minister of foreign affairs and deputy prime minister of the Republic of Portugal, who is paying an official visit to Austria. Afterwards, Freitas do Amaral had a talk with Chancellor Bruno Kreisky and met People's Party Chairman Alois Mock, chairman of the European-Democratic Union of which the Portuguese guest is deputy chairman. At noon, Freitas do Amaral attended an official luncheon given for him by Foreign Minister Pahr. Afterwards a Portuguese-Austrian air traffic agreement was signed, which will enable the two national airlines to expand their air routes in the future. Later in the afternoon, working talks lasting several hours were held at the Foreign Ministry. In the evening, the visitor gave a dinner at the Portuguese Embassy. Today, Saturday, Freitas do Amaral will proceed from Vienna to Alpbach, Tirol, where he will attend the Japanese-European dialogue.

Urges More NATO Solidarity

[Special DIE PRESSE report on interview with Portuguese Foreign Minister Diogo Pinto Freitas do Amaral in Alpbach "last weekend"]

[Excerpts] Vienna--"I see the need for more cooperation and solidarity within NATO--but not only regarding the sectors that directly concern the Atlantic Alliance but also regarding issues that are outside the NATO realm. They include primarily questions of the policy vis-a-vis the Gulf countries." This was stated by Portuguese Foreign Minister Diogo Pinto Freitas do Amaral last weekend in a talk with DIE PRESSE. Freitas, who is also chief of the [Social] Democratic Center (CDS) and deputy prime minister, is at present in Alpbach, where he delivered the opening lecture at the symposium on European relations with Japan.

STRAUSS: VENICE HAS YIELDED NO 'SUBSTANTIVE DECISIONS'

LD232017 Hamburg DPA in German 1921 GMT 23 Jun 80

[Excerpt] Munich--According to Franz Josef Strauss, CDU/CSU candidate for chancellorship, the Venice summit has yielded no decisions of substance. In a statement published in Munich this evening, the Bavarian premier and CSU chairman said that Venice has proved that such meetings "have to be held because they were held once before." Nothing was said that has not been already said many times.

Strauss said that Chancellor Schmidt has again signed statements which mean the opposite of what he does in political reality. He is pursuing neither the expansion of the coal-nuclear energy combination nor the fight against inflation.

Strauss said that the report of the withdrawal of Soviet troops from Afghanistan is a deliberate maneuver aimed at preventing a joint statement by the participants in the summit against the Soviet policy of conquest. It reinforces the certainty that the Soviet Union has no intention of giving up Afghanistan.

The letter from U.S. President Jimmy Carter to Schmidt and the chancellor's "rude reaction" to it, and the chilly meeting the two of them had in Venice are proof that the "once so cordial" German-American relationship has become smashed to smithereens.

PRESS CONTINUES COMMENT ON VENICE SUMMIT

24 Jun Press Review

DW240821 Cologne Deutschlandfunk Network in German to East and West Germany 0505 GMT 24 Jun 80

[Press review]

[Excerpt] The editorial of MANNHEIMER MORGEN reads in part: A closer look at the partial goals of Venice will show how far apart desire and reality are. It is quite appropriate to step up the enhancement of nuclear energy. Only, what is this to be like if, for example in the Federal Republic, practically no new nuclear power plant could be ordered anymore for years? Another target: Coal extraction is to be doubled by 1990. This is an ambitious target; but how do they propose to attain it? We have known for quite some time that the mining capacities cannot be expanded easily from one day to the next, not even in 10 years, if alone because the most urgently needed skilled personnel is lacking. They decided on the intensified use of alternative energy sources, but which did they have in mind? New technologies that might tangibly relieve the oil account are not in sight. Big energy words have been uttered in Venice again, but ultimately they were just as hollow and noncommittal as at the preceding world economic summits. Thus far, MANNHEIMER MORGEN.

NEUE RUHR-ZEITUNG notes: Rarely has a world economic summit been concluded with so few promises as has the Venice meeting of the seven. What is missing is the theatrical thunder of Bonn in 1978 when the Federal Republic promised to feed vigorous steam to the locomotive pulling the growth train. What is missing is the oil austerity protestations of Tokyo in 1979. Venice was the summit of clarity which has made this clear: Serious economic problems depress the most important industrial nations not only now--they will remain a determining factor for a long time to come. The West will not be able to digest the oil price shock of the early eighties as quickly as it coped with the effects of the oil crisis of 1973/74.

RHEINISCHE POST analyzes the summit as follows: At first glance the summit meeting of the seven greatest Western industrial nations seems to have ended successfully yesterday in Venice. Since an embarrassing conflict was apparently eliminated in connection with this conference, the seven could concentrate on what will really be facing them in the eighties.

A number of world, economic and energy policy problems must be solved. It seems that a foreign political answer to the challenges of the eighties was found more easily once Schmidt and Carter came to terms again. The West has not been mislead by the offer to partially withdraw the Soviet Armed Forces from Afghanistan. The West insists that the Soviets must fully withdraw from this country.

'New Beginning' Seen

DW240856 Bonn DIE WELT in German 24 Jun 80 p 8

[Peter Gillies article: "The Venetian Gondola"]

[Text] If politicians claim that all of us are sitting in one boat, then they believe that they are playing captain while the others must keep rowing hard. Japanese Foreign Minister Saburo Okita was free of such cynicism when he subtly said in Venice: "All of us are sitting in the same gondola."

The "coxswainless boat of seven" not only demands strength from the powers but primarily unity. Their flow of movement in the weeks and months before the Venice world economic summit was alarmingly asynchronous. They quarreled and fought, and wrote angry letters instead of talking. The conference in the lagoon city did not eliminate all troubles, yet it has created the chance for a new beginning in stormy weather.

What was particularly impressive was some political clarifications, whereas the economic clarifications remained rather pale. The Soviet attempt to drive the West apart with an undefined promise of withdrawal from Afghanistan not only failed but had the opposite effect.

Moscow has welded the seven together, including Japan which is not even a member of NATO. The Soviet Union has made the mistake of overrating the discord in the Western camp. The bait from Moscow as answered clearly--surprisingly clearly even to some participants: Only complete withdrawal from Afghanistan is acceptable.

What was important for us and also for the Alliance was the tentative elimination of what we might nobly call German-American irritation. Carter and Schmidt talked intensively and insistently; what was then disseminated as the result of these talks was that the discord has been cleared up "once and for all." One would even be satisfied with slightly less than "once and for all." In Venice it was obvious that they wanted to make a clean sweep of things, that they intended to clearly follow the original basic line of Alliance policy without getting lost in a swamp of sidetracks.

Despite the credible formulas, experience shows that a pile of discords will accumulate easily and will be very hard to then eliminate, have the discords really been caused only by information gaps between Bonn and Washington? What remained here is a certain grey area, far from the American view it is indeed hard to understand that the Federal Republic has a special--and not just economic--interest in preventing a worsened climatic situation from influencing the European climatic zone. There is no such thing as "islands of detente." But Venice also showed this: Cohesion cannot be created by declarations but by experience and persistent talks.

The German chancellor obviously succeeded in dispelling the distrust that had arisen in connection with his Moscow trip. "The trip is out of the danger zone," commented a German diplomat. Well, we will see. The U.S. delegation basically has not yet really comprehended what the chancellor meant and intended by his interpretations of the decision on the closure of the arms gap. Here, too, residues are left which need to be clear away. Politicians use the improper auxiliary argument that all these bilateral warnings are due to the conflict-oriented international press. But journalists know how to live with the slogan "stop the presses." [as published]

World economy is world politics. A no less important topic than energy policy makes this more than plain. The seven heads of state and government talked, communicated, not via newspapers or interviews but directly with each other, at one table. In a world which is compressed by the computer into hamlet size, this obviously is constantly more important. Though it was pronounced in Venice only reluctantly, the topic was on the table: The most important Western industrial nations of the world are afraid of a worldwide recession.

Are they prepared for that? It is doubtful. Inflation trots on (without galloping) and unemployment remains tenacious and high (without turning into a crisis of democracy). Yet the arsenal for weathering another recession primarily consists of a strategy which is objectively consolidated and politically practicable. It was thanks to the chancellor, to whom 5 percent inflation once appeared to be less dangerous than 5 percent unemployment, that the following finding was pronounced as a maxim at the London summit: Inflation is not an instrument for combating unemployment but, on the contrary, one of its causes or, in other words, anyone tolerating "just a bit of inflation" in the hope of thereby creating jobs, in the end loses both--the stability of monetary value and full employment.

This time, too, some of the "great seven" were not free from temptation. Canada's Premier Trudeau, but also host Cossiga, cautiously said that it might perhaps be necessary in the fall to throw the switch, meaning to combat unemployment (while neglecting price stability). Mrs Thatcher, in contrast, frankly admitted that she has learned, albeit "late," that inflation is not an instrument for combating unemployment.

Several things were put on the table with refreshing frankness; for example, the OPEC cartel provokes the rich countries while leading the poor countries to and into the abyss. Unless something happens the Fourth World can never pay its debts. The seven states are granting 90 percent of all development aid, yet they constantly feel under indictment, President Giscard d'Estaing justly said. And the communist world supplies wholesome declarations and arms, stones instead of bread.

The "council of seven" in Venice a success? Did they just take a boat ride through lagoons of problems without mooring anywhere and settling anything? This way of looking at it is wrong, for anyone having expected little just cannot be disappointed. It is not the communique formulated long ago nor the speeches in the forest of flags that make a summit tour valuable, it is the realistic view of the valleys, the realization of what the participants must move and what they can move. The former is as alarmingly vast as the latter is alarmingly small.

ANALYST WARNS OF SOVIET INTENTIONS REGARDING SCHMIDT TRIP

DW230707 Munich Bayerischer Rundfunk Network in German 1630 GMT 21 Jun 80

[Excerpts from Karl Gustav Stroehm talk]

[Text] The German Chancellor will bear a considerable responsibility when he enters the Kremlin in the near future. He must be aware that the impression may well arise, albeit unintentionally, that he is playing down the serious and dangerous developments which are taking shape as a result of the Soviet intervention in Afghanistan.

The Soviet leaders, without exception very old yet having immense political experience and a good sense of the interrelations of power, are well aware of the political climate in Western Europe and in the Federal Republic. The East has minutely noted that leftist groups at the party congress of the SPD and the FDP exuded feelings of displeasure for the official foreign and social policies of the social-liberal Federal Government, policies which are oriented toward NATO. The incidents during the oath-taking ceremony of Bundeswehr recruits in Bremen surely were meticulously analyzed by the Kremlin. Consequently, the Soviets know that Schmidt and Foreign Minister Genscher in a way are going to the Soviet capital with the mortgage of their rather pacifist leftwings. What is more, neither the SPD chancellor nor the FDP chairman and federal foreign minister can afford a spectacular failure in Moscow because the Bundestag elections are just ahead.

It is a good question, anyway, whether it would not have been better in the interest of the cause involved to postpone the Moscow trip until after the elections instead of evoking even the mere suspicion that they are undertaking the trip for the sake of the domestic effect on the voters here, where the fateful practice of regarding foreign policy as a continuation of domestic policy, as an overture to the election campaign rather than as an art in its own right, is being continued.

Nobody can blame the German head of government for trying to make a good foreign policy showing just prior to a Bundestag election. The question remains whether Schmidt, in view of the objective situation prevailing between East and West just now, can bring back from Moscow anything else but a number of nice air balloons, long-term cooperation agreements between the FRG and Soviet economies, general declarations, perhaps a few Soviet sham concessions such as Brezhnev's offer of a tank pullout from the GDR--which, in the meantime, military experts say has turned out to be mere show.

Hence, does the Moscow venture not run the risk of turning into a sham action in which the results do not measure up to the expenditure? A German chancellor cannot save world peace, nor can he restore detente, as long as the Americans and Soviets have not drawn closer to each other again or come to terms. It would be highly dangerous,however, if the Bonn visitors in Moscow would even by a shade draw closer to the Soviet concept of the divisibility of detente.

Is it not already a strange sign that we and the Americans must constantly aver to each other how agreed we are? Has Western unity not slackened in many fields, imperceptibly at first but clearly tangibly? Does harmony still exist between Bonn and Washington--not to mention the other West European capitals--in the analysis of the ojectives and intentions of Soviet policy and in the replies which must be given in the long run? The objectives which Moscow pursues have not changed.

But the aim of the Soviet Union is and remains to seperate Western Europe from America and to gradually extend Moscow's hegemonial position in Eastern Europe to Western Europe also. In this connection a key role is played--from Moscow's point of view--by the Federal Republic as the strongest economic and probably political power in Western Europe.

If the Soviets succeeded in making Bonn give in just a bit, to seed just a trace of mistrust between the United States and the Federal Republic, it would be a first step toward a goal the Soviets have been aiming for as an ideal for a long time: Neutralization of the area between the Elbe and the Rhine and Western Europe's psychological softening vis-a-vis Soviet power policy.

The Soviets are wise enough to know that such a thing cannot be achieved with a frontal attack. And did they not achieve considerable success with their much more careful policy in the past years? The invasion in Afghanistan is still in full swing, so to speak, but it is actually not a reality any more for the West Europeans. Our leftists pretend already that all this has not really happened at all, and that it suffices to use magical peace policy formulas to achieve or obtain real peace.

One can speculate in many ways on what makes the Soviets further pursue their dynamic policy, whether it is their ideology, a continuation of the tradition of tsarist policy, the Russian national character, or what. But one cannot deny that the dynamic Soviet foreign policy has put the West on the defensive and that it has at least in part disarmed the West psychologically. But since the appetite grows while one is eating, and since the Kremlin's power policy knows no statics but only dynamics, one must expect the Soviets to continue in this direction as long as no other power will oppose it and reestablish the balance.

It will be difficult for the Union parties and the candidate for chancellor to argue against this general mood, and after the chancellor's return from Moscow it will probably become even more difficult than than it was before. But since this is the case, one must ask oneself the question: Did the Bonn coalition in all the past years outline an Ospolitik image,also with regard to German relations with the Soviet Union, that actually corresponds to realities? Did one not outline for domestic political reasons, and in order not to please the opposition, a European security picture vis-a-vis the superior Soviet power, a picture that is much too rosy? Has our awareness been reduced to considering the state as a social political distribution authority, and power policy as an irksome matter from which one ought to seperate as quickly as possible to pursue more important matters, narely to take a share from the social pie?

Maybe there will be a different Moscow some day, a Moscow with which one can get along as the Prussian kings did in the 19th century with the tsars in Petersburg. But nothing indicates that at present. Therefore, a German Government chief, regardless of what party he belongs to, must take along something of Konrad Adenauer's skeptical spirit in his luggage to Moscow..

COMMUNIQUE ISSUED ON SAUDI KING KHALID'S VISIT

LD201915 Riyadh SPA in Arabic 1553 GMT 19 Jun 80

["Text" of the Saudi-FRG joint communique on the visit to the FRG of His Majesty King Khalid ibn 'Abd al-'Aziz, king of Saudi Arabia, from 16 to 19 June 1980]

[Text] At the invitation of Dr Karl Carstens, president of the FRG, His Majesty King Khalid ibn 'Abd al-'Aziz, king of the Kingdom of Saudi Arabia, paid an official visit to the FRG from 16 to 19 June 1980. He was accompanied by a delegation of senior officials including:

1--His Royal Highness Prince Sultan ibn 'Abd al-'Aziz, minister of defense and aviation and inspector general.

2--His Royal Highness Prince Sa'ud al-Faysal, foreign minister.

3--His Excellency Dr Rashad Fir'awn, the private adviser to his majesty.

4--His Excellency Shaykh Muhammad Aba al-Khayl, minister of finance and national economy.

5--His Excellency Dr Ghazi al-Qusaybi, minister of industry and electricity.

6--His Excellency Shaykh Muhammad an-Nuwaysir, head of the Cabinet Office.

7--His Excellency Amhad 'Abd al-Wahhab, head of royal protocol.

8--His Excellency Shaykh 'Abdallah 'Ali Rida, Foreign Ministry undersecretary for economic affairs.

9--His Excellency Shaykh Muhammad Nuri Ibrahim his majesty's ambassador to the FRG.

10--His Excellency Shaykh Ma'mun Khayri al-Qabbani, head of the Western department at the Foreign Ministry.

11--His Excellency Shaykh 'Abdallah al-Wuwayz, adviser at the Finance Ministry.

The visit has expressed the growth of friendly relations and cooperation between the two countries. The two sides have given this visit a special importance not only as the first visit by a Saudi king to the FRG, but also in view of its important results in strengthening and cementing the ties of friendship and cooperation between their two countries and governments, following as it does the visit to the Saudi Arabian Kingdom by Chancellor Helmut Schmidt on 29-30 May 1976 and the visit to the FRG of His Royal Highness Prince Fahd ibn 'Abd al-'Aziz, crown prince and deputy prime minister, on 21-23 June 1978, both of which contributed to opening new horizons for cooperation between the two countries in various fields.

Intensive talks were held between His Majesty King Khalid ibn 'Abd al-'Aziz and the accompanying delegation, and FRG President Dr Karl Carstens and Chancellor Genscher [as received]. These talks took place in an atmosphere of cordiality, friendship and understanding, and embraced bilateral relations and international issues of interest to the two countries.

During this visit meetings were also held between His Royal Highness Prince Sultan ibn 'Abd al-'Aziz, minister of defense and aviation, and FRG Minister of Defense Hans Apel; between His Royal Highness Prince Sa'ud al-Faysal, the foreign minister, and FRG Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher; between His Excellency Shaykh Muhammad Aba al-Khayl, minister of finance and national economy, and FRG Finance Minister Hans Matthoefer, and between His Excellency Dr Ghazi al-Qusaybi, minister of industry and electricity, and FRG Minister of Economy Dr Otto Graf Lambsdorff.

The twin issues of the Middle East and Palestine were discussed at length and, in explaining the attitude of the European Community as declared in the statements of the European Council held in Venice, the German side affirmed the pressing need to reach a comprehensive, just and lasting peace.

The Saudi side hopes that the attitude of the European Community will crystallize much more clearly with regard to the essence of the issue and that the efforts of the European Community will lead to finding a just solution to the issues of the Middle East and the Palestinian people on the basis of the well-known Saudi stand and in accordance with the resolutions of the two Arab summit conferences held in Baghdad and Tunis.

The two sides expressed their concern with the prevailing situation in Afghanistan, denounced the Soviet occupation of this nonaligned Islamic country--a matter which threatens the safety and security of neighboring states and represents a grave danger to the international situation--and called on the Government of the Soviet Union, which has special obligations and responsibilities for safeguarding international peace and security, to withdraw its forces immediately and unconditionally from Afghanistan, leaving the Afghan people to determine their own future.

The two sides underlined the importance of the Arab-European dialogue to the strengthening of the ties of friendship and cooperation between the European Community and the Arab world in the interest of both and of security and stability in their regions.

The two sides reviewed questions of international economic development and stressed the importance of accelerating economic growth in the developing states, a matter regarded by both sides to be the responsibility of the entire international community. They agreed to support existing international efforts aimed at increasing the flow of aid for development and at speeding up endeavors to transfer technology to the developing states in order to eliminate major disparities in the rate of development and achieve political stability.

The two sides expressed their satisfaction at the steady development of their bilateral relations in their respective fields of interest and their hope for the continued development of these relations. They also reviewed the work of the joint economic commission and expressed their satisfaction at achievements in the various economic and technical sectors between the two countries and their optimism as to the development of this cooperation in the interest of both. They agreed to expand the scope of the commission's work.

During his stay in Bonn, King Khalid ibn 'Abd al-'Aziz was received by its mayor and municipal council, and the king and his delegation also visited West Berlin. The king expressed his gratitude to the FRG president for the hospitality accorded to him and his delegation by the friendly government and people of the FRG. The king invited the FRG president to pay an official visit to the Saudi Arabian Kingdom. The invitation was gratefully accepted and a date will be fixed through diplomatic channels.

QOTBZADEH LEAVES, COMMENTS ON HOSTAGES

Unconditional Release 'Impossible'

LD231522 Paris Domestic Service in French 1500 GMT 23 Jun 80

[Text] Iranian Minister of Foreign Affairs Sadeq Qotbzadeh stopped off in Paris to pay a brief visit yesterday and this morning. He came from Geneva. He announced that the fate of the American hostages held there in Iran since last November could be decided by the parliament in 4 or 5 weeks' time. But Sadeq Qotbzadeh recalled that an unconditional release was impossible and that the release would have to be matched by political concessions on the part of the United States.

[Text] Paris, June 23 (AFP)--Iranian Foreign Minister Sadeq Qotbzadeh left here today for Iran after a brief visit to the French capital aimed, he said, primarily at meeting European businessmen and industrialists.

The minister told newsmen that Iran's parliament would probably deal with the question of the American Embassy hostages in four or five weeks, and that he was convinced the militants holding them would abide by the parliament's decision. "They have already agreed to do so," he added.

TERRORISTS KILL ROME ASSISTANT DISTRICT ATTORNEY IN SHOOTING ATTACK

AU231541 Rome ANSA in English 1528 GMT 23 Jun 80

[Text] Rome, June 23 (ANSA)--Assistant District Attorney Mario Amato was killed in Rome this morning as he stood waiting for a bus to go to work. He was shot down by two youths aboard a high powered motorcycle. Several eye witnesses took down the license number of the vehicle which proved not to have been stolen. However, the number is very similar to that of a motorcycle robbed by armed gunmen some days ago. Amato was involved in investigation into extreme rightwing terrorism. In recent years, he was given the files of all probes into the chief fascist subversive groups, from the popular Revolutionary Movement to the Revolutionary Armed Nuclei, which have launched attacks against the foreign ministry, the magistrate's high council, Regina Coeli prison and city hall. Later in the day both an extreme rightwing and an extreme leftwing urban guerrilla movement claimed responsibility for the murder. The Armed Revolutionary Nuclei (NAR) group called a Rome daily while the leftwing Red Brigades called Genoa, Rome and Verona papers saying they organized the attack.

COMMUNIST PARTY OFFICIAL DIES AFTER SHOOTING IN SOUTH

AU230950 Rome ANSA in English 0840 GMT 23 Jun 80

[Text] Paola, near Cosenza, June 22 (ANSA)--A Communist Party official in this small Calabrian town in the deep south of Italy was shot and gravely wounded at the weekend, dying of his wounds in hospital later. The official was identified as Giovanni Losardo and, according to investigations, he may have been shot for political reasons. Losardo is chief secretary in the state prosecutor's office in this seaside resort and is also in charge of education in the City Council of Cetraro a few kilometers away. According to the investigators, Losardo was shot by a young man Saturday night. The assailant used a pistol and was on a motorbike with an accomplice. In recent weeks, another Communist Party official was slain and some Communist activists wounded in Calabria in apparent Mafia-style attacks designed to discourage the formation of workers' cooperatives in the zone. But investigators made it clear that no clear link could be drawn between the slaying of Losardo and the previous attacks.

INTERIOR MINISTER REPORTEDLY LINKS CSSR WITH EXTREMISTS

AU211959 Rome ANSA in English 1945 GMT 21 Jun 80

[Text] Rome, June 21 (ANSA)--Italian Interior Minister Virginio Rognoni alleged the existence of links between Italian subversive gourps and Czechoslovakia during his testimony before the parliamentary commission investigating the kidnapping and slaying of Christian Democrat Party Chairman Aldo Moro two years ago, according to the news weekly PANORAMA. Quoting one version of Rognoni's still secret remarks, the weekly claimed the minister disclosed that the Czechoslovak auto manufacturer Skoda paid seventy million lire (about 82,000 dollars) to the extreme leftists of Workers' Autonomy. The presumed leaders of Workers' Autonomy have been in jail without trial since April last year after a Paduan judge charged them with being the brains behind the Red Brigades, Moro's slayers. The charges against figures such as political science professor Toni Negri and physicist Franco Piperno includes that of armed insurrection against the state. According to the PANORAMA story, Rognoni dropped his sibylline accusation in the midst of apparently unconnected remarks on the Moro affair. Only last month, Radical Party Deputy Leonardo Sciascia claimed that Italian Communist Party Secretary Enrico Berlinguer had told him of Czechoslovakia's ties with Italian extremists. Berlinguer's immediate reaction was to issue a stern denial of the deputy's claims and start proceedings to sue him.

OREJA ON SOVIET AFGHAN WITHDRAWAL, NATO MEMBERSHIP

LD211940 Madrid Domestic Service in Spanish 1800 GMT 21 Jun 80

[Spanish Diplomatic Information Office statement of 21 June]

[Text] On the withdrawal of Soviet troops from Afghanistan, Foreign Minister Oreja has said that it would mean an important and decisive step, since it would constitute one of the essential factors to return to Afghanistan its independence and its condition as a nonaligned country.

The Spanish Government's position with regard to this grave crisis is that its solution demands respect for the principles of noninterference and the independence and freedom of the Afghan people. To reach a solution, the exercise by the Afghan people of their free will and an international guarantee from both the (?various) powers and the countries in the area that this freedom will be respected are necessary in addition to the withdrawal of the Soviet troops. Finally Marcelino Oreja said that he trusts that the news on the Soviet withdrawal will be confirmed and that it will mean the return of independence and freedom for the Afghan people.

Intention To Join NATO Reiterated

LD230719 Madrid EL PAIS in Spanish 17 Jun 80 p 15

[Pablo Sebastian report: "Negotiations With United States Behind NATO Issue"]

[Text] The government wished to clarify now its stance in favor of joining NATO before 1983 because it is determined to complete this process soon and because it wishes, in view of the coming holding of the Madrid CSCE conference and the approaching opening of negotiations on the agreements with the United States, to make clear that Spanish foreign policy is not encumbered by this conference and that the new Spanish-U.S. agreements will be negotiated with the Atlantic perspective. These statements were made yesterday by Foreign Minister Marcelino Oreja during a luncheon with Spanish journalists at which he commented on his statements to EL PAIS last Sunday.

Minister Oreja stated that the government has decided to set this policy under way, now that the Spanish democratic process is developing rapidly. He emphasized that both the Union of the Democratic Center [UCD] and the government have maintained from the outset the desire to take Spain into the Atlantic Alliance and that agreement on the opportuneness of this is currently complete. When a journalist reminded him that many UCD leaders and Prime Minister Suarez himself have publicly adopted ambiguous stances on the timetable for this option, the minister said that Prime Minister Suarez "now" has a very firm and clear stance on this matter in favor of joining the Alliance.

The minister, who emphasized that the government will raise the Atlantic issue in 1981, later said that the application to join NATO, the military agreements with the United States and the future of the Gibraltar base will be coordinated in the national defense plan which is currently being drafted by the government. He added that the publication of a White Paper on this topic is not discounted, and emphasized that the financial cost of membership will not be very high--about $8 million or $9 million per year, for instance, if we only subscribe to the Washington treaty, the minister said.

With respect to the criticisms leveled by the principal parties of the parliamentary left--the Spanish Socialist Workers Party and the PCE--Minister Oreja said that both parties are full of contradictions on this matter, and recalled that both Enrique Mugica and Santiago Carrillo had expressed to him on several occasions their stance in favor of renewing the military agreements with the United States. The minister added: What are the basic differences between coordinating our defense with the West through the United States and doing so through NATO, in which the U.S. Government has considerable influence?

Gonzalez Opposition to NATO

LD222014 Madrid in Spanish to Europe 1830 GMT 22 Jun 80

[Text] The meeting of the Federal Committee of the Spanish Socialist Workers Party [PSOE], chaired by the leader of the opposition, Felipe Gonzalez, has ended in Madrid. At this meeting the Socialist policy on emigration was discussed and it was decided that the party should broaden its activities in this respect. A resolution from the PSOE Canary Islands group demanding that the government take appropriate steps for the release of the fishermen of the Galgomar fishing boat was also passed. Finally, with regard to the incidents which occurred in the south of France this past week and those concerning Morocco in fishing matters, the Socialist Federal Committee passed a proposal warning that these events are not isolated, but the consequence of the hesitant policies of the government through a lack of initiative and response to the interests of the fishermen, farmers and transporters.

It must be pointed out that, in the course of the meeting of the Federal Committee of the PSOE, the secretary general of the party, Felipe Gonzalez, made a statement in his report warning of his intention to systematically oppose the policies of the centrist government of Adolfo Suarez and stressed the PSOE's opposition to Spain's entry into the Atlantic Alliance, a subject of greater importance at the moment than any other in foreign policy.

OREJA VIEWS INTERNATIONAL ISSUES IN EL PAIS INTERVIEW

LD201333 Madrid EL PAIS in Spanish 15 Jun 80 pp 18-19

[Pablo Sebastian interview with Foreign Minister Marcelino Oreja: "We Could Join NATO Soon"; date, place not given]

[Text] Question: France has imposed a considerable delay on the process of Spain's entry into the EEC, which was one of our foreign policy's foremost objectives. Is this not largely a result of the hasty manner in which this application was submitted in 1977 and of the confusion that a Spanish foreign policy which has so far been oscillating between Atlanticism and nonalignment seems to entail?

Answer: Our foreign policy's aims are based on the search for security and well-being for the Spanish people, and are aimed at strengthening peace in the world. Between 1977 and the present we have traveled a lengthy path of diplomatic normalization, and we are now in a period of enhancement and development of our foreign policy postures and of our stances on the most important international problems. We have a well-defined, coherent and coordinated foreign policy--a European, democratic and Western foreign policy.

Following the 1977 elections we were anxious, just as we are anxious now, to clarify Spain's position in the world, which has an essential goal--to place Spain in all the dimensions of a West Europe which must be united. Spain's application to join the EEC in 1977--which, in my opinion, was not hasty because I discussed it with the foreign ministers of the Nine before submitting it--was in keeping with this course. Moreover it must be added here that there were also other considerations of timing at that time, since a second enlargement of the Community was under way with the EEC country even urged us not to miss that opportunity, because internal difficulties within the Community itself were already beginning to emerge, and we were in danger of being disappointed. The agricultural problems caused by France were beginning to emerge strongly at that time, and there was even talk of a two-tier Europe, split into groups.

This resolute stance toward Europe refutes the accusations which have arisen about our foreign policy, which has sometimes been described as ambiguous and vacillating. The EEC was the only political blueprint which existed in Europe and, despite the difficulties which the process entailed, the government's desire was unequivocally to take part in it.

Question: We were apparently moving rather arbitrarily toward Europe, without assessing politically and economically what that meant for Spain or for the Community itself. In what Europe do we wish to take part, and when, now that the timetable sought by Spain seems to be falling through?

Answer: The government has always pointed out quite clearly the characteristics, the advantages and the difficulties of our progress toward final integration into Europe. Suarez told Callaghan in London in September 1977 without hesitation or vacillation that Spain wished to join a political Europe and not a free trade area, which was the model advocated by the British prime minister. During that European tour by the prime minister the topic of the timetable--the target of 1983--arose because, in view of the slowness of the Community machinery and the complexity of the problems, it was becoming urgent to set a working pace. We emphasized the need for keeping to dates which, even though not exactly the same as ours, should approximate them.

Question: And what is the government's stance now with respect to the halt imposed by France?

Answer: I believe that a "halt" to the "halt" occurred in Venice. However, the desire on the part of some European country to suspend this process could lead up to grave situations, with the danger of changing Spain's position in the world. At the same time it would cause enormous disenchantment among many Spanish people who in the past viewed Spain's entry into the EEC as the best encouragement to the democratic process. I do not believe that this delay will really occur, since this would imply that the Community politicans were conducting an irresponsible policy. It is possible that some country may attempt this, but the others should oppose it to prevent it. I believe that this is a good time for we Spanish people to know clearly who our friends really are. Moreover, as was seen in Venice Friday, the topic of Spain was not discussed by the Council of Ministers, and therefore the membership timetable still stands.

It is also worth recalling here the pro-Third World and centralist temptation on the part of many Spanish people, which could revive as a reaction to a rejection by the EEC. At several decisive moments in its history Spain has opted to be fully European. And one of those moments is now. Other countries on the old continent have no option but to be so. We, on the other hand, wish to be so consciously and responsibly. There is thus a danger that young people and many other Spanish people will decide under these circumstances to turn their backs on the European blueprint again, if Europe wishes to turn its back on us. We are certain that this will not happen and that Spain will be finally incorporated into the European institutions.

Question: Are France's reasons the European model, the economic problems and the . sidential elections?

Answer: I believe so. Europe is experiencing a crucial moment in its history, when it must choose between large-scale European political unity and De Gaulle's "Europe of the fatherlands." I believe that France still prefers the latter. France also seems concerned about the EEC'S agricultural and budgetary problems, as well as about the effects of Spain's entry. But this approach is incorrect. What must be done is to draw up the list of problems and negotiate on it, taking into account the transitional period which is envisaged as a buffer. Next there is the matter of the presidential elections, whose influence on the process seems legitimate provided that this does not have a grave significance such as Spain's removal from the EEC and the West European process of integration itself.

Question: Why this lack of solidarity on the part of France toward our young and independent democracy? Is there jealousy? Why does the issue of the Basque Fatherland and Liberty [ETA] persist?

Answer: Despite certain local problems, such as fisheries, Spain and France should cooperate and reach agreement more on certain matters of common interest, such as many situations in the Mediterranean and the Near East. Well, this coordination is insufficient, perhaps because of the interpretation which France makes of its independence--which we understand and share, just as we practice our own--but it currently requires a greater degree of cooperation because our plans are ultimately quite in agreement.

The matter of Basque terrorism is one of the issues which I have very frequently had to discuss with the French authorities. And it is quite unacceptable that the French should not adopt stances of the utmost vigor on this problem, which requires international solutions, in order to combat the ETA terrorist organization's crimes. It is inconceivable that there could be vacillation in clarifying who are common law and not political criminals--common law criminals in the carrying out and preparation of many of these terrorist murders. It is clear that the preparation and the planning of these crimes take place in France. Certain crimes, such as the payment of the revolutionary tax--as Juan Alcorta's revealing letter has demonstrated--are also committed on French territory. France is aware of this situation and has always promised us cooperation. And it is true that there is police cooperation and that political refugee permits for terrorists have been stopped, but much remains to be done and this cooperation must be intensified, because this is a crucial matter.

Question: Another dimension of Spanish foreign policy is the Union of the Democratic Center [UDC] government's plan to join the process of Spain's entry into the EEC is suspended or delayed?

Answer: In principle, these are two different matters. However, I believe that Western solidarity underlies any participation by Spain in its defense system. Therefore a European stance lacking solidarity toward Spain would not make possible our country's participation in the Western defense organization. [paragraph continues]

How could one speak of coordination in defense if there is none in everything else? It would be absurd to believe that Spain could take part in organized defense with a Europe which is not in solidarity with it in matters vital to it.

However, this clarification having been made, I wish to make the government's stance on the Atlantic option very clear. The government is wholly in favor of Spain's rapid entry into the Atlantic Alliance. For this we must have two assurances and a procedure: the assurance that Spain's process of joining the EEC will continue and that the Spanish-British negotiations are under way and that the transferal of sovereignty over Gibraltar to Spain is in the process of being resolved. The procedure, apart from the natural invitation to join which should come from the Alliance, entails the analysis and negotiations which Spain should conduct with the organization to select the areas of military responsibility in which Spain would wish to take part. This is an aspect on which the government has still to decide. We must see which are the model and degree of military integration which suit Spain within the Alliance, in which there are various models of participation. For stance, it remains to be debated whether or not Spain is prepared to take part in the work of the NATO Defense Planning Committee.

Question: But when and how does the government intend to get this initiative under way? Before the general election, next year, coinciding with the negotiations on the agreements with the United States? With what popular support?

Answer: I believe that this initiative was not undertaken previously because Spain was engrossed in a complex and difficult process of internal democratization, to which it was not advisable to add this major foreign policy problem. Now we are in a different situation. The Constitution has now been approved and we are concluding its implementation; for this reason I believe that we could join the Atlantic Alliance soon--certainly before the 1983 elections. I believe that 1981 could be a good time for raising the issue, because the Spanish-U.S. negotiations on the bilateral treaty and its sections concerning defense in particular, must be concluded that year. The two issues--NATO and the treaty--should complement each other and not overlap. For this reason I believe that the agreements with the United States could have looseleaf pages which could be replaced in accordance with the level of Atlantic responsibilities which Spain decides to undertake. Our experts and the government will study carefully both issues, negotiations on which could be started simultaneously. Specifically, the negotiations with the United States will begin next fall and will be conducted by our ambassador in Washington, who will be assisted by an entire team of experts on the matter.

As far as popular support is concerned, I wish to say that it is possible that there is a certain lack of understanding among the public, and that it is largely our fault that this is so. This has given rise to the not always favorable results of certain opinion polls and to opinions which I do not deem correct, such as those subscribing to the idea that joining the Alliance will be very expensive for Spain or that the balance between the blocs--which, moreover, have existed since before 1955--will be upset by it. In my opinion, these two premises are false. What would be expensive is an isolated national defense, which, moreover, would be incomplete.

With respect to the majority required for taking this step, the government believes that a referendum is not necessary. The Constitution allows this, but does not require it. A majority in parliament will be sufficient.

Question: Won't this stance meet with tough resistance from the opposition?

Answer: The Socialists have evolved considerably with respect to this issue of defense. From an initial neutralism and even a pro-Third World stance and nonalignment, they have proceeded to speak of European defense and, at the same time, have accepted a defense linked with the agreements with the United States. From the viewpoint of political consistency, the neutralist stance seems to me clearer, although I do not share it. I believe that European defense is today an unattainable utopia which failed as far back as 1954. Moreover, it is incomprehensible that they should oppose NATO and say "yes" to agreements with the United States which, in isolation and as they stand, belong to the past.

Question: Could not this stance affect the Madrid CSCE conference, whose dates are already threatened by East-West tension and relations with the United States and the USSR, which have apparently been frozen recently? [as published]

Answer: Well, it is possible that some countries may be contemplating influencing matters peculiar to Spain on the occasion of the convening of the CSCE conference in Madrid. This is unacceptable. I do not believe that this conference will be affected either by this issue or by the international crisis. Rather, on the contrary, I believe that the dates initially envisaged--which were approved by everybody's agreement, can only be changed in the same way and constitute a perhaps unique opportunity for facilitating detente--should be adhered to.

We hope that the Soviet Union will attend this conference after making an effort aimed at resolving the Afghanistan crisis. This crisis is the cause of a certain cooling of relations between Madrid and Moscow, which were developing extensively in the last months prior to the Afghanistan issue with an exchange of important visits, which I do not believe will be repeated at other levels under the present circumstances.

Moving closer to the Alliance will cause no problem with the United States. It will complement an existing relationship. This topic and the renewal of the agreements will be discussed, among other important matters, on the occasion of President Carter's visit to Madrid, which is in keeping with the normal consultations which stimulate our relations. With respect to the agreements, it must be pointed out that this time they will have the Atlantic perspective and the new feature that, instead of the grants or financial compensation, Spain will seek specific technological and economic cooperation in compensation for the facilities which it offers the United States. Issues of the current international situation, such as the Iran and Near East crises which are of interest to Spain, will also be broached during this visit.

Question: The Near East and Iran are topics of the utmost topicality. What is Spain's stance on both of them?

Answer: On the Iranian issue, Spain maintains a clear and firm stance. We have requested the release of the U.S. hostages, and in Lisbon we joined in the political steps taken to this end by the EEC countries. The matter rested there, because the British stance prevented the Nine from jointly adopting economic measures. Then the U.S. military action also occurred. We are in favor of the immediate release of the hostages and opposed to any military solution to this crisis, which we believe should be resolved by peaceful means despite the difficulties which this entails.

On the Near East issue, Spain has taken initiatives in favor of the PLO and of amending UN Resolution 242. This latter initiative, which is aimed at the PLO's being recognized as the Palestinian people's sole representative and at including in the resolution that people's right to self-determination in their own territory, has been received with interest in many countries, and it is virtually the stance which the Community countries adopted in Venice. [paragraph continues]

We believe that it is essential to perfect Resolution 242 in order to achieve a comprehensive solution to the Near East problem, which remains blocked despite the Camp David agreements, which have displayed in the course of time their slight prospects of success.

At all events, I believe that both on the issue of Iran and on that of the Near East, Spain, which has an obligation to have a stance on these international issues, has never attempted to undertake a special leading role or the role of mediator. In Iran we took very active steps while our ambassador was the dean of the diplomatic corps. On the Arab-Israeli crisis, we have not confined ourselves to explaining our viewpoint to our friends and allies. We clearly told the United States that we disagree with its policy in the area and that it is ambiguous and vacillating. We have also insisted on the main guidelines of a comprehensive solution, in whose conclusions the United States and the Soviet Union should, of course, take part.

Question: Could Spain recognize Israel if UN Resolution 242 is amended in the way you have described?

Answer: Certainly, because this would represent the beginning of a comprehensive solution to the conflict, accepted by the UN Security Council, which would have to approve the matter without the Russians' or the Americans' veto. In the meantime, it must be pointed out that Spain is not opposed to Israel's existence or its right to have secure borders. Moreover, as is known, this is what the Union of the Democratic Center stated in its 1979 election program.

Question: Minister, speaking of Russians and Americans, do you not find it strange that only KGB agents and not CIA agents are being arrested in Spain? How do you interpret the official silence on the published report that the slanders leveled against the editor of EL PAIS came from the CIA?

Answer: Well, this matter which you mention seems to me absolutely incredible. The government has no evidence that it happened in this way, because it would otherwise have acted vigorously in light of a confirmation of an act of interference in a Spanish internal matter. With respect to the KGB incidents which have occurred, I can say that they were sufficiently proven cases.

Question: According to what you have said, one of the conditions for joining NATO is the starting of the negotiations on Gibraltar. Has not this process seemed frozen or stalled since the Lisbon declaration?

Answer: The topic of Gibraltar is the one which arouses the most passion among the Spanish public when foreign policy is discussed, and it has always been the only stumbling block in the historically good relations between Spain and Britain. I would like this issue to be dedramatized and for there to be no haste, after 270 years of waiting.

In Lisbon, thanks to Lord Carrington's pragmatism which had already been displayed with respect to Rhodesia, we succeeded in unblocking the issue by means of a declaration in which Britain pledged itself for the first time to negotiate on all aspects of the Gibraltar issue without exclusion and Spain pledged itself to suspend the implementation of article 10 of the Treaty of Utrecht--that is, the measures concerning communications applied to the Rock. It was agreed to finalize the preparations before 1 June and this has not proved possible so far because Spain wants these pledges to be carried out simultaneously. What we have done so far is to hold technical talks on the procedure for opening communications, the setting up of customs houses, the physical elimination of the British fence and so forth. We are discussing matters which although minor do not exclude technical, political and legal difficulties. The process is under way and is continuing.

We expect soon the opening of communications and of the negotiations which will include the issues of sovereignty and of Gibraltar's autonomy within the framework of the Constitution, and the economic and cultural development of the area--where a bilingual university could be set up--and the military base, which will find its bilateral settlement within the NATO framework. It is envisaged that Lord Carrington and I will meet again over the next few weeks.

Question: Morocco has frequently sought to link the process of decolonizing Ceuta and Melilla with that of Gibraltar. What prospects are there of this occurring? And for the Canary Islands, with respect to the OAU?

Answer: Our stance on Ceuta and Melilla is very firm. The international status of Gibraltar and that of Ceuta and Melilla are very different for reasons of origin, title and international law. For Britain, Gibraltar has been a nonindependent territory since 1963. Ceuta and Melilla are an integral part of Spain. For this reason, they are very different and not comparable situations. The topic of the Canary Islands could arise again in the OAU at any time--just as it could have arisen on other occasions. and indeed has arisen--because it is sufficient for a country to argue that the islands, because they are close to the African Continent, should undergo a decolonization process for this to make possible the debate. This, with all the irresponsibility which it implies, could happen, and we must be prepared for this. The topic arose for the first time in Algiers in 1968, and since then has become a kind of silly season [recurring, inconsequential] story. We have always reacted to these initiatives and have conducted an extensive information policy in the African Continent with respect to this topic which, in the government's opinion, should not interfere with our policy of friendship and cooperation with Africa. The diplomatic efforts have so far been successful.

Question: Spain's relations with North Africa are not succeeding in finding their point of balance. Fisheries are now the POLISARIO's lever. Could Spain withdraw from the Saharan fishing waters and the Bu-Craa phosphates, completing Spain's withdrawal from the Sahara, which was enshrined in the 1975 Madrid agreements?

Answer: This is a difficult matter for Spain because it does not have many alternatives. The best solution would be for the United Nations to assume responsibility for it. This would have been the ideal solution during the crisis of November 1975, but it was rejected by Spain at the time. At all events, Spain has sought a policy of neutrality and balance in the area over the last few years, although we also do not intend to keep out of a matter which concerns us. We want Morocco and Algeria to reach agreement and we intend to maintain dialogue with all the parties concerned, including the POLISARIO. What we will never do is to accept pressures such as those which we have undergone with the seizure of our fishermen. This could only lead to the severing of this dialogue.

Question: Turning to another continent, three brief questions: Spain attended the nonaligned countries' Havana summit. Will it do so again? Do we have a date for Fidel Castro's visit to Spain? Will Suarez attend the Latin American summit in Quito?

Answer: Spain attended the nonaligned countries' summit because it was held in a Latin American country. There would have to be very powerful reasons for Spain's participation in a country in another area to be justified. At all events, this would be decided at the time. As far as Fidel Castro is concerned, All I can say is that we have no dates for the visit. However, I can announce that Prime Minister Suarez will travel to Quito this summer to attend the Andean Pact summit.

Question: Last, what are the prospects for foreign policy, with a view to 1983--the date of the new elections?

Answer: We intend to continue maintaining a coherent, realistic, dynamic and independent policy--a European, democratic and Western policy of upholding human rights and in favor of detente and peace; a policy based on the constant work of our diplomatic experts, who guarantee the suitability and the technical viability of the decisions we make. Our aims must be formulated and achieved within the horizon of 1983. It is not possible to review, judge or condemn a 4-year policy every month.

We must carry out those actions which will enable us to be unencumbered and close to friendly countries, with reactions to matters which concern us directly and issues of an international nature. We will maintain our European and Western dimension in all its spheres, including that of defense, with our membership in the Atlantic Alliance, as well as our process of joining the EEC. We also hope to develop the Latin American and Arab dimensions of our presence in the world, cooperating in the search for solutions to the conflicts which have arisen. Last, we intend to bring this state policy regularly before parliament, and hope to this end that the congress Foreign Affairs Committee will improve its functioning appreciably, which at present appears inadequate.

BASQUE GOVERNMENT CONDEMNS ETA'S THREATS TO TOURIST AREAS

LD231924 Madrid Domestic Service in Spanish 1700 GMT 23 Jun 80

[Text] EFE has learned from reliable sources that Interior Minister Juan Jose Roson has been meeting constantly with members of the government and senior state security officials following the recent threats by ETA [Basque Fatherland and Liberty] against Spanish tourist areas. Roson met yesterday morning with Luis Gamir, minister of trade and tourism, and with Ignacio Aguirre, secretary of state for tourism. Yesterday, the interior minister also spent the whole of the evening and into the early hours of this morning in a meeting with top state security officials. The Basque Government condemns the threats issued by ETA. Here is our correspondent in Bilbao: In a note issued this afternoon from the prime minister's office, the Basque Government says that the Basque Country should express its categorical rejection of the activities and methods of the ETA politic-military armed organization, and should in particular show its solidarity with those areas which might be specially affected. The Basque Government note goes on to affirm that, apart from those aspects which are implicitly to be condemned--by which it means the use of violence in pursuit of ends described as political--this latest action by ETA is specially reprehensible in view of the serious economic situation we are living through and the particularly damaging effect the action announced by ETA would have on certain areas if carried out.

ADDITIONAL COMMENTS BY KIPRIANOU UPON DEPARTURE FOR GREECE

NC231127 Nicosia Domestic Service in Greek 1030 GMT 23 Jun 80

[Excerpts] In a statement before his departure from Cyprus, President Kiprianou stressed that he attaches particular importance to the talks he will have with Greek President Karamanlis, Prime Minister Rallis and his government.

The president of the republic also said that two of the basic prerequisites for the successful outcome of our struggle are: first, harmonious relations and cooperation between the governments of Greece and Cyprus. These in fact exist, he stressed, but our aim is to strengthen and safeguard them even more. The second prerequisite is unity among the Cypriot people.

Concerning the second prerequisite, he added, it is not a secret that various rifts are evident. President Kiprianou stressed that, as far as he is concerned, he will continue to exert every effort to ensure all the prerequisites for a united front of the Cypriot people in their struggle for survival. He added that everyone must conciously realize that everyone's primary goal and responsibility is the survival and salvation of Cyprus and the Cypriot people's vindication through a nationally acceptable solution. The president of the republic added: When I say a nationally acceptable solution, I absolutely rule out the legalization of the faits accomplis or any form of partitionist solution. We have accepted a biregional federation and we are ready to negotiate the internal structure of the Cypriot state on the basis of biregional federation. We are ready for talks without dangerous advance commitments that would prejudge the outcome of the talks and the developments in general. We are ready for talks on the basis of the 19 May 1979 agreement, which includes the Makarios-Denktas agreement, the UN resolutions, human rights, fundamental freedoms of the citizens, the Famagusta issue, the question of ruling out partition and other developments, the question of demilitarization and many other positive elements so that there will be the framework and basis for general and substantive negotiations.

President Kiprianou reiterated that, if substantive negotiations have not been conducted thus far, it is solely due to the intransigence of Turkey, which wants to prejudge the outcome of the talks and impose conditions on us in advance which may seem innocent to some, but which actually constitute a matter of substance.

EDEK LEADER LISSARIDHIS REJECTS ELECTION COALITION

[Text] Dr Vasos Lissaridhis, the leader of the socialist EDEK party, yesterday said he did not favour a "coalition ticket" for the general elections and indicated that he would prefer each party to contest elections by its own voting strength.

He was giving a press conference at which he outlined the deliberations of the party leadership after the latest developments in the light of the failure of the attempt for resumption of talks and the general situation at home.

Dr Lissaridhis said he favoured meaningful talks as stipulated in the UN resolutions and "not a travesty of talks which are being exploited only to consolidate the facts accomplished by the invasion and occupation."

He said that the stand of the AKEL and the Democratic Rally parties in blaming the Greek Cypriot side as eqaully responsible for the non-resumption of the talks is one of the worst "disservices" to the national cause.

"The policy of constant concessions could only lead to catastrophe", Dr Lissaridhis said.

He insisted that U.S. presidential envoy Mr Clifford had misled Makarios into making "painful concessions" on the promise that Turks would be pleased to respond else they would be publicly denounced but this was never done.

AKEL party has insisted that President Makarios had not been misled and that the proposals he had made in 1977 were the result of thoughtful consideration but Dr Lissaridhis said that Makarios did tell several people, including AKEL officials about his feelings for the Clifford attitude.

The fact that Makarios did not say this in public was that he did not wish to give more excuses to the Americans.

Instead, Archbishop Makarios proceeded to give his own interpretation of the guidelines, insisted on the return of refugees and refused to write-off any land, Dr Lissaridhis said.

The EDEK leader disagreed with the notion that "bizonality" should be accepted and its definition left later and said that since the Turks have given the term the meaning they want, its acceptance of occupation and leaving its definition later. [as published]

Dr Lissaridhis said that there was no question of his party supporting or withdrawing support from the president.

"We only express praise when an action is in line with our line of policy and we express our disagreement when we disagree with certain action", he said.

On the question of a possible meeting between President Kiprianou and Turkish Cypriot leader Mr Denktas, Dr Lissaridhis said that there must be preparatory work before such meeting could take place.

Dr Lissaridhis said he would issue the text of a message to the Turkish Cypriots explaining the party's views on the rapprochement.

He also said that he would give more details about his party's policies and plans will be given at the rally which the party is calling for July 15, which is the coup anniversary.

EDEK APPEALS FOR 'JOINT FRONT AGAINST IMPERIALISM' WITH TURKS

NC211127 Nicosia Domestic Service in Greek 1030 GMT 21 Jun 80

[Text] In a message to the Turkish Cypriots, the EDEK Central Committee urges them to join a front against imperialism and occupation so that all foreign troops and bases can be removed from Cyprus and so that we can build a Cyprus where all citizens will enjoy equal rights and opportunities and live in harmony. The message stresses that the troops on Cyprus are being kept there by Turkey's ruling class and are essentially the proxy of the powers that seek separate communities, partition and the final enslavement of Cyprus to their goals and their guardianship.

The message also hails the struggle being waged by the Turkish Cypriot working masses against these plans as well as the rejection of Denktas' reference to bizonality by the Turkish Cypriot opposition parties and their refusal to endorse his proposals.

DENKTAS DISCUSSES TIES WITH ARAB NATIONS IN MILLIYET ARTICLE

NC230908 Istanbul MILLIYET in Turkish 20 Jun 80 p 3

[By Emin Colasan]

[Text] President Denktas has stated that Greek Cypriot leader Kiprianou is making efforts to neutralize Islamic states with regard to the Cyprus issue, proposing to them that they mediate. Denktas added that these states would never allow themselves to be deceived.

Denktas, who came to Tripoli at the invitation of the Libyan Government and had contacts with high-ranking Libyan officials, granted a special interview to MILLIYET, in which he said he would try to have a meeting with PLO leader Yasir 'Arafat in the near future and discuss with him the PLO's opposition to the Turkish cause. Denktas said:

"In order to neutralize Islamic countries in the Cyprus dispute and secure the withdrawal of their support from the Turkish Cypriot cause, Kiprianou has asked countries very close to us to mediate. He has also made the same suggestion to the Libyan Government. I have come to Tripoli in order to discuss this matter with the Libyan authorities. Meanwhile, we have taken up bilateral matters concerning the TFSC. We have signed an advance agreement covering the fields of culture, trade, economy and tourism. A Libyan delegation will arrive in the TFSC toward the end of July to study these matters. Here in Libya I found an opportunity to explain the Cyprus dispute to the Libyan foreign minister and other officials. To prove our good will, I have told them that I was prepared to meet Kiprianou in Tripoli and discuss matters that obstruct intercommunal talks."

In his statement to MILLIYET, Denktas stated that the Libyan Government is on the side of the Turkish Cypriots. He said: "Libya is on our side. It envisages an independent and nonaligned Cyprus where Turkish Cypriot rights are protected. Libya approves of the federated system we had agreed upon with Makarios."

Stating that national causes could not be referred to an arbitration committee, Denktas said: "The Greek Cypriot administration is trying to reduce us to a minority status. If Kiprianou comes to Libya and we succeed in reaching an agreement with him, there will be no need for going to an arbitration committee. The main difficulty lies in the summit. If we reach a summit agreement, the path to intercommunal negotations will be opened."

Answering a question concerning the reservations expressed by 11 Islamic countries at the recent Islamic conference held in Pakistan, Denktas stated that the PLO and Algeria led these countries and added that he was unable to comprehend this situation. Denktas further stated he would try to meet Yasir 'Arafat at the first opportunity, and added: "At first these 11 countries never supported the Turkish Cypriot cause. Now 11 countries express reservations. This is not regression. It is progress. Turkey, the TFSC and friendly Arab countries will have to make intensive efforts [to win the support] of these countries, for the Greek Cypriot propaganda is both ruthless and unethical. Algeria has always been against us. It is difficult to understand why. It is deplorable and thought provoking that the PLO is gradually turning against us and playing a role against us. The PLO is currently engaged in a struggle which we have waged and won. Such behavior is nothing but a blow from one Muslim country to another. I do not think that honorable 'Arafat is familar with all these facts. I wish to meet him at the earliest opportunity and discuss factual matters with him."

Comments on Resumption of Dialogue

AT231020 Athens Domestic Service in Greek 1000 GMT 23 Jun 80

[Excerpt] Cyprus developments were discussed at a meeting at the political office at 1100 today between Cyprus President Kiprianou, Prime Minister Rallis, Cyprus Foreign Minister Rolandhis and Greek Foreign Minister Mitsotakis and other officials. Prior to the meeting, while speaking to representatives of the press, Kiprianou stressed that he attributes special importance to his talks with the Greek Government since they are taking place during an extremely delicate phase of the issue after failure of UN efforts for resumption of inter-Cypriot dialogue, a failure which is due to Turkish intransigence. He added that an exchange of views will take place with the Greek Government on the further handling of the issue.

In comments to the press Rallis described the failure of efforts toward resumption of dialogue as unpleasant and reiterated that the basic political goal is the effort for a solution through dialogue in good faith always to be conducted under the auspices of UN Secretary General Waldheim.

Purpose of Talks Reviewed

AT231545 Athens Armed Forces Television Service in Greek 1500 GMT 23 Jun 80

[Text] Latest developments in the Cyprus issue were discussed today at a political office meeting attended by Cyprus President Kiprianou; Greek Prime Minister Rallis; Greek Foreign Minister Mitsotakis; Cyprus Foreign Minister Rolandhis; Cyprus Ambassador to Athens Hatzimiltis; Greek Ambassador to Nicosia Zakarakis; and other officials.

Prior to the meeting Kiprianou and Rallis made the following statements to representatives of the press:

[Begin Kiprianou video recording] I am extremely happy to be in Athens for talks with the Greek Government. I am completely certain that these talks will be useful from every aspect. It is not necessary for me to stress that the people of Cyprus consider Greece to be their main support in their struggle for survival and justification and that they are grateful for whatever support Greece offers to Cyprus.

This is the first time that I have visited Athens since Karamanlis took over the Office of President of the Republic and Rallis took over the Office of Prime Minister. I once again want to express my warmest congratulations.

I attribute special importance to these talks because they take place at quite a delicate stage in the Cyprus issue and particularly after the latest failure of the UN secretary general, the failure of his effort toward the resumption of dialogue. This failure is exclusively due to Turkish intransigence.

We, as we have always stated, are in favor of an honorable dialogue, in favor of a fundamental dialogue under the auspices of the UN secretary general. The Turkish side wants and insists upon forcing conditions upon us or coercing us into accepting advance obligations. This is a thing which can never happen because then this will not be a dialogue but a dictate of conditions.

What we have repeatedly stated is: Let dialogue begin on the basis of what has been agreed upon to date, on the basis of the agreement of 19 May 1979 which incorporates the Makarios-Denktas agreement, the UN decisions, the exclusion of partition, the demilitarization of Cyprus, the basic rights and freedoms of citizens and so forth. And then during negotiations particularly on whatever affects the constitutional and territorial issues, the Turkish side can naturally present any views it wants to at the table of negotiations in the same way that we will. This will be a free negotiation.

I have stressed many times that our side has demonstrated very great good will because, strictly speaking, from the very beginning we have had the right to state that we refuse to negotiate until Turkish forces depart. Our demand still remains that the Turkish troops should depart. However, despite all this we came to the dialogue. Many phases, throughout recent years, have always clashed against Turkish intransigence. This is where we are once again after the last failure of the latest effort.

Here we will see, we will exchange views with the Greek Government both with respect to efforts toward the resumption of intercommunal talks as well as possibly on other actions which we will or we must undertake. There will be a review and we will exchange views on additional handling of the issue. [end of video recording]

[Begin Rallis video recording] As the president of the republic has stated, the meeting and examination of the problem is taking place on the day after the rejection by the Turkish Cypriot side of the latest effort made by the UN secretary general for the resumption of dialogue.

After this unpleasant development we will conduct a review and we will examine what method should now be adopted and what method should be chosen and pursued by the independent government of Cyprus. The basic political goal, as you know, always remains the same. This is the effort to find a solution through a dialogue based on good faith and good will, a dialogue which will always be conducted under the auspices of Waldheim.

However, the method and the situation is always changing. This is what we will now examine and I believe that we will be able to at least convince the entire world that the Government of Cyprus does have the desire to proceed toward a solution and that this desire will be understood by all, even by those who pretend that there is some inability to start a dialogue, for which we are also to blame. This has absolutely no relationship to the truth. Over the past years, the Government of Cyprus has demonstrated good will and good faith and the other side must at long last understand that it is time for it to also demonstrate the same desire so that this problem can be solved, for it not only belabors Cyprus, but also the entire world. [end of video recording]

PAPANDREOU COMMENTS ON SOCIALIST CONTACT, DEPARTS FOR SPAIN

AT231830 Athens Domestic Television Service in Greek 1800 GMT 23 Jun 80

[Text] Opposition leader and Chairman of PASOK Andreas Papandreou is already in Madrid after an invitation from the Spanish Socialist Workers Party [PSOE]. Papandreou is accompanied by four leading personalities of his party. Shortly before his departure at noon today for Spain, Papandreou gave the following interview to ERT, Greek Radio and Television:

[Begin video recording] [Unidentified ERT correspondent] What type of contacts will you have in Madrid, and with whom, Mr Chairman?

[Papandreou] First of all, the delegation will immediately contact Felipe Gonzalez, first secretary of the PSOE. At the same time we will also meet Pierno Galvan, the mayor of Madrid. Later we will meet the chairman of the Cortes and the entire PSOE parliamentary group. We will also meet with (?Carrillo) and his aides.

[Question] What subjects will you discuss during your talks?

[Answer] The first and basic question will be the establishment of a basis for cooperation--close cooperation--between PASOK and the Spanish socialist party. At the same time we will jointly study the proposal made by Mediterranean socialists to PASOK for a close cooperation on Mediterranean problems and the handling of the problems which, as Mediterranean countries, we are facing within the framework of West Europe.

[Question] Does your visit to Madrid fall within these limits, in other words, the proposal for cooperation?

[Answer] Yes it does, but more generally for the expansion of our contacts with European socialist parties. And I would like to add that all our contacts today have in common a basic and objective goal, which is contribution to detente, to disarmament and to peace. [end video recording]

MILLIYET INTERVIEWS MITSOTAKIS ON TURKISH RELATIONS

NC240843 Istanbul MILLIYET in Turkish 23 Jun 80 pp 1, 6

["Exclusive" interview by MILLIYET correspondent Mustafa Gursel with Foreign Minister Mitsotakis in Athens--date not given]

[Text] Question: You are the first Greek foreign minister to visit Turkey for a long time. Although the main reason for your visit is to attend the NATO meeting, you will also meet with your Turkish counterpart in Ankara. What will the scope of this meeting be?

Answer: I have met Honorable Ekmen before, though only for a very short time, and had a brief conversation with him. I hope that our forthcoming meeting will afford us the opportunity to express our views most frankly on all outstanding issues between our two countries and to exchange views on them. As responsible statesmen it is our duty to work with good will and determination to resolve the disputes in question through peaceful methods. Despite all the difficulties existing at the moment, we must insist on our intention to develop good-neighborly relations.

Question: The Turkish-Greek dialogue on the Aegean dispute has yielded no result. In view of the fact that the technocrats have failed to reach agreement, don't you think that a summit meeting at the prime ministerial level might give the necessary political strength to such a dialogue? What could the next step be?

Answer: Whether or not they have disputes, the two neighboring countries should establish a dialogue at every possible level. If both sides are under the impression that these meetings will lead to positive results, we do not oppose such high-level talks.

Question: Why is Greece trying to take the Aegean continental shelf issue to an international tribunal or arbitration?

Answer: Greece has suggested for a long time that the issue of the Aegean continental shelf should be referred to the International Court of Justice or to an arbitration committee for the establishment of the legal situation. There are two main reasons for this. First, this dispute has a serious legal character. Moreover, similar disputes among other countries have been resolved through international legal methods. Our failure to reach a settlement on this matter so far indicates that we should try a new approach.

Question: Whenever military exercises are carried out in the Aegean some press organs talk of "new tension in the area". This has happened in recent weeks. Is there new tension between the two countries? If not, what should governments do to prevent the public from being misled?

Answer: As the Greek Government, we have issued official statements intended to correct wrong impressions which create anxiety in the minds of the Greek people. However, in an already sensitive area, military exercises should not include acts that tend to create new tensions. Calm action under such circumstances is important.

Question: In presenting the government program to the Parliament, Prime Minister Rallis chose to use a slogan of former Prime Minister Karamanlis which runs like this: "We hope for the settlement of the disputes through peaceful methods. However, if we are pushed into a war, we are not afraid of fighting." Ankara reacted to the use of the word "war". Since everybody in the Aegean wants peace can we possibly drop the word "war" from the political dictionary?

Answer: As a matter of fact, the basic meaning of the words the honorable prime minister and I used in the Parliament have exactly the same aim. Our intention is to stress the absurd situations which the absence of a meaningful dialogue and peaceful solutions can create. War or the threat of war is the most nonsensical method that can be used in international relations. We firmly believe that war creates more problems than it can resolve.

Question: You have recently been reacting negatively to aid extended to Turkey. Are you opposed to the economic and military aid being given to Turkey?

Answer: We understand the financial difficulties which Turkey currently faces. Moreover, we are not indifferent to the dangers which increasing economic and social unrest may create in a neighboring country. However, it is only natural that if peace is to maintained in our area, the military equilibrium between Turkey and Greece should be carefully preserved. I wish to remind you that in laying the foundations of peace and cooperation between the two countries, Venizelos and Ataturk took steps to prevent an arms race between Greece and Turkey. Both of them were aware of the fact that a military imbalance could lead to adverse developments in international relations.

Question: As one who has been watching Turkish-Greek relations from close quarters, I believe that most of the reasons for disputes facing both countries can be attributed to the lack of confidance between them. The continuation of these problems has an unwholesome and detrimental effect on the peoples of the area. What can be done to eliminate doubts and establish mutual confidence?

Answer: It is true that one of the main factors affecting Turkish-Greek relations is a mutual lack of confidence. Our press reacts strongly to certain undesirable official statements concerning our territorial integrity and sovereignty. The purpose of the suggestions made by former Prime Minister Karamanlis a few years ago, that the two countries should sign a nonaggression pact, which should be accompanied by confidence inspiring measures connected with arming and military exercises, was designed to eliminate this feeling of distrust. We are still hopefully awaiting Ankara's agreement to this suggestion.

I AVYI DISPUTES GOVERNMENT STAND ON BALANCE OF POWER, NATO

AT211346 Athens I AVYI in Greek 21 Jun 80 p8

[From the "I AVYI" column: "Disorienting Logic"]

[Text] We are currently passing through times which are characterized by intense consultations on the important problem of the country's return to the military wing of NATO and also the fate of the U.S. bases on Greek territory. These consultations are taking place under the blatant revelation of mass economic and military aid to Turkey by the United States and NATO on a scale that leaves no margin for any kind of hope for a "balance of forces" in the Agean or other solutions.

The government conferences which succeed one another reveal nothing about what has been finally agreed upon. Thus neither the parties nor the people know at this moment the position the government will maintain during the talks with both Admiral Crowe, commander of NATO forces in Southern Europe, who arrived in Athens yesterday and with U.S. assistant Secretary of State Nimetz, who will arrive today bringing--as several reports mention--U.S. demands against our country at this stage. In such a situation of "obscurity" we believe that it is necessary to stress certain things.

First we consider the furor which is being raised and the way it is being raised over the upset of the balance of forces between Greece and Turkey as disorienting, not because the issue is not serious but because the relevant furor is being raised in such a way by the government that the issue of restoring this balance is being put forth as a demand, the satisfaction of which will depend on some Greek "conciliatoriness" on the issues of the return to NATO and the U.S. bases. Seen from this perspective, Foreign Minister Mitsotakis' statement made the day before yesterday that the "issue of the balance of forces in the Aegean would be downgraded if Greece could solve the issue of its return to the NATO military wing" is very characteristic. It concerns a position which, no more no less, presents the return to NATO as a "salvation" within the reality of the quick upset in the balance of forces in the Aegean, the result of the U.S.-NATO policy. In this instance it is obvious that we have before us the specific "fruit" of the U.S.-NATO pressures to which the government responds to by acknowledging even more the NATO logic.

In fact, Mitsotakis disputed Prime Minister Rallis' contention that NATO does not protect one of its members from the aggressive intentions of another member. For the foreign minister, the return to the military wing of NATO will blunt the dangers of an attack on Turkey's part. Once again we have before us the publicity of the myth that the return will allegedly contribute to the country's security and defense whereas life itself has painfully proven the opposite.

The truth is that the country's possible return to the military wing of NATO will mark the neutralization, to a great extent, of Greek resistance to the implementation of a very concrete U.S.-NATO strategy which, above all, relies on the Turkish factor and--on the basis of this choice--solves all the "petty issues" of Turkish expansionist demands and Greek-Turkish differences. Consequently, the issue of the balance of forces with Turkey in the Aegean will be truly downgraded becaue in such a case the problems of Greek-Turkish differences will be "resolved" at the NATO staff headquarters rather than between Greece and Turkey. Are these the prospects Mitsotakis had in mind?

We believe that the issue of the shift in the balance of forces in the Aegean should propel Greek foreign policy in a radically different direction than that which seeks the "restoration of the balance" through a closer link with the Alliance, because only the finalization of the withdrawal from the military NATO and the closure of the U.S. bases can build a truly effective policy of national defense by utilizing the balances and the possibilities which exist in the modern world. Only then will any Turkish military strength with U.S.-NATO arms not constitute a threat to Greece. Everything else which aims at how we should compete with Turkey for NATO arms in exchange for our attachment to the military NATO merely contributes to the country's essential disarament before the true dangers which threaten it.

DEMIREL, ERBAKAN COMMENT AFTER DISCUSSION OF NSP LETTER

TA231751 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1400 GMT 23 Jun 80

[Text] Prime Minister Suleyman Demirel and National Salvation Party [NSP] leader Necmettin Erbakan today held a second meeting where they discussed the warning letter given by the NSP to the government and the latter's answers to that letter. The meeting was held in Erbakan's office in the parliament building. It began at 1030 and lasted 5 hours without a break. In a statement to the press after the meeting Demirel said:

[Begin Demirel recording] The aim was to better understand what we were saying to each other. I believe that we have clarified both what was meant in Mr Erbakan's letter and in ours. Now it is not up to us to think "what should we do now?"

We have been in the government for more than 7 months. It has not yet been 7 months since we received a vote of confidence but it has been 7 months since we established the government We established the government after investigating the meaning of the support promised to us by the political parties after the 14 October 1979 elections. Everybody knows that we did not have the majority in the Assembly to enable us to establish a government on our own. We wanted to solve the problems of the country rather than merely form a government. However, the road to that passed through forming a government.

The will of the nation led the Assembly to bestow the duty of establishing a government on us. We have been discharging that duty for about 7 months. God is our witness that we have been discharging our duty with loyalty, determination and sincerity. Naturally we cannot tell the parties supporting us: "You gave us your support; the rest is not of your concern. Why should you care?" It is impossible to say such a thing. The parties supporting us are not responsible for the execution of our policies. However, there are conditions for the support. The fact that they are not responsible for the execution of our policies does not eliminate these conditions. In other words, there is a difference between those who support us and those who do not. Consequently, it is very natural for the political parties who support us to inform us of their views, or to ask us for information or to criticize us about points to which they think our attention should be drawn.

Naturally we did not establish a government only to implement the programs of the parties that support us. However, we must be able to defend the way we execute our policies. We are always ready to defend that. Let me put it frankly: I am not looking for new support, nor am I seeking the continuation of already existing support. If the support continues, we continue to carry out our duties. If we reach a point where we can no longer stay in government we will not glue ourselves to the government seat. In other words, we will not continue to carry out our duties as the government unless we have a parliamentary power behind us. We will not remain in government if we do not have the necessary parliamentary power behind us. We exist to serve, not to become a government. That is why the next stage in this issue is outside us. [end recording]

In a statement after the meeting, NSP leader Erbakan said that if his party's leadership council concluded its assessment of the meeting at its session this evening, then tomorrow he would publicly disclose his party's decision whether or not to continue to support the government.

[Begin Erbakan recording] The aim of the meeting with Demirel was to discuss the reasons why we submitted our letter of warning to the government, the problems and sufferings of our nation and country. After that, the prime minister explained to us what this government did during the past 7 months, its actions and for what reason they were made. He explained this in detail. He also explained in detail what the government attitude will be, from now on, about the 16 demands we put forward.

The majority of the explanations were about the steps taken by the government, during the past 7 months, about anarachy and the economy. Furthermore, we clarified the letter of warning and the government's reply to it by talking about them and explaining them. We thus completed the spoken discussions about the issue. As we have already told our dear nation, this issue, including the spoken explanations, will be reviewed once again by the proper group within our party. After that, we will make the necessary announcement. Today we will try to complete our review of the issue. If we succeed, we will make the necessary announcement to our dear nation tomorrow. [end recording]

RPP'S ECEVIT REITERATES PROPOSAL FOR JP-RPP-NSP COALITION

[Excerpt] RPP leader Bulent Ecevit has reiterated his proposal to establish a 1-year coalition government with the participation of the RPP, the Justice Party [JP] and the National Salvation Party [NSP] under the premiership of a person without any party affiliation. Ecevit said JP leaders consistently pretend not to understand this appeal.

In a news conference in Ankara today, Ecevit said: We are not concerned about assuming power. We are concerned about the problems of the people and the country. Pointing out that a system which is unacceptable to the people is being forced on Turkey through international [economic] ties and that his party is concerned about preventing this, Ecevit continued: The concern of persons who live in an atmosphere of civil war in divided cities, of persons who are forced to emigrate due to a lack of security and of those who are being exported in their homes, shops and buses is also our concern.

We do not say that we want to come to power in place of the existing government. However, the replies we receive assume that we say this and they aim to conceal the truth. However, if there is no other solution and if we have the chance we would, of course, establish a government ourselves and shoulder the enormous burden which would be inherited from the current government. This is not our proposal. We propose to make peace among opposing sides, to end enmities and to save our economy through the strength of our own nation.

ECEVIT STATES RPP WILL ATTEMPT TO TOPPLE GOVERNMENT

TA231804 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1600 GMT 23 Jun 80

[Text] RPP leader Bulent Ecevit has said that, as of tomorrow, the RPP legislators will do all they can to topple the government and elect a president. Ecevit was speaking at a ceremony organized to mark independent Deputy from Izmir Akin Simav's joining the RPP. Ecevit expressed the conviction that the RPP parliamentarians would do all they could to ensure the solution of the two problems. He called on all the RPP legislators to be present at the Turkish Grand National Assembly.

Recalling that following the Nevsehir incidents, Bulent Demir, the RPP district leader for Beyoglu in Istanbul, had been killed yesterday, Ecevit said that the party had lost another valuable member in its struggle for democracy and peace. Ecevit said: culprits of the attacks carried out against RPP officials, the murderers of the RPP officials, have not been apprehended so far, nor is there the smallest sign that they will be. Wherever we went we saw that efforts are being made not to apprehend the culprits but to prevent their apprehension. The statement the interior minister made yesterday shows a much graver situation than that: It proves the government's direct responsibility for these incidents.

Ecevit stressed that the Nevsehir incidents had occurred before the eyes of many journalists who managed, with difficulty, to escape unharmed. Criticizing the attitude of the Nevehir governor during the incidents, Ecevit said: The governor, who is making certain allegations now, locked himself up in his office, together with the security director. This shows that he knew very well what was going to happen and he could do nothing about it except lock himself up. Ecevit pointed out that, while entering Nevesehir, stones were thrown at the RPP bus, smashing its windows.

Ecevit stressed that all these incidents showed that the government must resign or be toppled as soon as possible. He added: In a situation in which the lives of main opposition party officials are in danger and in which conditions are such that everyone has to look out for his own security, the government should voluntarily resign and pave the way for the peace and unity government we proposed. However, since the government seems to have no such intention, we will do all we can to obtain results from our interpellation. This week, as of tomorrow, the RPP legislators will do all we can to topple the government and obtain results from the presidential elections.

Bulent Ecevit stressed that despite all the difficulties and pressures, the RPP candidate had won the mayoralty elections in Dortyol, a district of Hatay. With the joining of independent deputy from Izmir, Akin Simav, the member of RPP seats at the National Assembly rose to 203.

RIGHT TO CARRY FIREARMS EXPANDED TO INCLUDE MORE OFFICIALS

TA221617 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1000 GMT 22 Jun 80

[Text] A regulation broadening the right to carry firearms has gone into effect. In a press conference in Ankara, Interior Minister Mustafa Gulcugil said that the terrorist incidents increased the inclination of citizens and public servants to carry arms. He added that the changes in the country's general security conditions made it necessary for the regulation on carrying firearms to be rewritten. The interior minister pointed out that if a person planning to attack somebody knew that the other person was carrying a firearm he would think twice about shooting. He explained that the regulation was being changed because there were very few crimes which were committed with firearms issued on permit.

In accordance with the changes in the regulation, high-level officials in the government, university and academy administrators, inspectors and accountants will be able to carry firearms. Civil servants employed outside residential areas will also benefit from this right, as will the central and provincial leaders of political parties represented in parliament, mayors, mukhtars, members of provincial general councils, lawyers, journalists, notaries, bank directors, jewelers, drivers of interurban buses and trucks, retired judges and prosecutors and retired prison wardens.

The interior minister said that governors would decide whether or not to issue firearms to persons outside these categories. He also said that the permits would be issued for 2 years instead of 1.

On the Nevsehir incidents, Gulcugil said that all the necessary measures were taken for the funeral. He stressed that it had been definitely determined that no one had used arms except for RPP parliamentarians and security forces during the incident. Denying the allegations that shots were fired at the funeral procession from outside, the interior minister said that the wounded persons might have been wounded by shots fired at the ground from within the funeral procession.

On the incidents that occured in the Inciralti Ataturk student dormitories in Izmir, which resulted in the death of five students and the injury of a large number of students, the interior minister said the incidents erupted when the students prevented the security forces from conducting an identity check by firing at them.

EUROPEAN COMMUNITY

NEGOTIATIONS CONTINUE ON SPANISH MEMBERSHIP

LD232231 Madrid in Spanish to Europe 1830 GMT 23 Jun 80

[Excerpts] Brussels--A further session of the negotiating committee for Spanish membership in the European Community--the 11th to date--was held today. This meeting, at the deputy level, was the last one to be held under Italian chairmanship. The Spanish delegation, led by Ambassador Bassols, submitted a statement concerning the section on economic and financial matters, along with two supplementary statements on derived rights and provision for joint manufacturing.

For its part the Community delegation presented its attitude on the section on social affairs, one of the most important in the membership negotiations and one which comes in response to the Spanish stance as set out at the 14 March negotiating session. In its statement the European Community defines the field of application of Community regulations in the field of social affairs, with special reference to commitments of this type undertaken by the Community in respect of third countries. The European Community took note of Spain's wish to give priority to solving problems concerning the situation of Spanish workers at present resident in the Community. The Community delegation believes it necessary to apply transitional measures to ensure the total implementation of free movement of labor between Spain and the Community, according to a principle of their progressive introduction and of respect for existing bilateral arrangements relating to seasonal migration. Leopoldo Calvo Sotelo, minister for relations with the European Community will come to Brussels on 7 July for a meeting with Roy Jenkins, president of the European Commission.

AMARAL: USSR CRITICISM MEANS CORRECT FOREIGN POLICY

LD211910 Lisbon Domestic Service in Portuguese 0300 GMT 21 Jun 80

[Text] Here are some extracts from statements made just a few hours ago in Vienna to the Spanish news agency, EFE, by Freitas do Amaral, the deputy prime minister and minister of foreign affairs. In connection with comments made in the Soviet press, Freitas do Amaral said: Soviet criticism of Portuguese foreign policy is good sign that Portugal is on the right course. He added: I am not surprised that the USSR is critical of our foreign policy, because our policy is against expansionism in any form.

Amaral stated that Portugal would welcome Spain's entry into NATO and added: We believe this would be a development to the advantage of the West's defensive organization and also to that of Portugal. However, this is a decision for Spain alone to make.

In Freitas do Amaral's opinion, Giscard d'Estaing's recent statements on the entry to new members into the EEC do not pose a real threat of a delay to Portugal's acceptance into the Community. Giscard is not against the entry of Spain and Portugal into the EEC. He advocates a restructuring of the entry mechanisms. Do Amaral continued: At the moment there is no sign that the entry negotiations may be delayed. We believe that our admission will take place within the scheduled timetable. Freitas do Amaral said that both he and Austrian Chancellor Bruno Kreisky, with whom he has had talks, believe that the Western democracies should attend the Madrid Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe.

PENTAGON PLANS TO BASE U.S. TROOPS IN DENMARK NOTED

LD231215 Stockholm SVENSKA DAGBLADET in Swedish 17 Jun 80 p 15

[Erik Liden report: "70,000 Elite Soldiers: United States Plans Base in Denmark"]

[Text] The United States is planning a drastic increase in its military resources in Europe. There are plans to base 70,000 soldiers in Denmark in peacetime.

The plans have been worked out in the Pentagon military headquarters without much contact with Denmark. The Pentagon's explanation is the unsettled situation between the two superpowers and the fact that the Marines, which in the past have been sent on emergency missions to foreign countries, can for political reasons no longer be used. Officers and politicians in the Pentagon want therefore to make the best use of the elite soldiers that form the major part of the Marine Corps. Today there are just over 400,000 U.S. soldiers in Western Europe.

There is no question of the immediate transport of 70,000 soldiers to Denmark. But the plans are ready if the need becomes pressing.

What surprises Danish observers most is the fact that the agreement with NATO normally prohibits the peacetime deployment of troops and equipment in Denmark. But foreign troops can be flown in if the situation around the Baltic requires it.

The American plans also pose the possibility of transporting 270 tanks and 370 armored trackled vehicles to Jutland. Some 52,000 men will comprise the Marine forces and 16,000 will be land-based to defend the islands around the Baelt and Oeresund.

The Swedish Government has no official comment on these new reports, but in Denmark the press debate is heated and negative. Many consider that Denmark should have been given advance warning of the plans.

Mitsotakis Arrival

TA241323 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1300 GMT 24 Jun 80

[Text] Greek Minister of Foreign Affairs Konstandinos Mitsotakis arrived in Ankara at 1430. At Esenboga Airport he was received by Foreign Ministry officials and the Greek ambassador to Ankara. In a statement to journalists, Mitsotakis said that he was happy to make his first official visit as foreign minister to Turkey. He also expressed the hope that during his stay in Ankara he would hold beneficial talks with Foreign Minister Hayrettin Erkmen on issues concerning the two countries. Mitsotakis said: I believe that the talks will mark the beginning of a new phase in Turkish-Greek relations. He also noted that Greece viewed as a basic principle the development of friendly relations with Turkey.

Meanwhile, it is being reported that Muskie and Mitsotakis will hold a meeting today.

Luns News Conference

TA241838 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1600 GMT 24 Jun 80

[Excerpts] In a news conference in Ankara today, NATO Secretary General Joseph Luns explained the issues to be discussed by the NATO ministerial council.

In a statement during the news conference, Luns said that the efforts exerted to strengthen the southeastern flank of the Alliance are very important from the viewpoint of the existing tense atmosphere in the world. Pointing out that during the NATO summit meeting held in Washington in 1978, he was charged with following the program on assisting the economically less developed members of the Alliance, Luns said: This subject will be discussed in the light of the second article of the North Atlantic Treaty which aims to eliminate the economic differences among member countries. While handling this subject, special importance will be attached to Turkey.

Luns noted that the 5-year program, which aims to strengthen the scientific and technological opportunities of Greece, Portugal and Turkey, will also be reviewed by the ministerial council. Luns announced that the reports envisaging cooperation in the Mediterranean and in the field of military equipment will also be discussed during the ministerial council meeting.

Some of the foreign ministers who will attend the NATO ministerial council spring meetings have arrived in Ankara. U.S. Secretary of State Edmund Muskie, the first to arrive in Ankara, was followed by Greek Foreign Minister Mitsotakis. Later, the Danish Foreign Minister Kjeld Olesen, Norwegian Foreign Minister Knut Frydenlund, French Foreign Minister Jean Francois-Poncet, Canadian Secretary of State for External Affairs Mark MacGuigan, British Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs Lord Carrington and West German Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher also arrived in Ankara. The Belgian foreign minister was expected to arrive in Ankara momentarily as this news report was being prepared.

Meanwhile, Mitsotakis and Muskie held a meeting at the residence of the U.S. ambassador. U.S. Assistant Secretary of State Matthew Nimetz, Greek Foreign Ministry Secretary General Byron Theodhoropoulos and the two countries' ambassadors to Ankara also attended the meeting. No statement was issued in connection with the meeting.

Lord Carrington arrived in Ankara at 1800. In a statement at the airport, Carrington said the Ankara meeting is very important amid an international atmosphere of instability.

Pointing out that the issues of Iran and Afghanistan closely interest Turkey, Carrington expressed the hope that the stand of the industrialized countries' summit meeting in Venice on the issue of Afghanistan will be supported by the NATO ministerial council.

Genscher and the Luxembourg foreign minister arrived in Ankara at 1830.

Meanwhile, Foreign Minister Hayrettin Erkmen is holding a meeting with his French counterpart. The meeting, which began at the foreign minister's office at 1730, was still in session when this news bulletin was prepared. The U.S., French, British and West German foreign ministers will also hold a quadrilateral meeting this evening.

Erkmen Message

TA241215 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1000 GMT 24 Jun 80

[Text] Foreign Minister Hayrettin Erkmen has said that the events of the last 6 months, which have been taking place in regions close to NATO's southern flank and to Turkey and which could adversely affect world stability, have increased the significance of the NATO ministerial council meetings to be held in Ankara.

In a statement he issued on the occasion of the NATO ministerial council spring meetings to begin in Ankara tomorrow, Erkmen said: I believe that NATO, which has considered it its goal to implement and abide by the principles of countries' independence, human rights and respect for democracy and justice, will emerge from its ministerial council meeting having strengthened solidarity and cooperation among its members. Noting that the deterrent power of a strong NATO will also affect the regions outside NATO, Erkmen continued: NATO, which has not only ensured peace and stability in Europe but has also greatly contributed to the social and economic development of its member countries during the 31 years since its foundation, still maintains its importance. NATO continues to be the basic factor in insuring peace and security and in securing the prosperity of the peoples of the member countries, by developing its military power in order to thwart a possible attack and by exerting efforts to achieve a balance of power between the East and the West and to create the necessary atmosphere to base international relations on the principle of mutual trust and respect. Erkmen also wished that the Ankara meetings be auspicious to world peace and stability.

Council Meeting Begins

TA250817 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 0800 GMT 25 Jun 80

In an opening statement Demirel said: During the 31 years since its foundation our Alliance has succeeded in securing peace and stability within the NATO region and has thus created the opportunity for the member countries to develop and strengthen their society and their economy despite the unrest, pain and change caused by violence in many regions in the world. The foreign ministers of the 15 NATO member countries will go to the Turkish Standards Institute after the opening ceremony and will begin their meetings in camera.

USSR DISSIDENT BORISOV ARRIVES AFTER DEPORTATION

AU231002 Vienna Domestic Service in German 0500 GMT 23 Jun 80

[Text] Prominent Soviet civil rights fighter Vladimir Borisov, one of the cofounders of the so-called free trade unions, has been deported and brought to Vienna by Soviet authorities.

Borisov had been an active member of the dissidents' movement since 1968. He spent 9 months in psychiatric clinics. In June last year he was rearrested.

Yesterday he was taken by the authorities on board a plane, with his hands tied behind his back. He arrived in Vienna wearing prison clothing. As he himself declared, he was brutally pushed out of the plane by the policemen escorting him when he refused to leave the plane.

Borisov has left behind in the Soviet Union his wife and his 10-month-old daughter.

SOCIALISTS STRESS SOLIDARITY WITH CSSR'S BATTEK

AU231443 Vienna ARBEITER-ZEITUNG in German 21 Jun 80 p 5

[SOCIALIST PRESS SERVICE report: "SPOe Solidarity With Arrested Battek"]

[Text] Vienna (SK)--The well-known Czechoslovak Social Democrat and civil rights fighter Rudolf Battek--who, as has been reported, was again arrested in Prague a few days ago--according to the prosecutor now is to be charged with "use of force against public officials," an offense punishable with up to 3 years imprisonment. An Austrian Socialist Party [SPOe] press release states that Battek, in letters he exchanged with the SPOe, emphatically declared his adherence to the goals of democratic socialism but at the same time pointed out that he and his comrades in the CSSR always remain within the framework of the valid CSSR Constitution and the Helsinki Final Act.

On the occasion of Battek's rearrest, the SPOE again assures all fighters for democracy and human rights, in whichever country they may be, of his fraternal solidarity.

SCHMIDT, MINISTERS, PRESS COMMENT ON RESULTS OF VENICE SUMMIT

Schmidt on Moscow Visit Issue

DW241059 Munich ARD Television Network in German 1915 GMT 23 Jun 80

[Gerd H. Pelletier interview with Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt in Venice; date not given--recorded]

[Text] [Question] You have signed a very stern, distinctive statement on Afghanistan here. Do you consider that a usable ticket into the Kremlin which you will visit in 8 days?

[Answer] The common approach of the seven most important democratic, industrial states with regard to a number of current international issues--particularly the Afghanistan crisis--has nothing to do with the continuation of bilateral relations of individual states. We are particularly not concerned about producing some sort of ticket together with others. What we have jointly said about the refugee problem in the world, the problem of terrorism, the taking of hostages, and the Afghanistan crisis, really and clearly expresses our common attitude. No large amount of work was necessary to make these decisions. But we have spent many hours on carefully analyzing the international situation.

[Question] You have discussed your Moscow visit here and have enlightened the other government chiefs. Is there leeway, or have you found understanding regarding the fact that certain states need more leeway in matters of detente than others?

[Answer] I did not enlighten anybody because the other six government chiefs had been fully informed as a result of consultations with the Foreign Office and foreign minister in past weeks. It was, however, the final point of these consultations, so to speak. Everybody knows that we have not been seeking a mandate for our Moscow talks. We will act there and operate, however, in pursuance of our national interests, our German interests, on a fully coordinated and consultative basis. This has been confirmed here. The question with regard to leeway of action does not seem quite proper to me. I do not feel that the German federal chancellor's leeway has been curtailed, particularly not by the meeting here in Venice--on the contrary. Our intention and our report have been accepted here very positively.

[Question] This summit has not changed anything with regard to the issues to be discussed in Moscow?

[Answer] No, nothing has changed.

[Question] So you will have international topics on your list of issues?

[Answer] Naturally.

[Question] Prior to this summit we read that the success of Venice would depend on the arrangement to be made between President Carter and Federal Chancellor Schmidt. You certainly know best why this formulation was made. Was there a new and necessary arrangement between you and President Carter?

[Answer] You say that you read this. I assume that you read it either in the American or the German press. Not every paper described it in such a precise manner. You are hinting at the letter which nobody from the press knows about, but which I and the author of the letter know quite well. I can tell you that this letter has become irrelevant.

[Question] For the Americans, too?

[Answer] I can tell you that this letter has become irrelevant. And I would not say that if Jimmy Carter thought otherwise.

[Question] These meetings from Rambouillet to Tokyo have been called world economic summits. But now politics has been playing a big role. At the end of this summit, do you see any outstanding results in the economic sector?

[Answer] It is natural that in 1980, this year full of tension, a greater role than usual is being played by international politics. That must not always be the case. But the economic debates were very thorough. Personally I have been very much enriched by these discussions. The economic situation of developing countries, as before, has played a great part here in Venice--not only the problem of development assistance, but particularly the effects which the oil price explosion will have on these countries.

Oil prices have increased fifteenfold and twentyfold since the last oil price increase. The effect is bad for us, for the industrial countries, but the effect on developing countries is much worse. Many of them are no longer in a position to pay their oil bills. Many of them are forced to use all their export gains to import just the little oil they need to operate their means of transport, vehicles with which they want to transport food to the people. It has been jointly and strongly demanded for the first time here that the oil-exporting countries which have an enormous surplus at present--some $120 billion in 1 year--that these oil-exporting countries ought to make material contributions so that developing countries without oil do not face very extraordinary difficulties.

Schmidt on Character of Summit

DW241059 Hamburg ARD Television Network in German 2030 GMT 23 Jun 80

[Statement by Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt on Venice summit; date not given--recorded]

[Text] The creation of these summit meetings by President Giscard and myself--we suggested them 6 years ago--was never aimed at producing so-called tangible results--in marks and fpennigs with two digits behind the comma [as heard]. The purpose has always been to create opportunities for mutual talks. Sometimes operative results have been achieved; sometimes results have been achieved which have remained in effect for a long time in the future. This is particularly the case here in Venice. We have not met here to decide on some sort of new club contribution. Neither have we met to start some great operation. We have met in order to learn from each other and, in this regard, we have achieved excellent results.

Further Schmidt Remarks

DW241020 Mainz ZDF Television Network in German 1900 GMT 23 Jun 80

[Dieter Kronzucker and Friedhelm Ost interview with Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt in Venice; date not given--recorded]

[Excerpts] [Question] Does the Venice summit mark the end of misunderstanding in the Alliance?

[Answer] Actually there have been no broad misunderstandings in the Alliance. Nor is this summit a meeting of the Alliance. As you know, the Japanese are not affiliated with our Alliance. Rather, this is a meeting of the seven greatest democratic industrial states regardless of their alliance affiliations.

[Question] You will be going to Moscow next week. What influence did the talks here in Venice exert on the plans you have for your talks in Moscow?

[Answer] They did not exert any influence on our plans for Moscow. My colleagues gave me two or three requests to take along, asking that I try to clear these up on this occasion. I gladly complied. And it goes without saying that the general foreign policy discussion here in Venice has put an end to these consultations, as it were. Our dealing with this matter was not very time consuming; it took us maybe 20 or 25 minutes.

[Question] You are also reportedly to find out how serious the Soviets are about their withdrawal offer from Afghanistan, whether this pullout will be continued in stages. Will this be a topic of your talks?

[Answer] This is obvious, of course.

[Question] Great targets have again been defined here in Venice at the world economic summit. How can these targets be attained? Does this not mean that you and your colleagues must demand political sacrifices at home, that you must take new initiatives?

[Answer] I believe that the targets defined here do not constitute any new objectives as far as the Federal Republic of Germany is concerned. We are in the pleasant situation of having already made big advances in the fields of energy-source substitutions for oil, energy conservation in general, coal gasification, coal liquefaction, and so-called new energy sources. Surely we need not make any special sacrifices to attain these targets. We believe that these are realistic targets for us. I may say that what Germany has undertaken to do at earlier summit meetings--and I participated in all six of them, the seventh to be held in Canada next year--has been completely fulfilled; we can state that with a clear conscience. The German Federal Government, after all, is characterized by the fact that it does not rashly make commitments to something that is hard to accomplish. But once it has studied the matter and found that it can really make such a target attainable, it makes such commitments, and these commitments are also observed. Our balance of accounts, after all, is very good in that respect. Not all states can show an equally good balance sheet.

[Question] The Federal Republic too will also be tasked very much when the program on aid to the Third World discussed here will take effect.

[Answer] Yes, that is correct. But may I be allowed to point out that the Federal Republic of Germany has increased public development aid alone by 40 percent during the past 2 years. This is an unbelievable feat hardly paralleled anywhere in the world. Still--and you just heard the British prime minister praise this at the final press conference--we have retained a very solid monetary and financial situation. We have not disrupted it, and this has been veritably praised by others.

[Question] "Move away from oil" perhaps was the message of Venice, but this is not a particularly new message. Yet the oil problem overshadows the world economy, propels inflation, and creates unemployment. Do you see any chance after Venice to enter into a more intensive dialogue with the oil-extracting countries?

[Answer] We are conducting a broad, bilateral dialogue. You will recall that King Khalid of Saudi Arabia was in Germany for 3 days with many of his advisers and ministers. We accomplished a great deal during this visit. Our contacts with Saudi Arabia are very good and close anyway. We also maintain good contacts with other oil-exporting states, maintaining a constant exchange of ideas with them. But certainly the consensus which will emanate from this Venice meeting will be not to regard the so-called North-South problem--which the world public has once again become aware of due to the report of the Brandt commission--as a problem between democratic industrial states and developing countries. Rather, the problems requiring solution also necessitate contributions from the oil-surplus countries which amass gigantic surpluses--$120 billion this year alone--and from industrialized communist states which so far have done nothing at all in this field except to send arms, tanks and airplanes.

[Question] Would you welcome the cooperation of countries of the communist power sphere or would this spell political risk?

[Answer] Personally I would welcome it. There is but one world; it should not be divided into two. But I will concede that different views exist on this as well. I would very much welcome the industrialized communist states assuming part of the burden, which should be their moral duty.

Genscher Notes Accord

DW241149 Munich ARD Television Network in German 1930 GMT 23 Jun 80

[Excerpts from correspondent Feller interview with Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher in Venice; date not given--recorded]

[Text] [Question] Did Brezhnev's message to Giscard touch off a discussion at that meeting?

[Answer] The concrete position of the states assembled here has been outlined. The Afghanistan crisis can be solved only by a complete withdrawal of Soviet troops from this country, and by the complete reestablishment of its sovereignty and independence. This position was outlined very clearly in the communique.

[Question] But could this be the first step in a withdrawal of troops?

[Answer] I certainly believe that it is important in assessing the situation to know whether this is just a reduction, involving troops that are not needed anyway for the occupation, or whether this is a first step toward full withdrawal from the country. The Moscow visit will offer an opportunity to clarify this particular problem. By the way, it would also serve the interests of the countries assembled here.

[Question] What would be the result if full sovereignty is not returned to the Afghans, although this has been demanded at the meeting here?

[Answer] This is not merely an opinion outlined by the meeting here. It corresponds with the opinion of 104 states of the United Nations. It corresponds with the opinion of the states of the European Community. It corresponds with the opinion of the member states of the Islamic Conference--which is particularly important. I think that the Soviet Union, as a result of the statements of all these meetings, will realize that a solution of this very grave crisis will really only be possible with a complete withdrawal and reestablishment of sovereignty.

[Question] So there will be no East-West conflict but only a North-South conflict?

[Answer] A North-South conflict in addition to a West-East conflict. I believe that we should particularly not underrate the efforts of the Islamic Conference, the group of three which has been appointed by it, and those of the nonaligned movement. It seems to me that the significance of the political factor of the nonaligned movement is often being underrated in public. In the meantime, it has become an important factor in international politics, a factor no country can ignore, including the Soviet Union.

[Question] Has the dissonance been eliminated in the Atlantic Alliance?

[Answer] It has turned out that the intention of the Federal Government to show positive signs of German-American and European-American cooperation has been in line with the ideas of other participants, particularly the U.S. Government. A significant contribution in this respect was made as a result of the meetings with the American President and the U.S. secretary of state.

Broad discussion, are certainly very good now and again. This has been demonstrated here in Venice. The talks we have had here in the circle of seven showed that there is great accord with regard to basic positions of the countries assembled here. But these basic positions must be complemented and developed in view of progressive developments. That is the advantage of these meetings. Today we consider this kind of meeting as a matter of course. But this is not the case at all. The results, however, are significant for formulating general concepts of the West. These general concepts exist and significantly contribute to international stability.

[Question] What has the American President said about the recent Near East statement of the Nine?

[Answer] The U.S. secretary of state has commented on it in public. He maintained a positive approach like the Egyptian president. In other words, two countries that are involved in the Camp David process have assessed the statement positively. A great number of Arab states also see mostly positive elements in this statement. I think it can be helpful to promote efforts from all sides aimed at a just and far-reaching peaceful settlement.

More Genscher Remarks

DW241240 Cologne Westdeutscher Rundfunk Network in German 1630 GMT 23 Jun 80

[Correspondent Burchardt interview with Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher in Venice; date not given--recorded]

[Text] [Question] The foreign policy part of the summit meeting is practically wound up. How do you assess the results of Venice from the German point of view?

[Answer] To begin with, Venice is a significant sign of European-American and German-American cooperation and of the will to face the challenges of our time in close cohesion in the future. Beyond that, the political discussions and our public statements have showed that the countries gathered here have adopted a harmonious position on the most important issues. This is clear to anybody who sees our statement on Afghanistan in which it is clearly said that it is necessary to completely withdraw Soviet troops from Afghanistan in order to overcome this serious international crisis.

[Question] You and the chancellor will be going to Moscow a week from now with the full backing, as it was said here, of all the Western partners.

Will you bring up the Afghanistan issue in Moscow along the lines discussed here, and will you demand an answer from the Soviets as to whether this is a mere beginning or whether there will be a basic pullout?

[Answer] In the first place you correctly noted that we do have the full backing of the states present here, just as we had the full backing of our European partners even prior to Venice. This makes it clear that the Federal Government is also acting on the full basis of the common Western positions on this significant foreign policy issue and will be do so during our important visit to Moscow. Since Afghanistan will be one of the central topics in Moscow it is only natural that we find out within this framework as well what the announced troop pullout means, provided it takes place: whether it is a reduction of troops not needed for occupation of the territory anyway, or whether it is a serious step toward final pullout.

[Question] What is striking about this statement on Afghanistan is another statement on the Olympic boycott. This means that the governments which decided for a boycott aver once again. Suppose a pullout from Afghanistan were announced during your visit. Would this still influence the participation in the Olympic games by these states?

[Answer] I believe that the very clear statement made here--in which they expressly aver their attitude--does not invite any further interpretation or speculation.

[Question] A word about the irritation that occurred as a result of the Carter letter to Helmut Schmidt, irritation which reportedly has been cleared away now. Will the Germans in their discussion of the arms gap closure in Moscow advocate a position which is shared by all the other Western allies?

[Answer] The position of the Federal Government on the TNF issue is in harmony with the position of the Alliance as stipulated in December 1979. [Words indistinct] and it is on this basis that the talks will be conducted. It is my belief that the discussions here in general, and the U.S.-German meeting in particular, have shown that both sides are determined to cooperate closely and to weather the challenges of our times together. We are aware that the Federal Republic of Germany is a part of the West, and it is Europe, the United States, and Canada together which can maintain its freedom.

Lambsdorff on Economic Issues

DW250725 Cologne Deutschlandfunk Network in German to East and West Germany 0531 GMT 24 Jun 80

[Correspondent Bachhausen interview with Federal Economics Minister Otto Graf Lambsdorff; date, place not given--recorded]

[Text] [Question] Energy commanded the center of discussions on economic policy at the Venice summit meeting. Have the seven participating industrial countries come to terms on new austerity targets?

[Answer] No, nor do we have any intention of coming to terms on any new austerity targets, apart from the questions pertaining to 1990--that is, the share of the oil in the consumption of primary energy--and apart from the question concerning the so-called flexibility coefficient, which is the oil input in the increase of the gross national product. In that respect new targets have been set which we will try to attain. As for the rest, the objectives of Tokyo remain valid.

[Question] Did they also discuss ways of attaining these targets, of putting these austerity measures into practice?

[Answer] Yes. It is the essentially new premise of the communique, and it is characteristic of the discussions of Venice that this time we did not confine ourselves to the proclamation of targets but essentially agreed on the contents of energy policy. This is a position which the Federal Government has long been proposing and advocating. We are quite happy that we prevailed with this concept together with the others. We believe that it is important not to concentrate on the discussion of figures and targets--which are also important--but on an understanding about the best ways of attaining these targets through concerted action.

[Question] What is supposed to replace the oil that is to be saved--primarily nuclear energy or coal?

[Answer] Though we did not talk about priorities it was made clear that, apart from energy conservation which naturally plays a very important role, we cannot do without alternative energy sources, that is, the peaceful use of nuclear energy and increased utilization of coal. Both are necessary. Our energy problems cannot be solved any other way.

[Question] Why did the German delegation insist so strictly on the inclusion of a passage in the communique saying that countries having their own oil resources should adapt their domestic oil prices to world levels?

[Answer] We do not want to change the current oil and energy policy line which was worked out in Tokyo, for example, or in Bonn; it contains the same things we have again stressed here. If other countries, due to their national oil production, make this oil available to their industries on much lower price and cost levels, a deterioration in competition conditions would result, thus creating protectionist pressures which would negatively affect our economy and industry and create difficulties for all of us.

[Question] Do the Venice decisions mean that the Federal Government must initiate additional saving measures, that it must intensify its conservation policy?

[Answer] No, that is not the case.

[Question] Was the economic situation discussed in Venice, a situation that has developed very differently in the participating countries?

[Answer] Yes, inflation and unemployment problems were naturally discussed. It was realized that they have been caused to a great extent--but not only--by oil price increases. There are also self-made problems. We must try to jointly overcome them.

[Question] But the Federal Government was not asked, as it was 2 years ago, to take over a leading function and do more in stepping up economic developments?

[Answer] No, not a word was said about that.

[Question] What was achieved in Venice with regard to protectionism?

[Answer] We have confirmed the current trade policy line. That is not sensational, but it is particularly important because everybody knows that protectionist tendencies are strengthening. I want to mention just two things: entertainment electronics and the automobile industry. It seemed very important to me that the seven state and government chiefs agreed here again not to yield to such protectionist efforts.

[Question] Did Venice give some indication of the industrial countries entering into direct dialogue with CEMA countries on future world economic policy?

[Answer] Well, we have repeated the offer that has been made before. Further work will be done in this respect if possible. No doubts can exist with regard to our preparedness to enter such talks. CEMA knows it too. It is somewhat doubtful, however, that such talks will take place in the near future.

Strauss Skepticism

DW241115 Munich ARD Television Network in German 1935 GMT 23 Jun 80

[Excerpts from Rudolf Muehlfenzel interview with Franz Josef Strauss, chancellor candidate of the CDU/CSU, in the Munich ARD studio--apparently live]

[Text] [Question] What were the most noteworthy points [of the Venice summit] as far as you are concerned?

[Answer] You can forget nearly everything about this Venice summit except the commitment by President Carter and Prime Minister Trudeau to increase oil prices in their countries to current world market levels within a specific period of time. Everything else is but foregone economic conclusions. We have read everything else long ago in all editorials on energy policy carried by the newspapers.

But what is particularly noteworthy to me is that Helmut Schmidt has now again declared in Venice, by his signature, the exact opposite of his actions at home. For, after all, he is the debt chancellor. He is building up a debt potential which has turned into a veritable inflation propellant. After all, our inflation is not 6 percent. They come up with the rate of 6 percent because they have selected the prices quite one-sidedly. If U.S. statistics were applied we would have an inflation rate of 10-12 percent in the Federal Republic.

Or if it is said in Venice that talk about consumption by public authorities should be curtailed to the advantage of future investments, exactly the opposite happens at home. Or if one says that state expenditures must be curtailed and private consumption activated, exactly the opposite has happened since Helmut Schmidt began running the government in 1974. Fine principles are always being announced at summit conferences, great words are being said, and fine commitments are being made. Later on, everything looks completely different.

[Question] How do you assess the spectacular Soviet announcement about the partial withdrawal of their troops from Afghanistan?

[Answer] I warn against being deluded by this maneuver. This statement is similar to Brezhnev's speech in the GDR when he announced the withdrawal of Soviet troops. Nothing has really changed. Fatigued units are being exchanged for others. The West ought to be very careful in this matter.

FRANKFURTER RUNDSCHAU Assessment

DW240957 Frankfurt FRANKFURTER RUNDSCHAU in German 24 Jun 80 p 3

[Rolf-Dietrich Schwartz dispatch from Venice: "Bonn Air at the Summit"]

[Text] In the end, the Venice world economic summit became an economic summit after all. This is how the public sees it anyway. What it really looks like inside is nobody's business.

The seven great powers of the West, with striking quickness, reached agreement on determined statements concerning the hotbeds of crisis in foreign affairs. And they left nothing to be desired in the clarity of their resolutions on the occupation of Afghanistan and on the taking of hostages. Experience with earlier summits indicates that only later on do we see whether the road toward harmony on political issues was rougher than now described.

More complex indeed was the path on which Chancellor Helmut Schmidt and U.S. President Jimmy Carter met. A private meeting set up for the U.S. President was required until the motives and objectives of the Moscow trip elucidated by Schmidt were openly recognized. In the end, Carter now stands as a man who is somewhat slow in grasping complicated interrelationships. This is not particularly becoming to the leadership role claimed.

The course of the discussion on economic and energy policy interrelations does not seem to have been very different. In this respect, too, the chancellor drew attention to the special situation of the Federal Republic with respect to the inflation rate and crude oil consumption. While the United States, despite adverse experience, set its sights on even more ambitious targets of austerity, the Bonn delegation urged qualitative, medium-term, general target figures in energy policy with practical implementation proposals. This is why the Venice final communique's section on energy policy clearly bears German handwriting.

The recommendations concerning a course "away from oil" adopted by the leaders of the seven most important Western industrial states are known in the Federal Republic without exception: The communique mentions the necessity of heat insulation in buildings just as it refers to measures for promoting automobiles with gasoline consumption [as published]. Particularly stressed was the change from oil-heated powerplants to other energy sources for power production. The Federal Government holds a clear lead in this field compared with other countries. By giving "highest priority" to nuclear energy, the German Government chief has achieved some backing in Venice for his discussions at home and in his own party.

The thing in the summit statement that so clearly sounds like a fierce belief in nuclear energy will cause quite some excitement in detailed, routine policy work. The same pertains to other promises in the communique. In Bonn, for example, the ministers and government parties quarrel about the unsolved rate of increase regarding German development assistance. The adoption of new development assistance principles, planned so long ago, still cannot take place because government factions want to act faster than some of their ministers.

North-South relations were discussed in detail, but that does not indicate anything with regard to practical consequences involving finance policy. It was completely different with regard to employment policy which was not discussed at all this time. Had not the Canadian Government chief pointed out the unsolved problem of world unemployment and the still threatening dangers of world recession, one would think, in reading about the Venice results, that the labor market was fully in order. [paragraph continues]

The decrease in state activities to the advantage of the private economic sector--which is considered an urgent matter--clearly demonstrates the conservative image of "the great seven." The belated and excessive expansion program outlined at the Bonn summit 2 years ago, and the present failure with regard to the dangers of recession, demonstrate that the summit stormers are not immune against exaggerations either.

SUEDDEUTSCHE ZEITUNG Editorial

DW240935 Munich SUEDDEUTSCHE ZEITUNG in German 24 Jun 80 p 4

[Editorial by Venice correspondent Franz Thoma: "A Glance From the Summit to Afghanistan"]

[Text] None of the conference participants from the severn greatest industrial countries of the Western world wanted to say "well, well" when the state and government chiefs stated their economic principles which have become well known in the meantime. An exception was made by Edward Muskie in the library hall on San Giorgio Maggiore Island in the Venice lagoon, but in a negative way. The U.S. secretary of state, as a newcomer, was surprised at how "global" and not very detailed the negotiations here were. Nevertheless, the gondola in which Japanese Foreign Minister Okita saw the Western democracies of the eighties sitting was rocking somewhat less to and fro after the world economic summit than it was before.

That was mainly due to the political issues where the summit people showed far less success than in economic matters, as Canada's Trudeau stated with regret. The consultation prior to Schmidt's visit to Moscow was a main purpose and not a sideline of the summit meeting. The federal chancellor has outlined his intentions frankly and impressively; Carter agreed to that. The Soviet announcement of a partial withdrawal of troops from Afghanistan gave the meeting an additional meaning. It gave the seven an opportunity to show cohesion in a reaction that was not weak at all: The withdrawal--"if it will be confirmed"--must be continued until all Soviet troops have been withdrawn. A division of about 12,000 men is supposed to be on its way home. But the participants in the conference have no doubt that the Soviets want to keep Afghanistan in their sphere of influence, and the days of the Karmal regime are probably numbered.

France's President Giscard, the recipient of Moscow's announcement handed over by the Soviet ambassador to Paris and indicating a partial withdrawal of troops prior to the Olympic games--with the idea of changing the opinion of some teams which are not taking part--eventually pointed out to his partners the economic purpose of the meeting. But his draft of a communique, which some participants called a "non-paper" ("nicht-papier"), was not accepted because of its noncommittal and insufficient contents. The 40 points of the paper that was eventually accepted are not particularly exciting either. The atmosphere was good after the purging thunderstorm between Carter and Schmidt; the factual result, however, was meager and unproductive--this is the way in which the fifth world economic summit can be assessed, a summit which was excellently organized by the Italian hosts.

The value of such meetings lies, in any case, more in avoiding things than in actively shaping them. It remains a useful matter to act jointly and not against each other--although this time there were no commitments such as the ones made last year in Tokyo, when the energy policy aims were outlined to save energy, and in 1978 when economic policy guidelines were issued for every country in Bonn. [paragraph continues]

Acting against each other had touched off a world economic crisis in the thirties. Inflation and unemployment, growing trade balance deficits and a threatening relapse into protectionism are dangers for all the seven, and not only for them alone.

All are endangered today, with the exception of the lucky oil countries, and particularly endangered are the developing countries. Therefore, a dialogue between the groups of these countries becomes important. And therefore, energy policy clearly dominated the economic field in Venice. The final communique bears a German imprint, also upon an explicit request by Carter who wants to strengthen his weak position at home by setting as precise targets as possible. This quite relativizes something. Adapting local prices of oil products to the world market level is a hard matter, of course, for almost all consumer countries--but not at all for the Americans and the Canadians.

It is not a coincidence that the seven have voiced the intention to reduce oil as an overall energy source from the present 53 percent to about 40 percent until 1990. The federal chancellor in particular pointed out again in Venice--with his economic judgment that is respected in the circle of the seven--that the world finds it much harder to cope with the oil price increases of 1979 and 1980 than with the increases of 1973 and 1974. Deficit spending would not help avoid recessions and crises any more due to the almost intolerable monetary gains.

The fact that the seven have agreed to such an extent on these and similar problems (or pretend to have agreed), is a positive correction of earlier unfortunate experiences. And yet one must ask oneself whether such a monstrous meeting is necessary as an annual routine matter. Such summit conferences ought to be made dependent on the urgency of the subjects and not on the schedule of appointments because otherwise the spontaneity will be lost. Institutionalization has a crippling effect. Venice demonstrated it already.

BOELLING VIEWS USSR TRADE, SCHMIDT MOSCOW VISIT

LD241853 Hamburg DPA in German 1742 GMT 24 Jun 80

[Text] Baden-Baden--In the view of Government Spokesman Klaus Boelling. trade between the Federal Republic and the Soviet Union serves "not least the strengthening of political cooperation." The government spokesman stressed in an interview with the illustrated paper BUNTE that the aim of the cooperation is to make impossible a repetition of the horrors of the past two wars. Boelling said that Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt is not going to Moscow to negotiate agreements which would be entered into the history books. However, the chancellor is also not going to Moscow to have the PRAVDA editorial read to him. The Federal German delegation has its ideas on what the Soviet Union's contribution in various parts of the world should be in order to lessen acute tensions.

The interview was prereleased in an edited version.

PAPERS COMMENT ON CARTER VISIT TO YUGOSLAVIA

DW250757 Cologne Deutschlandfunk Network in German to East and West Germany 0505 GMT 25 Jun 80

[Press review]

[Excerpt] The AACHEN VOLKSZEITUNG writes: At the grave of the late Marshal Tito the U.S. President placed his hand over his heart.

This motion surely was not any embarrassed reflex or a cheap preacher's gesture. It was more a sign of veneration, the request for forgiveness, and an oath. And the President did have cause and occasion for doing this. The Yugoslavs had missed him in May 1980 when the supreme representatives from 120 states came to Belgrade for Tito's funeral. Peasant peoples particularly watch the guests attending a funeral, and Carter did have amends to make in that respect. The jubilation in Belgrade now showed that the people, too, have accepted this restitution by protocol. The U.S. President, however, had to make even more amends.

BRAUNSCHWEIGER ZEITUNG stresses the following point: It is hard to say whether the displeasure of the Yugoslavs over Carter's failure to participate in the funeral ceremonies for Tito is now over. Yet by his official friendship visit the President has manifested good will to correct his earlier mistake. Even more, he has promised Belgrade unchanged support of independence and territorial integrity. These are decisive passages for which the leadership of the post-Tito era had been waiting and which also are noted with interest in Moscow. The anxiety is only too justified that the Kremlin might some day adopt a threatening attitude in this trouble corner from Austrian-Hungarian imperial times. So they would have to know whether Carter's words have the value of a guarantee declaration or whether this is but one promise among many.

Muenster's WESTFAELICHE NACHRICHTEN advocates the following view: Carter's visit to Belgrade yesterday not only was a belated condolence visit but was much more a political demonstration, albeit a late one. The new men on Save River can very well use such backing. Granted, at the moment nobody believes that the Soviet Union will soon follow up its Afghanistan adventure with another on the Balkan peninsula and launch a coup against Yugoslavia. Yet it is rather definite that it will try to gain influence over Belgrade's foreign policy and domestic development by means of pressure and interference. The West cannot afford at any cost to let neutral Yugoslavia drift away into the wake of Moscow some day. Not only a strategically important key position on Europe's doorstep is at stake. Equally important is the position which the country holds in the world-political parallelogram of forces.

SUEDKURIER of Konstanz points out: Carter is the first important foreign statesman to visit the new men of Yugoslavia. What the American President had to tell the heirs of Tito is much more than all the things that can be read occasionally in the verbose communiques after so-called summit meetings. Carter brought Yugoslavia a rather unambiguous security guarantee with three elements which must not be underrated. Stressing the American interest in Yugoslavia's integrity is not only limited to the borders of the strategically important multinational state, it also involves the independence and unity of Yugoslavia.

HESSISCHE-NIDERSAECHSISCHE ALLGEMEINE of Kassel notes: It is a fact since Tito's visit to the United States in 1978 that the independence and integrity of the communist multi-nation state is also a matter of the West and its leading power. The visitor to Belgrade has again confirmed this informal assistance pact. It does not lose its value due to the fact that Carter is the president for a limited period of time only. Another president would also [words indistinct] to be considered a no 1 security priority. After the Soviet attack on Afghanistan the determination has strengthened not to tolerate any further assaults, let alone make the Balkans a hotbed of crisis.

MITTERRAND OPENS PRESIDENTIAL ELECTION CAMPAIGN

LD241952 Paris Domestic Service in French 1800 GMT 24 Jun 80

[Text] Francois Mitterrand launched the presidential campaign in Paris this afternoon. His press conference, held 48 hours before Valery Giscard d'Estaing's, appeared to be the first skirmish in a duel in which candidate Mitterrand may oppose candidate Giscard d'Estaing in the 1981 presidential elections. The Socialist Party leader said nothing about his intentions regarding the presidency. However, he did present himself as a statesman, addressing himself to a broad review of international affairs and explaining what he called the categorical failure of the policy pursued by the president of the republic over the past 6 years. Leaving aside somewhat the current problems of the hour, the Socialist leader gave priority to the major international problems: those of defense and military alliances. Against the electorate's bad choice, he set the resolution to take the Socialist project to the state level. These were the words used by Francois Mitterrand who, in passing, bestowed the titles of "count of price rises," "duke of technocracy" and "prince of electoralism" on the head of state.

SOVIET WITHDRAWAL OF AFGHAN TROOPS REPRESENTS 'CONCESSION'

[Editorial: "Surprise"]

[Text] According to the explanations given by the Soviet side, the withdrawal of "some units" of the Red Army from Afghanistan has been made possible by the "stabilization" of the situation in that country--however they are still not talking of "normalization"--and by the defeat of big "counterrevolutionary" units. These reasons do not tally with reports gathered in Afghanistan over the past few weeks: Almost all report increased fighting and a hardening of the resistance which has become an entire people's resistance. Furthermore, although the Soviet contingent does not seem to have increased since the beginning of the year, all the indications are that the losses it is suffering are severe and persistent. From the military viewpoint, therefore, the gesture is a surprise.

It is also a surprise from the viewpoint of the diplomatic strategy hitherto adopted by the Kremlin. The proposals put forward by the Kabul regime on 14 May and all the Soviet statements which followed maintained that a halt in foreign interference accompanied by guarantees provided to this end by the United States were the "sine qua non" of a political settlement. It was only after this settlement that a withdrawal of USSR forces could "begin." Are we to believe that the Moscow leaders now think this condition has been met? Obviously not. Even if the aid given by the West to the Afghan rebels has not increased to any considerable extent, it has not been reduced either and we are still as far as ever from a recognition of Mr Karmal's regime by the international community--a condition which the Kremlin nonetheless regards as vital before real negotiations can be opened.

We must therefore go beyong mere tactical motives to understand the USSR's gesture. It has probably struck a nice sensational "blow" coming as it did during the course of the Venice summit and giving Mr Giscard d'Estaing--confirmed as a privileged interlocutor--a "reward" for his meeting with Mr Brezhnev in Warsaw.

However, the benefit is doubtful on this plane since the seven--unanimous in their moral condemnation in the absence of unanimity on sanctions to be applied--immediately adopted a particularly strong statement on Afghanistan. The Kremlin was scarcely more fortunate when it announced the withdrawal of 20,000 of its soldiers from East Germany while NATO was preparing to accept the deployment of the new U.S. missiles; the decision was nonetheless implemented a few weeks later.

There is nothing to stop us from thinking that the gesture will go no further: By giving no figures on the size of the units withdrawn or of the contingent remaining and abstaining from indicating whether the withdrawal is temporary or permanent, Moscow is providing plenty of arguments for the skeptics. Nonetheless, the USSR has taken a decision which does not tally with the situation in the field and represents a concession compared with its previous view of a possible settlement. It seems to be admitting now that the presence of its troops in Afghanistan constitutes a subject of legitimate concern in the world, that there should be negotiations on this point, and that it will have to make unilateral gestures to start such negotiations. However, further efforts will be needed from the Afghanistan resistance and the international community to consolidate what is still far from constituting a success.

LE MONDE VOICES 'SKEPTICISM' OVER VENICE RESULTS

[Editorial: "Skepticism"]

[Text] Political problems for once occupy first place at a summit of the Western world's seven main industrial powers: Afghanistan and relations with the USSR, Iran, Israel and Palestine. The economic fields are apparently to be the object of the 2d day's work of the heads of state and government.

In truth, nobody expected much from this exchange of views. This is almost paradoxical in this 7th year of economic crisis, marked by a deep recession in the United Kingdom (a probable reduction of 3 percent in the British GNP), and a slowing down of activity in France, the FRG, Italy and even Japan, with the automatic worsening of unemployment which that entails: There are expected to be 23 million unemployed by the end of the year throughout the OECD, or an increase of 3 million in 1 year.

This depression, accompanied by a stagnation--or a drop--in the purchasing power of most of the West's citizens is for all that not making inflation yield. On the contrary, the cost of living indexes are beating all records everywhere. While international payments are a little more disorganized each year, the doubling of the price of oil in 1 year is going to increase the OPEC countries' annual revenue by $120 billion, 40 percent of which will be paid by the peoples of the Third World who are quite unable to face it.

In fact, experience has shown that the jointly adopted commitments to nonprotectionism have not prevented reciprocal "cheating" on free trade: national interests first. Just like the promises to reduce oil consumption have proved difficult to keep: Mr Carter, for example, has not succeeded in persuading his Congress to put a tax on crude oil imports. In an uncertain situation--economically, of course, but occasionally electorally, too--everyone steers a tight course without worrying too much about his neighbors' advice, only hoping that the end of other people's misfortunes will improve one's own export chances. You can never be sure of which is worse: If 1981 does not augur well, according to the OECD's experts, 1980 will perhaps not have been so bad as predicted.

It is thus easier to understand the fact that moderation, barely hidden by the solemn phrases of the final communique prepared by the various chancelleries, has been the rule in Venice: a renewal of earlier antiprotectionist oaths; the confirmation that priority has been given to the struggle against inflation; a new appeal to the North-South dialogue; an academic protest against "unjustified" oil price increases (while the demand for crude oil stagnates); a common desire to reduce the share of hydrocarbons in the seven's energy balance from 55 percent to about 40 percent by the end of 1990 (but probably without each country making a definite commitment)...but nothing which may satisfy the West's trade unions who have recently made a joint demand for more resolute action against unemployment and inflation.

Could the seven do better, especially on the two subjects which broadly condition the others: the "recycling" of the tide of petrodollars primarily in the interest of the Third World, and a timetable for reviving lethargic economies to cancel out increasing underemployment? Past disappointments incline one toward skepticism. But can you ever be sure?...

LE MONDE: CEMA RESULTS IMPLY CLOSER INTEGRATION WITH USSR

[Editorial: "CEMA and the Crisis"]

[Text] A decidedly morose atmosphere prevailed at the 3-day meeting of CEMA countries' heads of government in Prague from 17 through 19 June. Beyond formal clauses about "success in the building of socialism and communism," the tone of the debates at this 34th session and of the final communique reflects the serious nature of the economic problems which the socialist countries are having to face. This gives some official confirmation to the crisis which the Eastern bloc is facing too.

It was above all the effects of oil price rises which worried the participants. The main objectives defined, especially by Chairman of the Soviet State Planning Committee Baybakov, are the result of this: Savings must be made on raw materials and labor, the nuclear program stepped up, competitive technologies brought into operation and equipment with lower energy consumption introduced. To attain these objectives, a cooperation agreement--with joint investments in the oil industry and the production of drilling equipment--was signed.

The decisions taken in Prague could well mark a turning point in CEMA's history compared with the past decade, which was characterized by the development of each member state's relations with the Western countries. These decisions, born of necessity--the exit of currency must be curbed--imply a more accentuated overlapping between the economies of the people's democracies and that of the USSR.

This "integration" process, strongly desired by Moscow, does not arouse unanimous enthusiasm. Moreover the session's final communique cautiously indicates that coordination of plans for the 1981-1985 period was ensured "in principle." The reservations--some more explicit than others--can be explained mainly by the need for the East European countries (Hungary and Poland above all) to increase their exports to the West in order to restore their trade balance and pay their foreign debts.

In the short term they must continue to import Western technology and hence not upset the established channels. But how can they reduce imports and increase exports at the same time? These contradictions pose an obstacle to the definition of a new overall CEMA strategy.

Several of Moscow's allies do not intend to cure industrial modernization or, although they are discreet on this subject, to abandon the margin of political freedom which the growth of economic relations with the West gives them. However, in the present economic situation these considerations carry little weight. Furthermore a major agreement on specialization in the computer sphere has been signed; this sector is almost as vital as energy. Mr Kosygin must therefore have been heeded. On the first day of the session he expressed the hope that in establishing its national plans and fixing its trade policies each member of the socialist community would draw the "necessary conclusions" from the U.S. embargo measures.

The energy crisis could even be a godsend for Moscow. Having lost its preferential supply sources in Iran, Romania, for instance, is now forced to urge the USSR to supply it with the crude oil needed to maintain its petrochemicals industry. Bucharest is therefore forced to strengthen its ties with traditional allies and even hopes to be more closely associated in CEMA's industrial projects.

The economic crisis has come on top of the difficulties Bucharest is experiencing in not acknowledging the Kabul fait accompli, which Mr Ceausescu publicly repudiated once again a short time ago.

OLYMPIC PLANS OUTLINED; PARTICIPATION BY MILITARY UNCERTAIN

AU241626 Rome ANSA in English 1545 GMT 24 Jun 80

[Text] Rome, June 24 (ANSA)--About 190 Italian athletes from twenty sports will take part in the Moscow Olympics on July 19-August 3, but they will not take part in the opening parade and they will have no flag or anthem, the chairman of the Italian Olympic Committee (CONI) Franco Carraro told a press conference here today.

But he also warned that the Italian contingent could be slashed by about a third if the athletes who belong to the armed forces are officially banned from going to the games. "If the military are not allowed to take part in the games, we shall not make use of substitutions, Carraro said. "The team will be reduced." "But in some sports, this would create problems. For judo, for example, the whole team is military. Fencing would be cut in half. Then, two of the four members of the European champion team of the 4x100 meters relay are military and there would be problems with the modern pentathlon."

On May 20, CONI left it up to the athletes to decide whether to go to the games, but the Italian Government had earlier come out against participation. The total of 190 does not include the show-jumping team, which has already said it will not go to Moscow, and only three sailing crews will be present.

COSSIGA, TRUDEAU AGREE TO DEVELOP NUCLEAR COOPERATION

AU241632 Rome ANSA in English 1518 GMT 24 Jun 80

[Text] Rome, June 24 (ANSA)--Canadian Prime Minister Pierre Trudeau met here today with Italian Premier Francesco Cossiga for talks in which the two government leaders agreed to develop nuclear cooperation. Flanked by their delegations, Trudeau and Cossiga talked for about an hour and had an ample exchange of views on the seven-nation summit that ended in Venice yesterday.

After the meeting, Trudeau, his eight-year-old son Justin, and a retinue of eight persons went to a private audience with Pope John Paul II at the Vatican City.

In their talks, the two premiers agreed on the basic agreement between the two countries over the major international problems and their mutual interest in intense bilateral cooperation. Apart from the decision on nuclear cooperation, they agreed to promote the periodical exchange of economic and political missions and to rapidly conclude negotiations on an extradition treaty and a consular agreement.

In the fall, contacts will be resumed to review and extend bilateral cooperation on cultural affairs and an agreement on double taxation should come into force as soon as is feasible. Trudeau recalled his meetings with former Premier Giulio Andreotti in Ottawa in 1975 and 1977 and voiced appreciation for the contribution of Italian-born Canadians and Italians to the country's development. In the late morning, Trudeau lunched with head-of-state Sandro Pertini. The Canadian premier flies to London tomorrow.

PAJETTA REACTS TO NOVOYE VREMYA CRITICISM

LD241115 Milan L'UNITA in Italian 20 Jun 80 pp 1, 16

[Unattributed report on statement by PCI Directorate member Gian Carlo Pajetta: "Pajetta Replies to NOVOYE VREMYA"]

[Text] Rome--We asked Comrade Pajetta for an initial statement in connection with the NOVOYE VREMYA Article [published in the Western Europe section of the 19 June USSR DAILY REPORT, p G 4].

Comrade Pajetta, who did not rule out the possibility of himself or others returning to the arguments raised by the article and by the comments prompted by it in the Italian press, told us: "These are serious issues; our thought and steadfastness must be defended and maintained and this implies not remaining silent about an article which must have a meaning--but without dramatizing it and especially without superficial spitefulness, which would not facilitate an understanding of the real issues and stances.

"In a way, the NOVOYE VREMYA article proves this. The article seems strange indeed, containing, as it does, questions such as the following: 'The world is now the arena of a formidable struggle between progress and reaction, between the forces of socialism and the forces of imperialism. Well, on which side is Comrade Pajetta in this battle?' And NOVOYE VREMYA believes it is answering this question by stating that my interview indicates that I am not a 'champion of progress, socialism, detente and peace.' The verdict that it presumes to issue on the basis of an interview is certainly summary, or we could indeed say hasty and simplistic, but it does not prompt me to make any retrospective autobiographical considerations. Nor can the article, precisely because of its nature, now give an illustration of our party's international and internationalist policy. This time period has been defined by our party Central Committee and National Committee and announced publicly even in Beijing, at the press conference attended by 160 journalists including, of course, Soviet journalists as well.

"I will therefore limit myself to discussing the DER SPEIGEL interview, in which I made a very clear reply.

"'We want peace,' I told the journalist, who was trying to draw political conclusions--which I do not accept--about our condemnation of the Soviet intervention in Afghanistan.

"Wanting peace and detente has meant proposing a moratorium on both sides on the issue of the missiles in Europe to start and advance negotiations on guaranteeing and controlling the balance so as to begin a gradual but as rapid as possible reduction of nuclear and conventional weapons.

"We did not go to Paris and we explained that to have done so would not, in our opinion, have increased our chances of making an effective contribution but would have provided adversaries with a pretext and worried possible allies in our country. This is why we said 'no' and why we also said 'no' to the way in which the meeting was presented almost in take-it-or-leave-it terms, without any useful prior discussions which, in our opinion, could have prompted us to attempt other more productive initiatives. 'But which side is Pajetta on?' For a start, on the side of the Communist deputies in the Italian Parliament who were not afraid to vote against accepting the missiles in Europe, just as they are now not afraid to say that we must negotiate at once: that the condemnation of the Brussels decision and the decision itself cannot be regarded as the end of a struggle or of a debate on disarmament which we want and must continue so as to reach very different conslusions.

"Apart from the polemical observations, which I would certainly not judge as unacceptable, although polemical observations (not only other people's) are not always apt, there are two other aspects.

"The first concerns the visit to China. Must we repeat something which I have already repeated to DER SPIEGEL, namely, that the visit was not directed against anyone else and did not imply approval of polemics and definitions, our disagreement of which we did not conceal from the Chinese Communists.

"In Beijing we discussed detente and peace. It would be ingenuous of NOVOYE VREMYA to believe that we praised the Chinese missiles: Ours was a visit of peace and could not have been otherwise. Are we perhaps ingenuous in persisting in the belief that war is not inevitable, even now that it threateningly does not seem impossible?

"We issued a positive verdict on our visit to China and on our talks there and we believe that its developments can also be positive--for peace, progress, and peaceful coexistence, including coexistence among socialist countries.

"The second and last issue concerns the possible, necessary and useful meetings with the other communist parties, even in countries where they govern. Can we hold such meetings even if we judged the Paris meeting to be inopportune? Of course--every time it seems necessary to ask my opinion or the party's opinion. It is merely a matter of looking at our party's policy and our work.

"Our internationalism and participation in international solidarity are unquestionable. Indeed, for the sake of greater precision we are willing to talk with everyone, to make and to seek contributions to socialist progress, peace and international solidarity. In recent weeks we have met with Yugoslav Communists, comrades from the SED [Socialist Unity Party of Germany] and comrades from the Polish United Workers Party. We are--as I thought the NOVOYE VREMYA comrades would know--about to meet with the CPSU.

"I had to answer and I have tried to do so without exacerbating the tone of a debate which could be useful and which is perhaps necessary. I would like to point out to CORRIERE DELLA SERA which, through I know not what kind of distortion, sees an obvious sarcasm in the fact that the Soviet magazine calls me 'Comrade Pajetta' every time, that there is not sarcasm on my part in calling the NOVOYE VREMYA editorial staff 'comrades.' The fact that we are comrades, however, does not mean that we will never write articles, even an article which certainly shows no desire for further reflection--not on my interview (which was in any case badly translated into Italian by TASS, which turns 'links' into 'chains' and ascribes to me assertions which are obvious and even ingenuous distortions) but not even on our policy and our links with the international movement."

OFFICIAL CLAIMS 'INTACT' EC SUPPORT FOR ENTRY

LD241547 Lisbon DIARIO DE NOTICIAS in Portuguese 15 Jun 80 p 3

[Cesar Faustino dispatch: "EC Maintains Support for Portugal's Entry"]

[Excerpts] Stockholm--"I am convinced that the frank support for its application for membership which Portugal has received from the outset from all the EC members remains intact, and I can see no signs of any of those countries having backed down from that initial stance." Portuguese Secretary of State for European Integration Dr Rui de Almeida Mendes, who headed Portugal's delegation to the EFTA Ministerial Council meeting which concluded yesterday in Stockholm, told Swedish National Radio.

Declaring himself absolutely convinced that Portugal's entry into the Common Market will become a reality, Almeida Mendes commented that the EC has always declared itself open to all European countries with democratic structures, continuing:

"I believe that this fact will remain intact in the future and that the EEC states will not back down from their already firmly undertaken pledges."

President Giscard d'Estaing's Statements

However--the interviewer interrupted--President Giscard d'Estaing's recent statements seem to have caused some disappointment to Portugal's aspirations. How do you interpret them?

"I believe that these statements by President Giscard should instead be interpreted as seeking to draw attention to the EC's internal problems, which must be resolved, and even before Portugal enters it. The EEC cannot undergo a crisis as great as this again over the next few years. Suffice it to emphasize that this is the first time that agricultural prices have been fixed since the campaign began and that the problem of the British contribution has still not been completely resolved. What was reached was a compromise. There are still certain clouds, certain points of indecision with respect to the future, and for this reason it is of the utmost importance for Portugal that the EC should resolve its internal difficulties, since we wish to enter an EEC which is strong and dynamic and not in a state of crisis. But I believe that this effort to resolve the Common Market's internal problems can be continued in conjunction with our negotiations without, therefore, having grounds for delaying Portuguese membership."

OREJA DISCUSSES ENTRY INTO NATO WITH CONGRESS

LD241800 Madrid Domestic Service in Spanish 1200 GMT 24 Jun 80

[Text] This morning the minister of foreign affairs, Marcelino Oreja, addressed the congress' Foreign Affairs Committee to report on the government's position on the possible entry of Spain into NATO. The minister began his address by saying that the subject of national security could not be treated in isolation, but had to be approached in solidarity with those countries which share our own values. Oreja set forth the possibilities which Spain could theoretically adopt for its defense. He discounted the standpoint of nonalignment and neutrality and said he was in favor of an autonomous, European defense system although this, he said, is for the time being pure illusion. Finally, he said that the government advocates our entry into the Atlantic Alliance. We cannot, he said, identify ourselves with the West and yet want to have nothing to do with its security.

The minister of foreign affairs again stressed that our entry into NATO would only come about if the problem of Gibraltar was on the way to being resolved and if there was European solidarity towards Spain on entry into the EEC. Although they are different processes, he said, the absence of European solidarity on the subject of the Common Market would prevent our entry into NATO.

With regard to the parliamentary groups which then spoke, their standpoints were against entry into NATO, except that of the Democratic Coalition (CD). The government's position was accused of mortgaging the national independence and of raising the question at an inopportune time, given the fact that our country will host the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe in a few months time. It was also said that our entry into the Atlantic Treaty could upset the balance between the two great blocs.

These points were refuted by the minister of foreign affairs, who, on the other hand, distinguished between our entry into NATO and our adherence to the Atlantic Treaty. The latter is almost a mere statement of principles by which, according to the minister, the signatory countries promise to consider an aggressive act towards one as an aggressive act toward them all. The former--entry into NATO--means participation in the military apparatus of the Atlantic organization, which would obviously have to be negotiated.

Finally, mention must be made of the announcement made by Mr Yanez, spokesman for the Socialist group, that if the decision to join NATO is made in parliament his party will revoke that decision when it has a parliamentary majority. If the decision is made by referendum, the Spanish Socialist Workers Party [PSOE] will respect the outcome and will not try to modify it afterwards. The PSOE spokesman emphasized that his party is against Spanish entry into NATO, although this does not mean that they are against NATO.

INTERIOR MINISTRY ISSUES NOTE ON ETA THREAT

LD241828 Madrid Domestic Service in Spanish 1600 GMT 24 Jun 80

[Excerpts] The Interior Ministry has issued a note on the measures to be adopted in the light of the ETA [Basque Fatherland and Liberty] politico-military wing's intention to explode bombs in Spanish tourist areas. The note announces special measures to be taken at airports, beaches, sports clubs and similar places and intensified action against terrorism. The government will transfer members of the ETA politico-military wing, whose names were included in the statement issued by the terrorist organisation, to jails away from the Basque Country. The note finally says that the Spanish Government has asked the French Government to adopt measures in the control of ETA politico-military wing leaders who enjoy freedom of movement on French territory.

Anti-ETA Reprisals Threatened

LD242308 Madrid Domestic Service in Spanish 2200 GMT 24 Jun 80

[Summary] In a telephone call tonight to the Vizcaya daily DEIA, a person identifying himself as a spokesman of the Basque-Spanish Battalion announced that the group will plant bombs in the tourist areas of Vizcaya and Guipuzcoa if the ETA politico-military wing carries out its announced campaign in the Levant [Mideastern Mediterranean coast] and Andalucia. The caller said they would warn the town halls in places where the bombs will be planted 1 hour before they explode. Basque journalist circles believe the communique to be authentic.

CARRILLO URGES COOPERATION WITH PSOE IN 16 JUN SPEECH

LD241531 Madrid MUNDO OBRERO in Spanish 17 Jun 80 pp 2-3

[Unattributed report on PCE Secretary General Santiago Carrillo 16 June address to PCE Central Committee meeting in Madrid: "National Alternative Based on Leftwing Unity"]

[Text] PCE Secretary General Santiago Carrillo began his speech by explaining that he would be concentrating on certain essential aspects of the present political situation and would end with the issue of Spain's NATO membership, raised by Marcelino Oreja.

"The political debate in the Cortes," he said, "has shown three things clearly: On the one hand, the Suarez government's inability to deal with the fundamental problems of this phase; second, its minority position in the chamber of deputies and throughout the country, which increased in last Thursday's vote; and last, the need for another government and another policy."

"Basically," he pointed out, "these are assertions which our party has been making in one form or another at various times since the June 1977 elections. The entire process of change has suffered as a result of this government situation and the need to find a solution to it is now much more pressing."

Next he described how the Communist parliamentary group in May 1978 opposed within the Constitutional Committee the so-called constructive censure motion which now enables Suarez and his team to survive with great difficulty, though during the debate on the censure motion there was a majority against the government.

Suarez Lacks Willingness to Reflect

"Despite the apparently humble and self-critical tone with which Suarez promised to begin a period of reflection," the Communist leader said, "in fact we can see no willingness to keep this promise." He criticized the fact that at the Andalusian Union of the Democratic Center [UCD] congress the course laid down for autonomy in article 151 of the Constitution was blocked and that the idea of autonomies handed down from above was maintained, just as before the censure motion. The same stubbornness on the UCD's part was apparent in the voting on the referendum bill, which the government won by a single vote, "thanks to the blameworthy attitude of the Basque Nationalist Party."

Next he examined "what lies behind Suarez' obstinacy," indicating that the prime minister and his government act under the influence of an extraparliamentary power center composed of the vestiges of Francoism in the state apparatus, the economic apparatus and various forms of ideological apparatus, which are hindering the entire democratic process. [paragraph continues]

"As with other aspects of the transition," he said, "the aim is to carry out the least possible decentralization and to do so in such a way that this traditional power center will maintain intact all its positions within the state."

State of Autonomies

Therefore, the creation of a real democratic state of autonomies is needed which will satisfactorily embrace the real differences of the people which make up Spain and which will prevent not so much territorial division, but the country's political division into a welter of canton-oriented mutually exclusive positions, which is the real danger of the policy being pursued by the government and the right as a whole. The creation of this state of autonomies inevitably demands "a change of government and a change of policy," Santiago Carrillo stressed.

Economic Crisis

Apart from these, he listed other, no less serious, arguments. First, the gravity of the economic crisis, in which we are witnessing the reemergence of protectionist tendendies in the developed countries, which are even hindering Spain's Common Market membership. He called for a policy of greater clarity in EEC negotiations and responsible participation in all the national sectors affected. "Although," he said, "our entry into political Europe must take place as soon as possible, it must be carried out with all the necessary precautions and time to prevent it placing a further burden on our economy."

Next he pointed out how the national economic picture is still troubling, now that investments have reached their lowest ebb. Government measures theoretically designed to encourage investment have caused increased unemployment and a drop in earned income and therefore a further decline in demand. The crisis is eliminating the possibilities of foreign markets and this in turn is eliminating the incentives for investment.

Role of Public Enterprises

In Santiago Carrillo's opinion, the one thing that can break this vicious circle is public investment, which, however, is being suppressed because of the big businessmen's fear that public enterprise will end up playing a more decisive role, different from what it now plays in the Spanish economy.

Next he criticized the fact that traditional capitalist criteria are still being applied to what is not an ordinary cyclical crisis, through the course outlined by the workers statute, and the framework agreement could lead to Spain having 3 million unemployed by 1983. In fact only public enterprise, on the basis of planned criteria and objectives and even using foreign credit, can create jobs and achieve a degree of reactivation of the economy.

"We believe," he explained, "that the alternative that we are pressing for and at the same time formulating in increasingly specific terms on the problems of the crisis must have its strongest foundation in an understanding within the left, particularly between Socialists and Communists, which we should promote by studying these topics in a more coordinated way."

National Alternative

But, Santiago Carrillo said, the proposed alternative is not a leftwing, but a national alternative dictated by our specific position on the world economic scene and our true level of economic development. [paragraph continues]

He stressed that to deal with the crisis, the state, "embracing not only central administration but also the autonomous and municipal bodies, must play a much more prominent role in economic life."

For this alternative to be feasible the labor and cultural forces must take on a role which they do not now have in the leadership of society. "Our entire policy of democratic concentration," he pointed out, "was aimed at precisely this end." He recalled that this policy clashed with the opposition of the politicosocial right, but also with the incomprehension of the Spanish Socialist Workers Palrty [PSOE] comrades, who believed in a two-party system and that a solution could only be achieved by means of their government alternative.

PSOE-PCE Convergences

A new element in the present situation is the appearance in public opinion of Socialists and Communists who agree on a comprehensive approach to Spanish politics which has created a real hope of change. "It has become clear that a majority different from the present one is impossible without Communist participation."

The progressive forces apart from the PSOE and PCE which exist in our country can be won over by the evident failure of the right together with the acuteness of the sociopolitcal problems and also by the force of attraction that an understanding between Socialists and Communists would exert.

While indicating the risks that such an option might represent, however, Santiago Carrillo recalled the history of relations between Communists and Socialists, during which there have been periods of conflict and periods of unity. He also recalled the pressure which the Spanish right has exerted ever since the change began on the PSOE to discourage it from any kind of cooperation with the PCE.

He pointed out how throughout history we Communists have supported more than one government headed by the PSOE "and we are willing to do so again when the right conditions for it exist."

The present difference of strength between the PSOE and the PCE does not create any inferiority complex in the latter. "Our real strength," Carrillo pointed out, "lies in our firm roots in the most combative and dynamic sector of the working class, in the support of very powerful intellectual groups and in our attachment to the theory of revolutionary Marxism from a critical and creative stance."

He explained his confidence that the PSOE-PCE rapprochement will not lose either party any votes, but earn them more.

Within this unitary perspective, however, he pointed to the stance of the Socialists, who have not yet replied to the Communist proposal to jointly examine the situation and its possible developments.

Another area in which Socialists and Communists can advance together, he said, is the peace struggle.

Foreign Policy Convergences

"Both parties," he said, "are opposed to entry into NATO or any military bloc and in favor of eliminating the blocs policy.

"We oppose some countries' military intervention into other countries' affairs and therefore we oppose the Afghan occupation; we favor Common Market entry and the establishment of special relations with the Third World; a new world economic order; negotiations to relieve both sides of Europe of their nuclear weapons; a policy of peace in the Mediterranean and support for the POLISARIO Front, the PLO, and so forth. Both parties are convinced that a policy inspired by these principles can help Spain secure an important national position more favorable to its interests.

"Why," he asked, "are we Spanish Socialists and Communists unable--through no fault of our own--to take the initiative in this dialogue for which both our parties are in a better position than other European parties?"

Proposals to PSOE

"In fact," he said at another juncture, "our proposals to the PSOE at present could consist of comparing both parties' stances on the following topics:

1--How to develop political action with a new majority, by a new government and what form these will take in the coming months;

2--How to extricate the autonomy processes from the standstill which they have reached as a result of the Suarez government's attitude;

3--The possibilities of international action to facilitate dialogue among the parties of the European workers movement for the sake of peace and very specifically for the success of the CSCE conference due to be held in the fall in Madrid; and

4--Last--though on account of its scale, perhaps the foremost and most fundamental issue--what should our two parties do to mobilize public opinion and to prevent the government from implementing its plans to have Spain join NATO?

We cannot understand why the General Union of Workers opposes the workers' commissions' entry into the European Trade Union Confederation, to which the Italian General Confederation of Labor already belongs. This can only be conceived on the basis of a principle of sectarian narrowness which does no credit to those who uphold it.

Progressive Majority

"The existence of a joint strategy and an understanding is also essential to achieve broad and powerful mobilizations of the masses which will have a real influence on the country's orientation and which will be something more than the mobilization of a vanguard. But I would also like to add that a joint leftwing strategy, an advance toward positions more favorable to the workers at present, does not imply splitting the country into two blocs, one left and one right. Nothing could be further from our intentions than to create such a situation now; furthermore, it would definitely not favor the lift. A joint leftwing strategy can and must--as we see it--imply the creation of a progressive majority that will tackle the crisis on the basis of the principle of national solidarity, inspired not by the interests of the major oligarchical groups but by the interests of the popular and national sectors, ranging from the working class to businesses not dominated by the banks [no enfrentada en la banca]--a majority which will loyally implement the Constitution both with regard to the autonomy processes and with regard to respect for civil rights and a policy of really democratic public order which will determinedly undertake the reform of state administration and implement a foreign policy of peace and nonalignment.

"This would be an agreement for progress limited in time until the 1983 elections and in its objectives; in this agreement we would have to seek the cooperation of nationalist and regionalist sectors and also forces within the UCD. I will make no predictions regarding whether this would necessitate a split in the UCD. What I do believe is obvious is that the course presently being imposed by Prime Minister Suarez is incompatible with a policy of this kind.

"The government has suffered a major political and moral defeat, but it is still standing and we do not regard it as fallen. The opposition has made an arrogant show of its strength but has also revealed this strength's limits of duration. Unless the opposition surmounts its present weaknesses and devotes itself to formulating a realistic alternative and to securing broad popular support for it, if it merely concerns itself with temporary effects still undecisive in their scope, it can expect a counteroffensive from the government which would not be without risks."

NATO and Rightwing Counteroffensive

"Today," Carrillo said at another point, "we can already witness this counteroffensive taking shape in the Chamber of Deputies, because the initiative to make Spain join NATO in 1981 had been rumored but had never been asserted so definitely before. The attempt to portray the differences among this country's political forces not as they emerged from the parliamentary debate but in a different form--as between Atlanticists and non-Atlanticists--is, I believe, the beginning of Suarez' political counteroffensive. It is an attempt to break the agreements, the convergences that emerged during the debate and to create a different alignment for or against NATO.

"And this implies not only the danger of a policy of agreement with the democratic coalition and of a further rightward swing in the government's general policy: It also implies the dangers that some allies whom we have had in the political discussions and debate and who appeared to be possible allies for a change of policy will falter and backtrack as they embark on this new topic of Atlanticism and that this will effectively create a different correlation of political forces, another dynamic different from the one which generated the stance behind the censure motion."

In the final part of his speech the Communist leader stressed the topic of the party's political and organizational strengthening.

"In a society such as our present one," he said among other things, "which creates a bourgeois ideology and, more specifically--after 40 years of fascism--an anticommunist ideology, the process of building the Communist Party will not take place spontaneously, but only through a tenacious and steadfast struggle to which we must devote all our strength....In order for us to be a party of struggle and of government, which is how we describe ourselves, all our cadres must devote part of their attention to party training and internal work.

"We must remedy this situation if we want to contest the 1983 elections in such a way as to be able to take a leap forward in our parliamentary representation and to carry greater weight in the correlation of political forces."

SAUDI ARABIA'S YAMANI HOLDS TALKS ON ENERGY

Sees Norwegian Role as 'Contact'

LD241019 Oslo AFTENPOSTEN in Norwegian 18 Jun 80 p 4

[Svenn R. Helskog report: "Norway Could Be Good Contact With the Industrialized Nations"]

[Text] "I have a feeling that relations between Saudi Arabia and Norway could grow even stronger." Saudi Arabia's Oil Minister Shaykh Ahmad Zaki Yamani expressed himself in optimistic words when he began to talk about the role Norway could play, not only in relations between the two countries but also as a link between the oil-producing countries within OPEC and the industrialized nations.

Oil and Energy Minister Bjartmar Gjerde warned against the belief that Norway could play a dominant role in such a context.

"We have a foot in each camp and could pass on views to both sides, but I do not want people to be too optimistic about our ability to perform miracles in such a role," Minister Gjerde said.

On Monday evening Yamani met with representatives of Norwegian industry. There are no expectations of immediate concrete results from such meetings, but they do create contacts and understanding. On Tuesday, Yamani discussed a number of political questions with Foreign Minister Knut Frydenlund. Even though there have been no official announcements about this meeting, there is every reason to believe that the situation in the Middle East was at the top of the agenda.

During his talks with Minister Gjerde, Yamani said that he was relatively well satisfied with the results that have been achieved in the West in terms of saving energy. As an energy producer Norway is not that important in the international context and there is no indication either that Yamani has given Gjerde any "mild reprimand," even though Norway lets the price of North Sea oil follow that of the most expensive North African oils.

When asked what he considers most important in discussions with the Norwegian authorities, Yamani replied that all matters are of equal importance. Both Yamani and Gjerde seem to attach great importance to the benefits derived from reciprocal information, but the Norwegian system of controls over the oil companies and the specifically Norwegian norm price system seem to be of interest to the Saudi Arabian oil minister.

On Wednesday Yamani will meet with Prime Minister Nordli before he travels to north Norway to look at the midnight sun and to fish with Ministers Gjerde and Evind Bolle. On Thursday morning he will travel on to Stavanger, where he will be Statoil's guest.

In Stavanger Yamani will have a closer look at the concrete legs and the deck of the Statfjord B platform. His visit to Norway will end Friday.

Meets With Nordli

LD241021 Oslo AFTENPOSTEN in Norwegian 19 Jun 80 p 4

[NORSK TELEGRAMBYRA report: "Energy a Main Topic for Yamani and Nordli"]

[Text] The international energy situation and the relationship between the oil-exporting countries and the industrialized nations were the main topic during the meeting between Saudi Arabian Oil Minister Ahmad Zaki Yamani and Prime Minister Odvar Nordli Wednesday morning. "Both sides are coming more to an understanding that the energy crisis cannot be solved by confrontations," said Yamani, according to NORSK TELEGRAMBYRA.

Prime Minister Nordli pointed out that Norway is interested in playing a more active role in the work of starting a constructive dialogue between the oil producers, the oil consumers and the developing countries that do not produce any oil themselves.

Yamani said that he is more optimistic now than he was earlier about the prospects of cooperation between the OPEC nations and the industrialized countries.

He is also of the opinion that talks in the so-called North-South dialogue are now characterized by a much better atmosphere, NORSK TELEGRAMBYRA reports.

The talks with Nordli marked the end of Yamani's 3-day official visit to Norway. After lunch with Energy Minister Bjartmar Gjerde Yamani travelled to Stamsund in Lofoten for a private visit together with Gjerde and Fishery Minister Eivind Bolle.

Yamani, who is chairman of the committee within OPEC that is to work out a proposal for a long-term strategy for the organization, discussed this work, too, at his meeting with Nordli. The committee is planning a system of quarterly oil price adjustments dependent on price trends in the industrialized nations, variations in important rates of exchange and economic growth in the industrialized countries.

The committee has also discussed OPEC's attitude to those developing countries which have no oil and to the industrialized nations in the West.

During the talks the situation in the Middle East, affairs in Afghanistan and Iran and the present detente situation were also touched upon.

After the visit to Stamsund Yamani will travel to Stavanger on Thursday where he will be the guest of Statoil. His return to Saudi Arabia has been moved up forward from Friday to Thursday evening.

THE DAILY TELEGRAPH VIEWS SUMMIT ISSUES

Scores France

LD231147 London THE DAILY TELEGRAPH in English 23 Jun 80 p 16

[Editorial: "Kremlin Serenade"]

[Text] For the second time in half a year, we are bidden to welcome Soviet troop withdrawals. When Russian troops stationed in East Germany were moved to replace formations poised to attack Afghanistan, this newspaper courted abuse as a "cold warrior" from the left and its pseudo-liberal camp-followers by pointing out that, so long as some Soviet armies remained in their European satellites, partial withdrawal was wholly meaningless. Exactly the same holds good for Afghanistan. Six months ago, Russians invaded that country and imposed Soviet rule, using the most brutal methods. Until they withdraw, bag and baggage, taking their Afghan puppets with them, nothing will have changed. The leaders of the seven nations gathered at Venice are to be applauded for making this clear.

That Moscow should attempt to deceive world opinion is not novel. That the president of France should apparently have been taken in, even if only for a moment, deserves comment. The painful truth is that, apart from a post-war honeymoon, when France was largely governed by committed Europeans, French policy has been characterised by a form of national self-assertion which too often degenerated into ambiguity, perversity and sheer negativity, apparently to assuage deep-rooted complexes. Anything to harm the Americans and British (in that order), or to indicate France's power to thwart her Allies' schemes, seems to have become an objective in its own right for the Elysee and Quai d'Orsay.

In gratuitously stirring up trouble in Quebec and Mexico; in hindering military cooperation; in benevolence towards international terrorism; in helping to bring down the shah; in subtly undermining the Western stand against Soviet expansionism and in trying to damage American partnership with Europe--the French have been acting with short-sighted pettiness: For their own survival depends on a strong united West. If they succeed in tripping us up, they fall with us. We must hope that this has been brought home most strongly in Venice, braving the horror of a few Whitehall sycophants. The declaration on Afghanistan suggests that it may have been.

Areas of Disagreement Remain

[Richard Beeston and Alan Osborn dispatch: "Summit Ignores Foreign Policy Differences"]

[Excerpts] Venice--In spite of broad agreement on inflation and energy, the Venice economic summit left some question marks over how successful President Carter had been in establishing his leadership of the Alliance.

The summit, seen as an opportunity for Mr Carter to assert his authority in his attempt for re-election this year, ended yesterday with a lengthy declaration on world economic problems and a strong denunication of the Soviet military invasion of Afghanistan.

But these gains for Mr Carter were purchased at the cost of ignoring the existence of some basic differences in foreign policy between the Western countries.

The most conspicuous was the Middle East, which was not even discussed with any seriousness, because of the known divergence of views between America and Europe.

Moreover, the summit declaration of Afghanistan, while stronger than expected and praised warmly yesterday by Mrs Thatcher, will not have gone as far as the Americans would have liked ideally in that it had no mention of embargoes and contained no fresh language or commitment on an Olympic games boycott.

It also emerged at this seven-nation summit that there are differing views within the Alliance on how seriously to regard the Soviet troop withdrawal announcement from Afghanistan made at the weekend.

At the close of yesterday's meeting, Mrs Thatcher described the withdrawal as "small," but French President Giscard d'Estaing said it was "significant."

The decision of the summit not to discuss the Middle East follows hard on last week's agreement by the Common Market governments in Venice to bring the PLO into the future negotiations on a peace settlement.

This runs directly against Mr Carter's Camp David peace initiative and although initial American response, at least at official level, to the EEC move has been relatively restrained, it was clearly felt yesterday that to avoid a head-on clash, the delegates should ignore the Middle East issue.

In fact, it came up only at a dinner-time discussion.

A British source said: "The Middle East has not proved a problem. Nor is it a matter that has given rise to significant controversy."

Mrs Thatcher explained the absence of a Mideast debate on the fact that the conference was really an "economic summit"--despite the fact that it was dominated by the political issue of Afghanistan.

Moreover, other non-economic issues included hijacking and the American hostages in Iran, brought formal declarations. But they merely reiterated the known positions of the countries concerned and there was very little real debate on them.

KLIRIDHIS URGES GOVERNMENT RESIGNATION AT RALLY

NC250945 Nicosia I SIMERINI in Greek 25 Jun 80 pp 5, 7

[Text of speech by Democratic Rally Chairman Glavkos Kliridhis at 24 June Nicosia rally]

[Excerpts] Cypriot people: I asked to be given time on the radio and television in order to brief you on the really crucial situation facing our country. They refused to grant me this time. They thought that they would prevent the people from learning the truth. This is why we have called you to this rally.

First of all, however, I would like to warn you--and I do warn you with full awareness and sense of the dangers--that the final hour has come. We cannot afford any more time or tolerance as we slide toward catastrophe. I repeat that now is the final hour, that we must struggle to save or be saved. Now is the time for all of us to mobilize ourselves in order to turn from the brink of the abyss to which they have led us and into which we may fall.

Cypriot people: I warned you in the past and they insulted me. I know that they will also insult me now. Insults are used by those who do not have an argument. I will not be intimidated by threats and insults. I will not fail to carry out my duty. I place the salvation of the country above everything.

I have warned you, Cypriot people, that the government formed by Mr Kiprianou was impotent to handle the serious domestic and foreign problems of the country.

I ask you: Is there anybody today who can or dares to say that the Kirpianou government is capable and should not resign? Moreover, even the AKEL leadership, which promoted and supported Mr Kiprianou and his government, is compelled today to dissociate its responsibilities in order to avoid the people's wrath and outcry.

We do not merely dissociate our responsibilities in order to save our party interests. We undertake our responsibilities and declare a relentless struggle for the salvation of Cyprus. We call on all the people, irrespective of ideological or party affiliation, to join this historically imperative struggle.

--We will not let the impotent government become the gravedigger of Cyprus and its people. We will struggle for its resignation and removal.

--We will struggle for the election of a capable authority in a democratic manner and without suspicious backstage maneuvers.

--We will struggle for the dissolution of the inconsiderate house of the fictitious majority.

--We will struggle to foil new plots and machinations in the elections.

--We will struggle for meritocracy and the abolition of favoritism so that the principles of true democracy may prevail.

Cypriot people: You struggled in the past for the salvation of Cyprus. I know that you are also ready now to struggle democratically in order to save your country and forestall catastrophe. Cyprus is in danger of vanishing, not only from the power and intransigence of the conqueror; but it is also threatened by the weakness and confusion of an impotent leadership.

Thus, I call on the people to shout "halt!" to the government of mistakes, and to ask it to resign because this is the only service it can render to the people.

I accuse Mr Kiprianou of causing pointless unrest in the Cypriot people and diminishing the prestige of Cyprus both at home and abroad because he trumpeted nonexistent conspiracies, which had been conceived and turned over in his mind. But these conspiracies were dismissed later because there was nothing to substantiate them.

I accuse Mr Kiprianou of being powerless and impotent in implementing his own decisons when he himself diagnosed a weakness in his government and announced publicly that he would carry out a reshuffle.

I accuse Mr Kiprianou of allowing the government treasuries to be depleted and imposing ununbearable tax, which mainly hit the working classes, instead of applying a policy of frugality and austerity in his government.

I accuse Mr Kiprianou, with his indecisiveness and dilatoriness and probably for other reasons, of not taking the necessary measures to prevent and effectively resolve the scandal over the cooperative movement.

I accuse Mr Kiprianou of clumsily handling the national problem.

The Kiprianou government is burdened not only with its present failure, but it is also guilty of deceiving and misleading the people whose confidence it has lost.

I accuse Mr Kiprianou of not implementing the Makarios policy on the Cyprus issue as it was shaped by political decisions taken by the Cabinet and the National Council. Moreover, he has hidden from the public his disagreement with the line of Makarios, whom he used for the background of his preelection poster.

I accuse Mr Kiprianou of precipitous action in rejecting the Western plan, thus relieving the Turkish side of having to accept or reject it at a time when the Turks were asking for major economic aid. With this irresponsible handling, he deprived the Famagusta refugees of great possibilities for returning to their homes on the opening of the negotiations.

Cypriot people: The proven failure and imminent collapse of the Kiprianou Government has given rise and impetus to new backstage moves by persons--without any popular support--who aim to strangle the people's sovereignty by again offering them a put-up president.

I disclose and denounce that these backstage consultations are preparing a new electoral coup against the people.

More specifically, I disclose and announce that the Democratic Rally has also been approached twice by backstage elements:

--In the first case, we were invited to participate and collaborate in the formation of a "supernational council" from which the leftwing would be excluded. This council would constitute a sort of supergovernment. A third person, a member of this council, would be promoted as president of the republic and the council would actually act as his executive branch.

I categorically and unequivocally rejected this proposal; its aim was to abolish the democratic political organization and the people's sovereignty.

I now disclose that the second approach to the Democratic Rally was made last Tuesday. This is the proposal conveyed to us:

If the "pro-Makarios rightwing" collaborates and unites with the Democratic Rally, which is the strongest political party in addition to the leftwing, then:

1. Kiprianou will be forced to resign.

2. Presidential and parliamentary elections will be proclaimed simultaneously.

3. Mr Kliridhis will be elected president of the House of Representatives and a third person will assume the president's office for the rest of Kiprianou's term of office.

4. A government will be formed with equal participation by ministers from the Democratic Rally.

5. A protocol will be drawn up stating that Mr Kliridhis will be the candidate for the next presidential election.

These proposals were accompanied by the following threat:

If this compromise is not made then a third faction will seek and secure cooperation with AKEL, in which case we will again have a president put up by the leftwing with well-known, disastrous results.

I have an answer to these proposals which I will give in public: The Democratic Rally does not seek power through dark backstage activities because it knows that those who are elected by backstage activities are captives of the backstage. Those who rely on the backstage cannot serve the people's interests because it has been repeatedly proved that the interests of the backstage gentlemen clash with the people's interests.

I also disclose that 5 months ago I had a meeting with Mr Azinas [commissioner of the Cooperative Movement] at the house of a mutual friend. Mr Azinas informed me that the AKEL leaders would accept the interlocutor, Mr Ioannidhis, as a presidential candidate if he was promoted by PEK [Pan-Agrarian Union of Cyprus]. Mr Azinas asked to be informed about my views.

I answered then--and I am also answering now, publicly and categorically--that I refuse to support or become an accomplice in any action that would deprive the people of the right of free election and selection.

Cypriot people: For years I have been warning you that it was necessary for the two communities to conduct talks on the substance of the Cyprus problem. For years I have been warning you that the continuous preoccupation with procedural matters would assist the Turkish side in covering up its intransigence internationally. For years I have been warning you that the passage of time is working against us, because it leads to the consolidation of the de facto situation. For years I have been warning you that the "long-term struggle," whose main characteristics are slogans and the collection of resolutions, does not lead to a Cyprus solution.

We must promote our own formula for a Cyprus solution. This formula should enjoy the parallel support of the Western, Eastern and nonaligned quarters.

I analyzed in detail, during a recent speech in Athens, why the securing of such parallel support is possible. My speech in Athens has already been published in the Cypriot press and, therefore, I will not repeat my arguments today.

After securing such parallel support, we must appeal to the Security Council, on the basis of article 37 of the UN Charter, with the aim of having the Security Council make suggestions for a Cyprus solution.

The Turkish intransigence can only be changed when there is parallel pressure from the Western, Eastern and nonaligned worlds in the same direction; and only then will it be possible to conduct constructive and substantive talks to find a Cyprus solution.

Cypriot people:

--I warn you that no problem will be solved unless the Kiprianou government is removed. Every day we will be going from bad to worse.

--I warn you that you have to struggle if you do not want to vanish.

--I warn you that you must not tolerate any more sly backstage activities for electoral coups.

--I call on you not to tolerate a put-up president. You must vote for a capable president.

--I call on the people to undertake their role as a sovereign people and stop being dominated. The people must demand and restore their rights instead of sustaining the injustices, mistakes, scandals, favoritisms and spoils system.

--I call on the people to demand from Mr Kiprianou his immediate resignation; to demand from the House of Representatives its immediate dissolution.

--I call on the people to demand a general change with a capable leadership.

The Democratic Rally is ready to struggle together with everyone in order to save everyone and save the country from the present economic and political bankruptcy.

--Forward, then, in the relentless struggle for democracy, salvation and prosperity.

--Long live the sovereign people.

AKEL CONTINUES ATTACK ON KIPRIANOU POLICIES, OTHER PARTIES

[Text] AKEL's deputy leader Mr Fandis in a speech at Larnaca last night more clearly than any other AKEL statement before said that the divergencies with the president "do not concern merely secondary and trifling matters" but refer to the "line and tactics of the struggle". Mr Fandis accused Mr Kiprianou of not working "consistently" for the resumption of the talks. He also claimed that President Kiprianou "remains orientated essentially to utopian and groundless solutions and is courting other forms of struggle for a Cyprus settlement."

Explaining why the AKEL party could not wait longer in "dissociating" itself from the president, Mr Fandis said that the "weakness, errors and omissions", as he called them, of the president were being exploited not only by the "imperialists" but also by the rightwing [Democratic] Rally "who are engaged in a campaign of destabilisation and anticommunism". Mr Fandis also accused the socialist EDEK party of Dr Lissaridhis of distorting the AKEL motives and intentions, and asserted that Dr Lissaridhis had supported the anticommunist struggle of General Grivas in 1955/59 at the time of the EOKA-B [National Organization of Cypriot Fighters] campaign against British rule. He concluded with a call for "radical qualitative changes" and said that AKEL would be ready for cooperation with "all forces which are prepared to follow consistently the line of the Cabinet and the National Council".

I KATHIMERINI ON GOVERNMENT-U.S. TALKS ON NATO, BASES ISSUE

AT241500 Athens I KATHIMERINI in Greek 24 Jun 80 pp 1, 3

[Excerpts] A meeting which will be critical for the entire range of Greek-U.S. relations will take place this afternoon in Ankara during the regular spring conference of the NATO council. The meeting will be between Greek Foreign Minister K. Mitsotakis and U.S. Secretary of State Muskie.

The Greek Government remains firm on its positions which Mitsotakis will support today, giving priority to the question of our return to NATO's military wing. By contrast, as reported yesterday, the U.S. side appears to give prominence to a prior signing of the agreement on U.S. bases, thus circumventing the NATO issue. The first and preparatory exchange of views on the context of today's meeting was held yesterday during the talks between Mitsotakis and U.S. Assistant Secretary of State Nimetz, which was attended by the secretary general of the Foreign Ministry, Ambassador Theodhoropoulos.

Nimetz expressed the desire of his administration for an immediate commencement of negotiations on the bases. The very same desire will be reiterated today by Muskie.

Yesterday's talks, as well as the meetings which Mitsotakis conducted today in Ankara were discussed yesterday by the government committee which met under the leadership of Prime Minister Rallis. Earlier in the morning, Rallis was received by President of the Republic Karamanlis, whom he briefed on developments and the situation at home. According to existing reports on yesterday's talks with Nimetz, the Americans are in a hurry to promote the Greek-U.S. agreement, with their primary interest being the future of their bases in our country.

The same reports state that Nimetz raised the question of the immediate preparation of the defense agreement between the two countries which, according to him, could also be considered to be a confirmation of Greek good faith for our country's return to NATO so that the Alliance's southeastern flank might function smoothly since the bases will also operate within the NATO framework.

Nimetz let it be understood that the U.S. administration is interested in the immediate commencement of negotiations, which will run parallel to negotiations for the return of Greece to NATO's military wing.

Diplomatic circles observed that it is obvious that this U.S. interest stems from the prospect that the U.S. side would conceivably utilize progress in the base negotiations in order to influence the other issue in which the Greek side is so strongly interested.

As is already known, the Greek Government has completed its study of the U.S.-Turkish agreement and reached certain conclusions which--of necessity--are permitted by the unclassified documents available to it and which are made up of a main agreement, three executive agreements and 13 appendices on the 21 U.S. bases which are operating in Turkey.

In its negotiations with the U.S. administration, however, the Greek Government will also give consideration to its ignorance of and the fact it can only theorize the contents of the secret protocols included in the U.S.-Turkish agreement, as well as to certain facts which have become known to the Greek government about Turkish participation in the collection of information guaranteed to them under their new agreement with the United States. This collection of information could involve other areas, not only the north or even the nonfriendly countries of the broader Middle Eastern area.

The U.S. side apparently appears prepared to adjust, in collaboration with our own country, the 1977 defense agreement on the basis of the new facts of the agreement it has signed with Turkey.

The old Greek proposal for the signing of a nonaggression pact between Greece and Turkey was reiterated by Greek Foreign Minister Mitsotakis in yesterday's exclusive interview which he granted to the Turkish newspaper MILLIYET.

I VRADHINI SCORES FRG EMBASSY STATEMENT ON TURKISH AID

AT241530 Athens I VRADHINI in Greek 24 Jun 80 pp 1, 2

[Editorial from the "Evening" column: "Wrong Direction"]

[Text] The announcement of the German Embassy in Athens which attempts to justify the decision of the Bundestag to grant special military aid in the amount of 600 million marks to Turkey and 60 million marks to Greece, does not state things correctly.

Without a doubt the stabilization of NATO's southern flank is to the interest of all its members, including Greece and Turkey. We fail to understand, however, why this argument is directed against us. It is Ankara's objections which have so far prevented the reattachment of Greece to the unified military structure of the Alliance and the German recommendations about contributing to the stabilization of the southern flank should be directed toward Ankara.

At the same time we do not believe that Bonn thinks that it is truly facilitating a restoration of unity in this flank by granting special military aid to Turkey which is 10 times greater to that which it grants to our country. In contrast, such discrimination at the expense of Greece creates bitterness among the Greek public which makes every relevant effort only more difficult.

Nor is the argument that the special German military aid will be utilized only for fulfilling obligations within NATO limits anymore convincing. U.S. military materiel was supplied to Turkey under the very same prerequisites but this did not prevent our neighboring country from using it to invade, conquer and occupy 40 percent of the Cypriot territory, a fact which forced the U.S. Congress to enforce, even though for only 2 or 3 years , some type of "embargo" on the supply of U.S. weapons.

The conclusion, therefore, that the Federal Government and the Bundestag do not consider the balance of power between partners to be disturbed, has no foundation. Preservation of this balance of power was repeatedly accepted in the past by the Federal Government, the Bundestag, Chancellor Schmidt himself and all the other West German leaders. Even recently, West German Finance Minister Matthoefer assured us that Greek sensitivity toward this issue would be taken into consideration.

What happened to overcome all of this? The German announcement provides no answer to this understandable question of the Greek people who are curious,infuriated and wondering how it is possible for Bonn to evaluate Greek-German friendship and cooperation in such a way. The mistake , unfortunately, is particularily significant. Can we recommend that Bonn revise its position while there is still time?

CYPRIOT PRESIDENT KIPRIANOU ADDRESSES PRESS

AT241854 Athens Domestic Service in Greek 1830 GMT 24 Jun 80

At a press conference luncheon given in his honor at the King's Palace Hotel today by the Foreign Press Union Cypriot President Kiprianou explained the views of the Cyprus Government on the current status of the Cyprus issue. Kiprianou was introduced by the chairman of the Foreign Press Union, Tsatsaronis, who presented a personality sketch of the Cypriot president.

Prior to answering question by members of the foreign and the Greek press, Kiprianou made an opening statement in which he explained the Cyprus problem:

[Begin Kiprianou recording] The Cyprus problem is not a difference between the Greeks and Turks of Cyprus. Naturally there is the domestic problem of Cyprus in reference to the internal structure and organization. Basically, however, the problem of Cyprus is a problem of occupation and invasion.

We are in the 6th year of the occupation of 40 percent of the territory of the Republic of Cyprus by Turkish forces. We are in the 6th year in which one-third of our population has been forced to live in the free areas after having been uprooted by the invader from their ancestral hearths. We are in the 5th year and yet we are still seeking to learn the fate of nearly 2,000 missing persons.

I would now like to stress that even on this purely humanitarian issue there has been absolutely no desire demonstrated by the Turkish side for cooperation so that we might establish the fate of these nearly 2,000 missing persons.

Repeated UN resolutions during these past 6 years, both from the UN General Assembly and from the Security Council, have been completely ignored by Turkey. Despite these resolutions the Turkish position has remained unmoved, and intransigent. At this point I would like to mention parenthetically that some time ago we were told that after the lifting of the U.S. embargo the Turkish position would be more conciliatory. I can assure you that the Turkish position has, if anything, become even more intransigent than what it was before the lifting of the embargo. This can be clearly proved by developments.

Repeated efforts for an inter-Cypriot dialogue have been made. Cyprus could very well have had the right, both as an independent country, a member of the United Nations, and as a government, to take the position that we refuse to participate in any negotiations prior to the evacuation of the occupation troops from Cyprus.

Despite all this, the Government of Cyprus has not followed this course. From 1974 to date it has truly fought to guarantee the prerequisites for an honorable dialogue. I do not say that it is only Turkey which is responsible for the nonimplementation of the UN resolutions. There are also those who had the opportunity and the obligation to support Cyprus and the ability to push for the implementation of the UN resolutions. [end recording]

Kiprianou then referred to the history of efforts and of inter-Cypriot negotiations which, as he said, despite the negative position of Turkey and its intransigence, were accepted by President Makarios. At that time Makarios met Denktas and reached a four-point agreement.

Kiprianou said that on the basis of this four-point agreement, President Makarios submitted specific proposals on both the territorial and the constitutional aspects, of the issue, under the presupposition that there would be proposals from the Turkish side such that a basic dialogue would commence.

One year later, after the death of Archbishop Makarios, the Turkish proposals were submitted, but only on the constitutional aspect of the issue. This, as Kiprianou stressed, is tantamount to the creation of two separate states. Kiprianou then referred to the new impasse and to the agreement of May 1979, which at that time showed that we were entering a better period. Denktas, however, started to undermine the agreement in his statements. During the following month the negotiations lasted for a few days. They were then postponed for a few weeks. An entire year has, however, passed and they have yet to be resumed. Kiprianou then personally explained why these negotiations were not resumed.

[Begin Kiprianou recording] The negotiations have not been resumed because instead of the Turkish side being willing to return to the negotiating table for the purpose of continuing the dialogue on the basis of the 19 May agreement, it sets conditions and asks us to accept advance obligations before negotiations can be resumed. It is impossible for us to accept advance conditions. What meaning is there in negotiations if one accepts advance obligations, particularly of the type suggested by the Turkish side?

Because the impression exists that the Turkish side is simply recommending verbal conditions, I wish to disperse this impression. This is not a case of words. What the Turkish side uses as conditions are not just words. This is a case of meanings because here we are concerned with the essence of the words. [end recording]

On the position of the Government of Cyprus on these negotiations, Kiprianou added: [Begin Kiprianou recording] I emphatically want to state that we have not allowed a single opportunity for resuming the dialogue to escape. We have been absolutely conscientious. [end recording]

AVEROF DENIES REPORTS OF POLITICAL DISLOYALTY

AT211407 Athens I AVYI in Greek 21 Jun 80 p 8

[Text] Yesterday Averof denied reports in two publications: The Greek O TAKHIDROMOS and the British NEW STATESMAN AND NATION. The denial ofthe O TAKHIDROMOS report was made by a government spokesman who said that Averof had never made the statement attributed to him: "I do not intend to be active as a politician under Rallis." "After all," the government spokesman added,"their cooperation (between Rallis and Averof) practically proves the opposite."

The denial of the British periodical was made by Averof himself: "During the 25 years that Karamanlis was my political leader I never concealed the slightest thing from him and I have always been absolutely faithful to him.

NEW STATESMAN AND NATION had published an "unconfirmed report" (as it described it) that although Averof knew that the recent U.S.-Turkish agreement on the bases contained secret provisions permitting Turkey to monitor the military movements of Greece, Iran and Syria he had concealed this information from Karamanlis. The same periodical mentioned that Averof had assured the Americans that through his own actions he would guarantee the country's return to the military NATO. According to the British review, this concealment infuriated Karamanlis and cost Averof the Office of the Prime Minister.

ASSEMBLY DECIDES TO CONDUCT INTERPELLATION OF GOVERNMENT

TA241822 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1800 GMT 24 Jun 80

[Text] The National Assembly decided today to place on the agenda the interpellation proposed by RPP leader, Deputy from Zonguldak Bulent Ecevit and his colleagues. A roll call vote was held and 413 deputies participated in the voting. The placing of the interpellation on the agenda was approved by 407 votes against 6 votes. According to a proposal submitted by the leadership council and approved by the Assembly, the interpellation debates will be held on Monday, 30 June.

During today's discussions, which began at 1600 under the chairmanship of Deputy Assembly President Muhsin Gorentas, RPP deputy group leader and Deputy from Izmir Coskun Karagozoglu and Nationalist Action Party [NAP] Deputy from Erzurum Nevzat Kosoglu expressed the views of their parties. Deputy from Malatya Recai Kutan spoke on behalf of the National Salvation Party and Justice Party deputy group leader, Deputy from Ankara Oguz Aygun addressed the Assembly on behalf of his party. Prime Minister Suleyman Demirel replied to the criticisms. During an open roll call vote, which was held after the debate, the Assembly decided to include the interpellation on the agenda and it was decided to conduct it on Monday. Four JP members and two NAP members voted against the proposal. Proposals to hold a vote of confidence, which the deputies can submit during the interpellation, or a Council of Ministers request for a vote of confidence, will be submitted to a vote after 24 hours pass. A simple majority of 226 ballots is necessary in order to topple the government.

NSP ABANDONS OBLIGATION TO SUPPORT DEMIREL GOVERNMENT

TA241144 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1000 GMT 24 Jun 80

[Text] National Salvation Party [NSP] leader Necmettin Erbakan has said that his party has renounced its obligation to support the government and that as of today it can topple the government any moment, provided the conditions call for it. Noting that this decision does not mean that they will topple the government, Erbakan said: We do not share the moral responsibility for the current course of events. We now consider ourselves to be free.

Speaking at a news conference in parliament today, Erbakan announced the decision made by the NSP Leadership Council, following the meeting he held with Prime Minister Suleyman Demirel on the warning letter submitted to the government and the government's written reply to it. Erbakan said that the NSP Leadership Council assessed the written reply as well as Demirel's verbal reply to the 16-article warning letter expressing NSP demands. Erbakan said: We have come to the conclusion that the replies given by the government can be summed up as follows: The 7-month administration is in line with the Justice Party philosophy. The Justice Party [JP] is responsible for the administration's actions and policies. If we remain in power, we will continue our actions in line with the JP philosophy. Therefore, it is impossible to reply positively to your 16 demands. For example, we cannot renounce the agreement reached with the IMF. We cannot cancel the decree concerning interest rates. We cannot enact the tax bill concerning minimum wages without levying new taxes.

In view of this situation the NSP decision, which we announced earlier, will go into effect as of today. In other words, we do not share the moral responsibility for the current critical course of events. The NSP now considers itself free.

Noting that the government does not have to resign as a result of the NSP decision, Erbakan said: A government has the right to resign whenever it wishes to do so. This is a decision for the government. Erbakan also noted that a government which has received a vote of confidence is still in power. He added that it is possible to topple this government with the casting of 226 votes of no-confidence in the parliament. Noting that the debate on whether or not the interpellation against the government will be included on the agenda will be held today, Erbakan added that his party's stand on the issue will be determined at the NSP parliamentary group meeting to be held prior to the National Assembly meeting today. He said that the decision on the issue will be announced to the public.

In the last part of the news conference, Erbakan said that it has become evident that the nation will be freed from its sufferings when the national view [upheld by NSP] assumes power. In reply to a question, Erbakan said that Turkey has entered a new phase and added: We are trying to solve Turkey's problems. Just as we did not support the government blindly, we will not topple it blindly. Turkey's problems need to be solved. The current situation cannot continue as it is. A solution should be proposed and should be implemented.

MINISTERIAL COUNCIL DISCUSSES POLITICAL, ECONOMIC SITUATION

Opening Ceremony

TA251123 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1000 GMT 25 Jun 80

[Excerpt] Addressing the opening ceremony of the NATO ministerial council spring meeting, Prime Minister Suleyman Demirel said: It has been observed that NATO, during the 31 years since its creation, has expanded its area of operation in a bid to intensify its search for more stable relations between the East and the West. Demirel added that the speedily developing events since 1949, which have yielded very important results, have also paved the way to important developments in East-West relations. Demirel later continued: Despite the encouraging developments in Europe within the last 10 years, one cannot ignore the disturbing international picture in other parts of the world. It would not be wrong to say that the recent developments in Southwest Asia at a time when the Middle East dispute has not yet been solved have again brought the world to the brink of a cold war.

Demirel recalled that detente cannot be divided and that detente in Europe cannot be continued without taking into consideration developments in other regions in the world. He added: The invasion of Afghanistan is not compatible with UN principles and does not secure detente. Our security, our prosperity and the recent developments in our region which have a vital importance from the viewpoint of the steadily increasing complexity of international relations further increase the inalienable role of our alliance in ensuring peace and security. Now more than ever we need the determination and will of the member countries to stand against any kind of threat and to serve the cause of peace.

Unity and cooperation within the Alliance will be a most effective way of detering any foreign intervention in the Gulf region. Pointing out that the recent developments in Southwest Asia further increased the strategic importance of the Alliance's southern flank, Demirel said that a special interest should be shown concerning the needs of the southern flank within the framework of defense efforts in order to increase NATO's deterrent power. Demirel concluded his speech as follows: In conclusion, I would like to stress my belief that our Alliance will continue to serve the unrenouncable factor of peace and security with the same enthusiasm and determination. I am confident that the Ankara meetings will further strengthen the unity, friendship, cooperation and mutual trust among the members and secure joint interests.

After Demirel, U.S. Secretary of State Edmund Muskie addressed the meeting. Muskie said that Turkey, which is overcoming many difficulties through courage and its loyalty to democracy, is a valuable friend and a vital ally. Muskie added: Through these characteristics Turkey has not only earned the respect of its allies, but also their cooperation and strong support. Noting that there might be differences of views within the Alliance from time to time, Muskie said that these differences in view should not adversely affect solidarity within the Alliance, because NATO will face many more international problems in the future. Muskie noted that the increasing Soviet military existence in the last 10 years and the Soviet inclination to violate the independence and sovereignty of other nations created the necessity for NATO to react in a united manner. Pointing out that the aim of the Alliance was to secure the continuation of the detente in the world and not to create disputes, Muskie said that while this policy was being implemented it was necessary to secure a military balance in Europe and to fully implement the Alliance's decisions on defense matters. Muskie said that after the withdrawal of all Soviet troops from Afghanistan, they will support an independent and nonaligned Afghanistan with the Afghan people determining the administration.

NATO Secretary General Luns delivered the final speech at the opening ceremony. Luns said that the world was emerging from a [word indistinct] period of stability and entering a period in which the future is viewed with suspicion. Luns added that important duties befall NATO in securing political detente in a bid to eliminate the tense atmosphere in international relations. Noting that the most concrete expression of NATO's solidarity was the political solidarity mechanism within the Alliance, Luns added that this process has been tested in the last few months, but that the results have not been as successful as one would have desired. Luns concluded by saying that expanding the areas of consultation and freeing it from bureaucratic obstacles in a bid to achieve results on time will contribute to NATO interests as well as to eliminating international tension.

The opening ceremony ended after Luns' speech. The delegation then left the conference hall of the Highways Directorate General and went to the Turkish Standards Institute where the meetings will continue in camera. The first session at the Turkish Standards Institute meeting ended at 1240. The afternoon session will begin at 1430. The NATO ministerial council spring meetings will end tomorrow.

Erkmen Address

TA251430 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1300 GMT 25 Jun 80

[Text] The NATO ministerial council resumed its spring meeting at 1430, after a short interval at 1300, today. In a statement he made during the interval, Foreign Minister Hayrettin Erkmen explained the subjects discussed at the ministerial council meeting this morning. Pointing out that speeches were delivered by eight foreign ministers during the morning session, Erkmen said that in his speech, Greek Foreign Minister Konstandinos Mitsotakis expressed the hope that an atmosphere of complete peace will prevail in the region and that Greece is ready to make efforts to this end.

Noting that East-West relations as well as the political proposal on the Afghanistan issue were discussed during the meetings tomorrow. Erkmen added that Turkey does not have a specific expectation from or a proposal for the ministerial council.

Erkmen on Mideast, Afghanistan

TA251648 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1600 GMT 25 Jun 80

[Excerpt] Foreign Minister Hayrettin Erkmen spoke to journalists at the end of NATO ministerial council meetings today. Erkmen explained that East-West relations, the international political situation, disarmament and the implementation of the principles in the European Security and Cooperation Conference final document were discussed during the morning and afternoon sessions today.

Pointing out that the Afghanistan issue was given priority when assessing the political situation in the world, Erkmen said that the speakers stressed that the situation in Afghanistan and the Middle East is becoming increasingly more sensitive. Erkmen added that certain speakers noted that despite the fact that the global political detente was damaged as a result of the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan, it is necessary to leave the door open for negotiations with the Soviet Union in a bid to maintain this process.

Erkmen noted that, while expressing his views concerning various global issues during his speech at the afternoon session, he referred to the Middle East issue as well. Erkmen said that when they assess the Middle East issue, Western countries should handle the matter from two sides. The foreign minister also explained that, in his speech, he expressed his views regarding the developments at the various Islamic conferences.

The foreign ministers of the NATO countries are holding bilateral contacts in Ankara. Erkmen held a meeting today with Canadian Secretary of State for External Affairs Mark MacGuigan. According to information received by a TRT correspondent, Erkmen will hold bilateral meetings with the foreign ministers of the FRG, Britain and Italy tomorrow. The foreign minister will also meet with his Greek counterpart, Konstandinos Mitsotakis, on Saturday morning and exchange views on the issues between the two countries. The foreign ministers of the 15 NATO countries will be received together by Acting President Ihsan Sabri Caglayangil at the Cankaya Mansion this evening. Prime Minister Suleyman Demirel will give a dinner for the foreign ministers at the Grand National Assembly tonight. The NATO ministerial council spring meetings are expected to end by noon tomorrow.

Genscher on Turkish Aid

LD252218 Hamburg DPA in German 1734 GMT 25 Jun 80

[Text] Ankara--The Federal Government fully supports efforts to reintegrate Greece in NATO's military command, Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher told Greek Foreign Minister Konstandinos Mitsotakis in separate talks which were held today during the NATO conference in Ankara. Greece left the NATO integrated command in protest of the Turkish invasion of Cyprus.

Genscher explained to the Greek foreign minister the motives for the Federal Republic's aid scheme for Turkey. He took note of the fact that Greece does not need special arms aid. Mitsotakis thanked the Federal Government for its efforts to bring the negotiations on Greek entry into the EC to a successful conclusion. Bonn delegation sources said that the ministerial talks at the NATO meeting have already on the first day shown a large measure of agreement and a clear determination to pursue common objectives. Genscher's speech has been praised as an outstanding contribution to the discussion, with regards to both his presentation of the issues facing the Alliance and his account of the prospects of the German chancellor's and foreign minister's impending visit to Moscow.

Demirel Hosts Dinner

TA252031 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 2000 GMT 25 Jun 80

[Excerpt] Prime Minister Suleyman Demirel has said that it was seen that the economic measures taken by Turkey to curb inflation will be successful. Demirel gave a dinner at the Turkish Grand National Assembly tonight in honor of the NATO foreign ministers, who are currently in Ankara for the ministerial council spring meetings. In a speech during the dinner, Demirel pointed out that Turkey is optimistic about the solution of its economic problems and said: We believe that we can give our economy the dynamism necessary to insure a better defense capability. We trust that our Allies' valuable assistance to be added to these efforts will contribute to the solution of the existing crisis in our country. Demirel noted that, through the aid to be extended by its allies, Turkey will better fulfill its duty within the Alliance and will play a more effective role in the deterrent factor of NATO. Pointing out that in the face of the complicated problems currently facing the world, NATO should be in a state of integrity, solidarity and unity, Demirel concluded: Since the reasons for the creation of NATO are still valid even after 30 years, the duty for us all is not only to maintain the strength of our Alliance but also to develop it. The foreign ministers of the 15 NATO countries were received by Acting President Ihsan Sabri Caglayangil at the Cankaya Mansion before the dinner given in their honor by the prime minister.

Hostages Release Demanded

TA261120 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1000 GMT 26 Jun 80

[Text] The NATO ministerial council spring meetings have ended in Ankara. NATO Secretary General Joseph Luns announced that the defense aid envisaged for Turkey was approved during the ministerial council meetings. Luns was talking to journalists at the end of the meetings. He said that the council assessed East-West relations in the light of the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan. Pointing out that the situation of the less developed countries was also discussed, Luns noted that the final document of the Helsinki conference was also dealt with. Noting that the defense aids to be extended to Turkey, Greece and Portugal in December was also discussed during the meetings, Luns said that the ministers who attended the meeting agreed on strengthening Turkey's economic situation.

During their meetings, which began at 0930 yesterday and ended at 1200 today, the foreign ministers of the 15 NATO countries discussed the political and economic aspects of international issues. The ministers expressed their views on international issues which could affect the Alliance, even if they emerged in areas outside the NATO region. TRT correspondents reported that the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan and the development since the invasion were given priority during the assessment of the issues. Diplomatic circles note that the Afghanistan issue was assessed in the context of discussion on the effects of East-West relations on world political detente and the elimination of these effects.

It was reported that during speeches delivered at various sessions, views were expressed to the effect that it was the Soviet Union which had damaged world political detente by invading Afghanistan; however, if detente was to be continued, the door to detente with that country should not be closed completely.

The ministers also discussed the political developments in the Mediterranean and the Middle East. Meanwhile, the necessity to strengthen the southeastern wing of NATO--which is situated in a critical region of the world--was also stressed during the meetings.

The foreign ministers expressed their views and proposals regarding the attitude to be adopted at the conference in Spain on the implementation of the final document on European security and cooperation.

The meetings also emphasized the importance of the functioning of the political consultative mechanism within the Alliance in a way to lead to a satisfactory result in order to insure the correct assessment of issues which concern NATO directly or indirectly.

Meanwhile, a statement separate from the joint communique to be issued at the end of the meetings was issued this morning while the NATO ministerial council meeting was still in session. The statement noted that the NATO ministerial council demands the immediate release--unharmed--of the U.S. Embassy personnel who are being held as hostages in Iran. The statement harshly condemned all incidents of terror--including the taking hostage of diplomatic officials and representatives. The statement, which noted the determination of the 15 NATO countries to continue the struggle against such incidents of terror, asked other countries to adopt the same attitude and determination. The statement also condemned acts of terror directed against diplomatic missions and diplomatic representatives' lives.

Officials are currently holding news conferences regarding the meetings of the NATO ministerial council. The joint communique on the meeting will be issued separately.

SCHMIDT TO DISCUSS EUROMISSILES, AFGHANISTAN IN MOSCOW

LD251238 Hamburg DPA in German 0920 GMT 25 Jun 80

[Excerpts] Bonn--Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt departs for Moscow next Monday with obvious skepticism about the chances of achieving progress during his talks with the Soviet leadership on efforts to settle the international crises and start disarmament talks on medium-range nuclear weapons in Europe. A total of 6 hours of talks are planned with Soviet state and party leader Leonid Brezhnev during the 2-day "working visit" by Schmidt and Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher; talks which in Bonn are being assessed as difficult.

Main topics of the talks, which are seen by the Federal Government as Bonn's contribution towards the revival of the East-West dialogue, are the crises in Afghanistan, Iran and the Middle East, as well as arms in the area of the so-called Eurostrategic weapons. Schmidt and Genscher reportedly see the purpose of their talks as an exploration of ways to solve the crises and of possibilities for disarmament talks in the sphere of nuclear arms. Schmidt recently told the Bundestag that it was doubtful whether these aims could be achieved during the visit.

It has been learned that despite American doubts, Schmidt will not give up his (?proposal) that the East and West should, in the interest of talks, delay for a period of 3 years the deployment of new nuclear medium-range weapons. The chancellor wants to learn the Soviet leadership's true position on this matter. He stressed to Carter in Venice the full validity of the NATO decision on the manufacture of such weapons as well as an offer for talks with the East, and at the same time made it clear that his proposal was in accord with the decision. There is clearly a certain amount of hope within the Federal Government that during the Schmidt-Genscher visit, Brezhnev could take a step towards the opening of talks in this area. Moscow (?demanded as a prerequisite for talks) that NATO rescind its decision or suspend its implementation.

Regarding the Afghanistan crisis, the chancellor, on the basis of the Venice declaration demanding a total withdrawal of Soviet troops, wants to explore the importance of the withdrawal of some troop units announced by Moscow. He will inform himself in general terms what long-term views the Soviet Union has in order to settle this conflict.

Schmidt has announced "very frank" words in Moscow on both the matter of the Soviet Eurostrategic weapons which are causing concern and on the Soviet occupation of Afghanistan which has been repeatedly condemned by Bonn. It is assumed in Bonn that during the visit the differences between both governments will be expressed in statements outside an expected brief communique. The bilateral relations between both states will be in the background as a topic of the Moscow talks. The Schmidt visit is an opportunity for the signing of an already-negotiated agreement on a long-term program of industrial cooperation.

PAPERS VIEW CARTER EUROPEAN TOUR

SFRY Visit a 'Gain' for Europe

DW250915 Frankfurt FRANKFURTER RUNDSCHAU in German 25 Jun 80 p 3

[Harry Schleicher Belgrade dispatch: "Under the Star-Spangled Banner"]

[Text] For 24 hours the Yugoslav capital was marked by the American Star-Spangled Banner. [paragraph continues]

On his tour of some South European states U.S. President Carter obviously felt obligated to make up for what he had neglected to do 7 weeks ago on the occasion of the funeral ceremonies for the late Yugoslav chief of state and party Tito: to show the flag in Belgrade. Carter's belated bows to Tito's grave and his 3-hour talks with Tito's collective successors are of the highest political significance despite the political and protocol blunder of the time which the Belgrade hosts are polite enough to ignore. The relations between the Western world power and the nonaligned Balkan country, which on principle are good but which have not always been free of friction in the distant past, are supposed to be given new positive impulses.

Before Carter arrived in Belgrade from the world economic summit he had announced that the United States lately has had "perhaps the best relations with Yugoslavia in many years." This might rather be a mixture of wishful thinking and reality. Surely Tito's last visit to Washington in the spring of 1978 decisively contributed to the improvement in the relationship between the two states. Since U.S.-Yugoslav relations, besides, are considerably influenced by Belgrade's relationship with Moscow they have been soaring additionally since the Afghan crisis, a trend which Carter might utilize to his advantage with some diplomatic skill.

Viewed from Belgrade's angle this assessment must not be counteracted by either Carter's former erraticism in the relationship with Yugoslavia or the uncertainty of whether he will still be the man in the White House with whom one must deal. Years ago he announced as the presidential candidate that in the event of a Soviet attack on Yugoslavia he would not do anything. As the President he changed his mind and nearly issued a sort of guarantee declaration to Belgrade's advantage.

Even without dramatic statements, which are not always pleasant to hear for the new leaders of nonaligned Yugoslavia, the appearance of an American President in Belgrade is a gain for European policy. It is a visible recognition of Yugoslavia's significance as one of the leading states of the nonaligned movement. The West ought to consider an intensification of relations with this group of states because the nonaligned are playing an important role in connection with Afghanistan. The recent activities of the Yugoslav foreign minister were obvious, activities prior to the foreign ministers' conference of the nonaligned slated for early 1981 in New Delhi.

The leading Western power's good relations with Yugoslavia are a world-political long-term program particularly in view of an obviously greater preparedness of the Soviets to run risks. It certainly also involves consideration of how one could best adhere to Yugoslav wishes regarding the strengthening of its defense preparedness by purchasing certain Americans arms systems. But that is just an external aspect of Yugoslav security policy. The economic situation remains an almost more important problem, a situation which must be mastered primarily by Belgrade itself, while help from the West must not be underrated.

The United States as the most important financial partner of Yugoslavia has lately discovered a stronger and stronger interest in the Balkan country. Many things indicate that Carter's assurances will be given a solid material basis, assurances indicating that Washington wants to continue its policy aimed at preserving the independence, sovereignty, unity and territorial integrity of Yugoslavia. The faster this is understood everywhere--and Carter's visit to Belgrade is a campaign for this understanding--the better for Europe.

Meetings With Tito's Heirs Hailed

[Carl Gustav Stroehm article: "Indispensable to Belgrade"]

[Text] Better late than never: Jimmy Carter's visit to Belgrade which began yesterday is overshadowed by problems which either have nothing to do with Yugoslavia or, if so, only indirectly. The U.S. President is in the middle of his election campaign. His relations with the most important allies can at best be called unstable. At the same time Carter is the U.S. President in whose term it has become clear that the United States has lost its uncontested role as a leading world power and that it is debatable today, at least in the military sphere, whether the United States has already been surpassed by the Soviet Union.

Nevertheless, Carter, who is not the first U.S. President to visit Yugoslavia since Nixon and Ford had visited Belgrade before him, is being received by Tito's successors very cordially and in a most friendly way. The Yugoslav press emphasizes how good and understanding the relations had been particularly between Carter and the late Tito. The people were called upon to welcome in Carter a guest who received Tito in Washington "with respect and esteem" at the time.

This retrospection, which also includes the placement of a wreath at Tito's grave in Dedinje, does not just have sentimental reasons. More than ever before the United States is important to Tito's successors. They cannot, and do not wish to, afford any anti-Americanism in view of the power situation in the world. The leading men in Belgrade would have to be blind if they failed to sense the subtle but tangible changes in the distribution of the world-political weight betwen East and West--changes which so far have had an effect that is advantageious to the Soviet Union and disadvantageous to the West and the United States.

As paradoxical as it may seem: The Yugoslavs had been much better able to afford sharp tones and even affronts toward the powerful United States of the fifties and sixties, for Yugoslavia's former position as a communist state not affiliated with the communist camp and as nonaligned can be maintained in Europe in the long run only if the balance is preserved. An excessively powerful Soviet Union and a Federal Republic skidding into pro-Soviet neutralism would expose Belgrade's situation to extreme danger.

On the other hand the Yugoslavs sense how Moscow's followers in the nonaligned movement--starting from Cuba, via Vietnam, and up to the new regime in Afghanistan--already are laying the mines intended to smash Belgrade's position in this movement and isolate if not exclude the Yugoslavs, banishing them to the ranks of the "reactionaries."

This, too, is a long-term process which is being played by the Eastern side with well-distributed roles: More or less noncommittal friendship assurances of Moscow on the one hand, then some sort of "respite" for the collective Belgrade government team--and on the other hand Cuban actions to outmaneuver the Yugoslavs.

Belgrade's foreign political situation is being complicated by the fact that Tito's authority is now missing. The names of the new leaders are hardly known. Who knows something about State President Mijatovic, who is Carter's official host? It is difficult for a collective leadership to develop authority particularly with regard to international problems, because authority is still linked rather with persons than institutions.

In addition Yugoslavia has been in a transitional phase since May 1980. The former "monarchist" style, which developed under Tito, will be replaced now by a rather "republican" government form which is based on the consenus of the six republics involved. A system is developing here that can be compared with no Western or Eastern state system.

It has to be welcomed that the American President obviously seems to have realized the geopolitical, strategic and ideological significance of Yugoslavia in Europe. Certainly, it is a comparatively small country with hardly 21 million inhabitants. But Yugoslavia was always a bridge between the East and the West. It has been a battlefield quite frequently as well. Today one must view this country in connection with the Mediterranean, the Near East and Central Africa and even Afghanistan which does not accidentaly concern the Yugoslavs more than most West Europeans.

In the transition zone in which Yugoslavia is located, many things are different from the West--although many other things again seem very familiar to the West. A wise Western and American policy ought to respect the differences and use the similarities and the points of contact. This does not at all mean identification with or even approval of the Yugoslav communist system. But we ought to ask ourselves self-critically what would be the current alternative to moderate Titoism which is being practiced by Tito's successors today. Yugoslavia needs quiet and stable development. So far it looks as if Tito's successors are interested in just that. The feared internal aggravation after Tito's death did not take place; on the contrary--there is a trace of domestic political detente in the country, despite the difficult economic situation. The West can only welcome it if Yugoslavia remains stable and develops further toward careful inner relaxation. A beginning is already visible.

The American President, regardless of whether his name will be Carter or Reagan, ought to pursue a continuous, predictable and reliable policy vis-a-vis this country with its key position in the southeast. Nothing would be worse than erraticism--particularly since the new leadership in Belgrade must first become accustomed to international work. The continuation of independent Yugoslavia is of vital importance for the West, because only in such a way can balance and peace be preserved in the southeast and the Mediterranean.

EUROPEAN RELATIONS 'COMPLICATED' BY NATO ISSUES

DW260748 Frankfurt FRANKFURTER ALLGEMEINE in German 26 Jun 80 p 10

[Commentary signed R.H.: "Europe is Complicated"]

[Text] President Carter is in Madrid, the NATO conference is taking place in Ankara: Both events provide an opportunity to think about the complicated relations joining the Western nations. The Spaniards link their NATO membership with their joining the European Community. They hope simultaneously to get Gibraltar back; this old sea fortress is particularly valuable as a collection point for convoys sailing the southern Atlantic route as long as the northern is not sufficiently protected against Soviet attacks. In addition, the increasing linkage between domestic and foreign policies is being stressed: Carter talked also with Gonzalez, the leader of the Spanish Socialists, whose party does not want NATO membership. In Greece the NATO policy aimed at a massive support of Turkey has a negative effect on domestic policy. Greece's joining the European Community and entering NATO as a full-fledged member will hardly be promoted by altering military assistance for Turkey and Greece, presently at a 5 to 2 ratio, to 10 to 1 to the advantage of Turkey.

This makes Greece's loyalty to NATO a position which will be hard to defend domestically. The Greek voters care more about the very old and continuing conflict with Turkey and naval rights in the Aegean, let alone Cyprus, than about the geostrategic assessment of Turkey as a NATO cornerstone, particularly since they believe that this cornerstone is not worth very much without their support. European integration is complicated from the Atlantic to the Aegean, not only in the agricultural field.

NEW NATO 'FORMULA' NEEDED AT ANKARA CONFERENCE

DW260838 Bonn DIE WELT in German 26 Jun 80 p 6

[Commentary signed Kem.: "Ankara Formula"]

[Text] Ankara constitutes an important station in this summer of conferences. It is the first time in 20 years that the NATO foreign ministers have met in this spot which is so turbulent for the Alliance--and not one spring meeting too soon, to be sure. Turkey, the partner badly neglected at times, being on the eastern flank of the Western defense community is in direct contact with the center of the political earthquake caused by the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan.

It is here more clearly than anywhere else that the shortcomings as well as the information about what is necessary and possible in the realm of direct NATO action shift into focus. It may be that they will be more successful in their endeavors to find the political and military instruments without which it is impossible to cope with the challenge to the Atlantic pact as a result of the Soviet seizure in Southwest Asia. Moscow's readiness to take risks, which has been proven there and which had been largely underrated until December 1979, necessitates the consideration of a new formula, a new doctrine beyond the valid theses of the Alliance that involves its reaction, in concert and in division of labor, to the forcible application of Soviet power outside the NATO geographic area--an application which simultaneously is taken as an attack on the sphere of vital interests of the community. Above all it is a political formula, and it presupposes the rather painful realization that detente is not divisible. The Bosporus is a good place for learning.

OPINION POLL SHOWS LACK OF CONFIDENCE IN U.S.

LD201205 Hamburg DPA in German 1118 GMT 20 Jun 80

[Text] Hamburg--According to an Infratest opinion poll, over 50 percent of the citizens of the Federal Republic no longer have any marked confidence in the leading Western power, the United States.

The Depesche information service of the economic magazine CAPITAL reported today that this emerged from the answers of 2,000 citizens. They showed that, of those asked, 46 percent had "not much" and 10 percent "very little" confidence in the United States. The proportion of those who had "very great" confidence in the United States was 9 percent while 35 percent still had a "fair amount" of confidence.

DIJOUD TO DISCUSS NEW HEBRIDES WITH UK

OW251205 Paris AFP in English 1005 GMT 25 Jun 80

[Text] Paris, June 25 (AFP)--French Secretary of State for Overseas Departments and Territories Paul Dijoud left for London today for a further round of talks on the New Hebrides crisis with Foreign Office Minister of State Peter Blaker. The meeting will be their fourth since May 27 when Jimmy Stevens, leader of the French-speaking moderate faction on the New Hebridean isle of Espiritu Santo, rebelled against the New Hebridean Government at Port Vila, capital of the Anglo-French condominium, and set up a provisional government of his own.

The talks so far have gone very smoothly, French sources said, though neither side has any illusions about the complexity of the New Hebridean question and the uncertainty of achieving a settlement. High on the agenda of ticklish problems the French and British are faced with is organizing proper decentralization structures before the territory gets independence, guaranteeing the rights of the islands' traditional chieftains, and protecting the cultural identity of the French-speaking minority.

French sources said the refusal on Tuesday by New Hebridean Prime Minister Walter Lini to consider an eventual government coalition with the opposition French-speaking moderates was aimed at thwarting the conciliation efforts of Paris and London and would slow progress towards a solution.

In view of the situation's manifold complexities, the sources said, Mr Dijoud would be holding firm to the French position of not attempting to stampede the New Hebrides into independence, the July 30 date being seen as a goal and not an inflexible deadline. From the French viewpoint, it is worth in the circumstances putting up with several weeks' delay rather than hastily granting an independence that would instantly generate more intractable problems.

PRESS COMMENTS ON SUMMIT RESULTS, RAMIFICATIONS

LE MONDE Sees 'Contradictory' Analyses

LD251247 Paris LE MONDE in French 25 Jun 80 pp 1, 3

[Jacques Amalric commentary: "Contradictory Accounts"]

[Text] Venice--All's well that ends well: Everybody, be it President Carter, Chancellor Schmidt or Mr Giscard d'Estaing, left Venice very satisfied in principle. According to the prepared comments made by the seven at the end of their meeting, things are not going too badly in a world in crisis. The list of positive points mentioned by the various leaders would even be impressive if it were not contradictory: the German-U.S. misunderstanding has different aspects in Bonn and Washington [a ciels de Bonn et de Washington]--who agree to blame the quarrel on the press which allegedly misquoted Chancellor Schmidt's remarks; the Allies' unity has been strengthened even though Mr Carter and Mr Giscard d'Estaing agreed that the shortcomings of the existing system of consultation are so serious that they cannot be settled on the fringe of the summit; U.S. leadership is apparently undergoing a revival and the French ideas on the need to maintain contact with Moscow at the highest level would seem to have been justified by the first withdrawal of Soviet troops from Afghanistan....

So many reasons for satisfaction can, of course, only be explained by different analyses of the same facts. The Afghanistan affair, which will remain the major topic of this sixth industrialized countries' summit, illustrates these differences of approach and feeling perfectly.

During a short press conference on Monday afternoon Mr Giscard d'Estaing did not conceal his satisfaction. Revealing that he proposed a timetable for the withdrawal of Soviet troops to Mr Brezhnev at the Warsaw meeting, the president of the republic hinted . new withdrawals are possible. Asked whether, in his oral message transmitted by the USSR ambassador in Paris, Mr Brezhnev spoke of a "first withdrawal," Mr Giscard d'Estaing replied by an affirmative nod. Previously he had stated that "the Warsaw meeting has, to some extent, paved the way for an initial reduction of Soviet forces." Without mentioning a specific figure the head of state nonetheless described the number of Soviet forces to be withdrawn as "significant" and said that it is wrong to claim that the Soviet contingent in Afghanistan has recently been increased.

False Enthusiasm

As can be seen Mr Giscard d'Estaing has picked out from these events those signs which support his theory. That is perfectly natural. The British and Americans have carried out the same exercise with, of course, opposite results: While the French are hinting that the Soviet withdrawal affects 10,000 men, a very reliable U.S. source maintains that it will only affect 5,000 men from surface-to-surface missile, artillery and heavy tank units which cannot be used in the Afghan guerrilla war. Rather than regarding this withdrawal as a consequence of the Warsaw meeting, its concomitance with the Venice summit and the proximity of the Olympic games are being stressed. It is also being stated that Red Army reinforcements definitely have been sent to Afghanistan recently and attention is drawn to the Soviet troops which are based on the Soviet border but are intervening increasingly frequently in the military operations carried out in Afghanistan. In short, without going so far as to talk of a Soviet "maneuver" the Americans are refusing to rule it out. The watchword seems to be something like: "Wait and see and no comment."

The same comments are to be heard from the British and Germans. Lord Carrington thinks it appropriate to be "more cautious than the French since Karmal can still ask for the return of the forces recalled to the USSR." The West German foreign minister stated: "It is still impossible to evaluate the importance of the Soviet decision."

Aside from this the Americans prefer to feign happy surprise in public. According to them they were certainly not expecting their partners to accept the text on Afghanistan which was published Sunday evening. Anybody might think that they did not know of the statement published by the Nine on the same subject 10 days earlier which states virtually the same thing.... Indeed this false enthusiasm can quite simply be explained by the American election situation: Mr Carter must at all costs return to the United States triumphant and as a clever reconciler in order to keep some chance of winning in November. He is prepared to seize any opportunity to do this. In Afghanistan's case this is hardly difficult: Very few Americans will remember the Nine's statement. On the other hand many remember the Nine's statement on the Middle East and this is probably why such a controversial subject was only raised in bilateral talks on the fringe of the summit, for example, at the Carter-Giscard d'Estaing meeting. The subject clearly does not lend itself well enough to the current fashion for unanimity. Moreover, Mr Carter made a discreet reference to this at his press conference on Monday evening, stating in particular: "President Giscard d'Estaing is calling for an immediate withdrawal of Israeli troops from the occupied territories. It is easy to say this but it remains to be seen how it can be done."

During this press conference Mr Carter took his search for unanimity to the extent of caricature, not hesitating for good measure to describe the Warsaw meeting between Mr Brezhnev and Mr Giscard d'Estaing, which aroused little enthusiasm in Washington, as a "fruitful experiment." [paragraph continues]

It is true that the White House chief could not resist a passing dig at Mr Giscard d'Estaing, announcing that the president of the republic had informed him of the tenor of Mr Brezhnev's message on Friday before TASS had made its contents official but adding that he knew of the Soviet initiative before Mr Giscard d'Estaing notified him.

Mentioning a figure for the first time in public, Mr Carter said that the withdrawn forces constitute less than 10 percent of the 85,000 Soviets counted in Afghanistan. He specified that, according to U.S. intelligence, the troops withdrawn from Afghanistan will probably go to swell the troops already massed on the Soviet side of the border.

The most revealing part of Mr Carter's exercise concerns Chancellor Schmidt. In this case too there were a few fine words aimed at showing the U.S. voter just how his President excels in the art of smoothing over differences: Chancellor Schmidt's forthcoming trip to Moscow is, the U.S. President said, "a good thing." Having said this Mr Carter turned, as if by coincidence, to the sphere of mental restrictions: There is no doubt that Chancellor Schmidt will present the positions "without embellishing them" (it is a question, he recalled, of demanding the "complete and absolute withdrawal" of Soviet troops) and he would be "happy but surprised" if Mr Brezhnev rallies to the chancellor's plans regarding opening negotiations on the Euromissiles.

But what are the chancellor's plans? After the German-U.S. tension of recent weeks he is confined to a narrow path which can be defined as follows: He is free, if he wishes, to ask the Soviets to stop deploying their SS-20 missiles in western Russia in exchange for the opening of negotiations between NATO and the USSR on the Euromissiles. That is all. If he goes further than that he must realize that he will be repudiated by Mr Carter. The U.S. President could not have been clearer when he said, after announcing that the choice of sites for the Pershing-2 missiles would begin this summer: "I do not accept any freeze on our plans." There is reason to think that Mr Carter did not use the word "freeze" by chance; this was precisely the word which Chancellor Schmidt swears he never pronounced with regard to the Pershing-2 and cruise missiles.

In any case Mr Carter's fairly perfidious references were not necessary to stress the artificial nature of the German-U.S. "reconciliation": On Monday morning a top West German official partly confirmed the U.S. anxieties by announcing that Belgium will only give a final decision on the deployment of Pershing-2 missiles on its territory after being informed of the results of the trip which Chancellor Schmidt is to make to Moscow at the end of the month. Theoretically it is this week, at the NATO meeting in Ankara, that Brussels should have made its final decision known. Last December, when NATO took its decision on the deployment of the U.S. missiles, Belgium indeed promised to give a decision in 6 months.

Decisions Have 'Some Chance' of Success

LD251257 Paris LE FIGARO in French 24 Jun 80 pp 1-2

[Serge Maffert article: "Modest Results"]

[Text] In Venice, the Island of San Giorgio Maggiore has recovered its old-fashioned calm and age-old serenity. With the exception of Mr Carter, who is in Belgrade today, the heads of state and government of the seven "most important countries in the world" have returned to their capitals.

What will remain from this 1980 summit? Obviously all the participants stated that they were well pleased with it and, officially, asked for more of the same. And yet, as recently as last week, the idea of a meeting in Venice was arousing neither hope nor enthusiasm. Washington was even considering how such tedious tasks could be done away with in the future.

True, the Venice conference, which swooped on the old city with its statesmen and hundreds of officials, journalists and policemen, has not led to any very spectacular results. It has given birth to a few nice and you may wonder whether it was necessary to use so many means to endure their gestation.

However--let u be fair--everything went off better than expected. Even though the economic decisions, which usually justify the holding of such conclaves, are more limited than the decisions made in Japan last year, they are more concrete and will therefore have some chance of proving successful whereas the Tokyo decisions have remained a dead letter. In the political sphere we have witnessed genuine efforts being made to ensure the West's unanimity and solidarity. If the Soviet aggression in Afghanistan had not occurred, it would have been necessary to invent it since it has helped greatly to erase differences and asperities. It is true that several of the participants are involved in important election campaigns--Carter first of all, obviously, and also Schmidt and, less urgently, Giscard d'Estaing. A Japanese representative was there while parliamentary elections were taking place in his country.

Mr Carter arrived in Venice with the firm intention of achieving a diplomatic success which would improve his electoral chances. As far as this is concerned, he will be able to boast of a firm albeit slightly overelaborate statement by the seven on Afghanistan. He will also be able to bring to his public opinion's attention the fact that he has restored good relations with the federal chancellor and cordial relations with the French president. However, at this point we are undoubtedly entering the sphere of appearances so dear to politicians.

For Mr Giscard d'Estaing the results are also positive. The approach, as they say, to the energy problem by the seven has been consistent with France's wishes. Above all, however, it will be remembered that the French president was the first to hear from Brezhnev about the partial withdrawal from Afghanistan. When he went to Warsaw Giscard d'Estaing expected neither gestures no "tipoffs" on the part of the USSR. When world peace is at stake, any other attitude is inconceivable and, in any case, would be unrealistic. However, the president was able to show his colleagues that keeping the door open for dialogue does not rule out firmness, while making it possible to insure face-to-face a better understanding of profound realities. "My talks with Brezhnev," he was able to say, "have opened the way for a first withdrawal."

Transcending these observations, however, it is nonetheless necessary to consider the future of this kind of conference. Initially, the aim of summits involving the seven most highly industrialized countries was to jointly consider the world's major economic problems and to engage in consultations with a view to increasing the effectiveness of national activities in the energy and monetary spheres, in the struggle against inflation and so forth.

The nature of these conferences has changed and the Venice meeting was a political forum at least as much as a venue for economic discussions. In view of this, however, you may think that the conference's composition was perhaps neither the most appropriate not the most effective. It is conceivable that the richest and (at least, in principle) most developed countries should consult with one another with respect to spheres in which their wealth and development can be of use to the world community. It would be less acceptable to many other countries, which could also have some claims to put forward, if the seven were to set themselves up as a kind of world political directorate.

On the other hand, it could be useful to turn the group of seven into the main element of dialogue between the industrial countries and developing countries, that celebrated North-South dialogue in whose favor France has been preaching in the wilderness. As far as this is concerned, you will note the extreme brevity of the part of the final communique devoted to the Third World.

Energy Cooperation Going 'Smoothly'

[Editorial: "1980 Horizons"]

[Text] The seven have taken a new step in Venice which continues and extends the actions taken 1 year ago in Tokyo. At that time they decided to fix a ceiling for oil imports until 1985. The statistics show that in all probability the wager will be won at least for 1980. Aside from Canada, which buys very little oil, imports promise to be lower than the ceiling fixed.

This success--due partly to the economic crisis which is reducing energy needs--give some credibility to the pledges made in Venice. The seven are henceforth going beyond a purely defensive strategy and have decided to substantially increase their production of forms of energy other than oil--production which in 1990 is to be between 750 million and 1 billion tons of oil equivalent, which is a considerable amount. This is to be achieved essentially by doubling the seven's coal production--and to a lesser extent hydrocarbons production--and speeding up their nuclear programs.

The goal of this effort is to break the link between economic growth and oil consumption, to free themselves from OPEC's protection and to restore the public's hopes of expansion and hence of lower unemployment even given the unfortunately plausible hypothesis of a continued rise in hydrocarbons prices.

Of course the pledge is not very precise. The seven hope to reduce the share of oil in their energy consumption from 53 percent to 40 percent in 10 years; however, they are being careful not to say what they are promising and who will do what. Mr Giscard d'Estaing simply indicated that, for France, the objective is to reduce oil's share from 56 percent to 30 percent in 10 years. At this stage the main concern is to collectively mobilize the Western camp for a long period; to help the Carter administration in particular to finally convince U.S. public opinion and Congress of the need to act.

Between Tokyo and Venice the seven have jumped cheerfully from the 1985 outlook to the 1990 outlook. Of course this reflects the feeling that the current problems are by no means temporary, that the second "oil shock" has hardly any chance of being controlled as the first was.

Another observation is that cooperation between the seven, in other words between the United States, Europe and Japan, is developing smoothly. It is long since that Mr Jobert slammed the door in Washington's face because he suspected Mr Kissinger of using the oil crisis to neutralize the Community's independent inclinations.

To monitor the implementation of the "independence" program and give it a minimum specific basis the seven have decided, on France's initiative--which is significant--to set up a group at high level, in other words a "trilateral" administrative structure. In the past such an approach would have been treated as a betrayal in Paris. Nobody now concludes that the EC, or what is left of it, is likely to suffer.

While trilateral cooperation is developing smoothly its external initiatives remain limited. With regard to OPEC the seven gave the impression in Venice of vacillating between harsh criticism and making advances. Fortunately a call for dialogue finally won the day. As far as the developing countries are concerned the seven are not ready and admit it; the suggestions made in Venice are only partial. The seven have given themselves 1 year, until the next economic summit in Canada, to deal with this matter seriously.

POLICE CLAIM NAR 'DISSIDENTS' KILLED MAGISTRATE

AU241640 Rome ANSA in English 1557 GMT 24 Jun 80

[Excerpt] Rome, June 24 (ANSA)--Neither the leftwing urban guerrillas of the Red Brigades nor the extreme rightwingers of the Revolutionary Armed Nuclei (NAR) were responsible for yesterday's slaying of Rome magistrate Mario Amato, but some NAR dissidents [were], police sources said here today. The sources said this could be deduced from an apparently authentic leaflet found here today after the usual anonymous telephone call.

The sources said that the leaflet contained enough of the truth to be issued by the real slayers of the magistrate rather than to be the "fruit of macabre imagination." According to the leaflet, the aim of the slaying was to spark off a debate on direct action within the NAR and other rightwing subversive groups. The authenticity of the leaflet was judged by the fact that it gave a precise description of the weapon used and supplied data on the identity of the owner of the Honda motorbike from which the shots were fired. Most of the leaflet was devoted to the NAR's alleged inaction. "Too often people hide behind phrases like, 'we do not have any arms,' or 'we don't have money,' but there is money and arms lying the streets [as received] and even a knife is enough to start," the dissident extremists said.

"There is no need for hideouts or big organizations. Three trusted fascist comrades and good will are enough. And if you can't find three, two will do and don't tell us you can't find two." The leaflet said that "we have carried out the death sentence against Assistant District Attorney Mario Amato through whose hands passed all the trials against the fascist comrades." "Today, he ended his squalid existence full of lead, yet others will pay," it ended.

Magistrates Strike Over Lax Security

AU251623 Rome ANSA in English 1600 GMT 25 Jun 80

[Text] Rome, June 25 (ANSA)--The magistrates at the state attorney's and investigating offices in Rome declared an indefinite strike on all court hearings today in order to obtain adequate security when carrying out their official duties. In Turin too, the magistrates downed pens for about an hour this morning to protest against the slaying of Rome Judge Mario Amato by neofascist hit-men on Monday.

Amato, who was the man in charge of all enquiries in Rome into extreme rightwing subversion, was the sixteenth judge to be hit by terrorists since 1974, when the Red Brigades kidnapped Genoa Judge Mario Sossi. He was the eleventh to be slain.

In a document sent to the higher council of the magistrature, the striking magistrates charged the state with "cynical inertia" in failing to take concrete measures to protect the personal safety of magistrates.

Amato who had repeatedly been threatened had asked for an escort and a bullet-proof official car but was told he did not need it. The slain magistrate also protested in vain that it was foolish to concentrate all investigations into neofascist violence into the easy target of a single man.

The striking magistrates pointed out that they had already advanced precise proposals for their safety in an assembly at the end of March. The document said that the "reiterated" threats against Amato, "which were brought to the notice of the competent authorities", were "such as to make the crime that then occurred both foreseeable and probable". According to the document, the boycott of court hearings would continue until concrete measures for the magistrates' safety are put into effect and until there is a strengthening of the police assigned to battling rightwing subversion.

The magistrates pointed out that Amato himself had always denounced the "absolute lack" of police forces tapped for this task. The document additionally asked the higher council to open an inquiry to ascertain whether there were any "specific omissions of relevance under the disciplinary aspect" in connection with Amato's death.

COSSUTTA URGES 'STRUGGLE' AGAINST DC AT PCI MEETING

AU250947 Rome ANSA in English 0820 GMT 25 Jun 80

[Text] Rome, June 25 (ANSA)--The Italian Communist Party (PCI) appeared to be sharpening its "aversion" to Premier Francesco Cossiga's rulling coalition as its Central Committee went into the second and final day of session here today. The PCI's decision-making body, like the leaderships of Italy's other major parties, is getting ready for the final round of negotiations that will decide the political makeup of regional, provincial and municipal governments up and down the peninsula. Local administrations in the country will be revised according to the results of the recent (June 8-9) elections as well as to the alliances that emerge from party negotiations. Communist Senator Armando Cossutta opened the PCI Central Committee meeting in Rome yesterday with a pitch for leftist unity between Communists and Socialists (PSI) and an attack against the Rome government and its leading component, the Christian Democrat Party (DC).

The "PSI", a partner to the Cossiga government, was the party that gained more votes for its relative standing as Italy's third largest party than any other single party in the recent poll. Badly split down the middle between Secretary Bettino Craxi's pro-government majority faction and a powerful leftist flank, the Socialists have a great deal of power in the Italian political line-up to sway the ideological composition of local administrations.

For its part, the Republican Party (PRI), the Rome government's third partner, has indicated its preference for re-producing the DC-PSI-PRI alliance on the local level but has also said that it would countenance other alliances for the sake of "local governability".

The opposition Social Democrats (PSDI) have been pushing for five party alliances between the DC, PSI, PSDI, PRI and (right of center) Liberal Party (PLI). After waging a strongly anti-communist campaign, however, the PSDI now appears willing to lend a helping hand to out-going leftist administrations between the PSI and PCI.

In his remarks to the PCI Central Committee, Cossutta noted that the Socialist Party's electoral gains "could become a success for the entire left", adding "or (they) could not". Cossutta also attacked the Cossiga government, whose "weakness", he said, "made it negative and dangerous". As for the DC, the PCI official called upon his party to sharpen its "aversion" to the ruling party's current "centrist majority" and to step up a "coherent and tenacious political and idealistic struggle" against its leadership. According to Cossutta, "advocates of a policy of dividing the ranks of the working and popular classes and of maintaining the DC's exclusive dominion over Italian society" held the reins of the ruling party at this time.

The DC's response to Cossutta's remarks did not take long in coming. The head of the party's leadership Secretariat, Antonio Gava, charged that Cossutta's speech to the PCI Central Committee yesterday testified to that party's "retrograde evolution". According to Gava, Cossutta confirmed the PCI's repudation of a policy of national solidarity between Italy's leading political forces both at the central and local levels. The DC official went on to say that the PCI's behavior lent validity to the moves that his own party has made since the elections to "tighten" ranks between the government parties and the Social Democrats and Liberals. This, according to Gava, is the only democratic path to take.

REPORTAGE ON OFFICIAL VISIT BY U.S. PRESIDENT

Royal Welcome on Arrival

LD251348 Madrid Domestic Service in Spanish 1300 GMT 25 Jun 80

[Excerpts] U.S. President Jimmy Carter, who arrived on an official visit to Spain at 1300 this afternoon, is now attending a luncheon at the royal palace being given by the king and queen of Spain.

The presidential aircraft arrived at Madrid's Barajas Airport from Belgrade, as we said, at 1300. The U.S. President and his wife Rosalyn were met by King Juan Carlos and Queen Sofia and, following military honors, they greeted the prime minister and members of his Cabinet, the presidents of the Congress and the Senate, and other dignitaries.

Finally we would add that President Carter's national security adviser Brzezinski, who is accompanying the U.S. leader on his trip to Madrid, will this afternoon hold an unscheduled meeting with Spanish Foreign Minister Marcelino Oreja. The meeting will be attended by: on the U.S. side, the State Department under secretary for political affairs and the U.S. ambassador in Madrid; on the Spanish side, the under secretary for foreign affairs, the director general for North American affairs and the Spanish ambassador in Washington.

King Hosts Luncheon

LD252331 Madrid in Spanish to Europe 1830 GMT 25 Jun 80

[Excerpts] U.S. President Jimmy Carter arrived in Madrid from Belgrade early this afternoon on an official 24-hour visit to Spain.

At the end of the luncheon held in the Palacio del Oriente, King Juan Carlos made a brief speech which he began by expressing his pleasure at the U.S. leader's presence in Spain. After referring to the fact that this year marks the 200th anniversary of the establishment of diplomatic relations between Spain and the United States, King Juan Carlos stressed that the Spanish people, who have their own voice and have never accepted the role of being an echo of others' voices, choose their friends with freedom. History bears witness to the fact that they never abandon them because, the king said, we are a loyal people.

King Juan Carlos said: We Spaniards are a peace-loving people. Spain opposes threats, the use of force, all forms of violence, and intervention in the internal affairs of states. Consequently, we have adopted a clear and firm stand condemning these interventions, in solidarity with the countries of the Western world to which we belong. But, within this firmness, said King Juan Carlos, we are and will continue to be in favor of detente and are ready to make our contribution toward a dialogue between East and West which would bring about a return to trust and cooperation between two worlds which cannot live in confrontation or return to the rigid lines of the cold war.

Further in his speech King Juan Carlos referred to the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe to be held in Madrid at the end of November: [Begin Juan Carlos recording] This is where we believe that the Madrid conference must play an important role in the bringing together of countries which need to safeguard and develop what was once christened the spirit of Helsinki. We believe that, together with the removal of tensions between East and West, great efforts must be made for us to become closer to the developing countries, for us all to build together a more just and humane international economic order in which less fortunate countries have the necessary possibilities for the development of their nations. [end recording]

Carrillo Describes Carter Talks

LD251915 Madrid Domestic Service in Spanish 1800 GMT 25 Jun 80

[Text] U.S. President Carter, who is on an official visit to Spain, and Secretary General of the Spanish Communist Party Santiago Carrillo had an informal talk at the end of the official reception at the royal palace. Santiago Carrillo told EUROPA PRESS that they discussed trivial matters, such as Jimmy Carter's Spanish pronunciation or how nice Spain is. The important thing, he added, is that the U.S. President was interested in talking to me in front of the whole world, thus denying what had been said in certain parts of the news media on this matter.

Gonzalez on Meeting With Carter

LD251930 Madrid Domestic Service in Spanish 1800 GMT 25 Jun 80

[By Felipe Sahagun]

[Text] This afternoon Jimmy Carter received Secretary General of the Spanish Socialist Workers Party Felipe Gonzalez for half an hour at the U.S. Embassy in Madrid. At the end of the meeting Mr Gonzalez, without getting out of his car, spoke to Spanish National Radio:

[Begin recording] [Gonzalez] It was--it's always said but it's true--a cordial meeting, fundamentally centering on Middle Eastern affairs, with some review of international politics in Central America and with a desire to stimulate bilateral relations. These were the main points.

[Question] Did he say anything about NATO?

[Answer] No. President Carter already said during the luncheon that he considers, just as we do, that NATO is a question that strictly requires a Spanish decision and concerns Spanish sovereignty. Consequently, despite the fact that they have their own viewpoint, they respect the fact that this is an internal decision and they will have their say afterwards.

[Question] Any important agreement?

[Answer] No. We were not aiming at reaching an agreement. [end recording]

President Carter wanted detailed first-hand information about the recent trip by a group of the Socialist International to Tehran, in which Mr Gonzalez participated. He was also interested in getting to know the Socialist leader's view on the process of change in Central America which is costing so many lives. But, the content of the talks aside, the really important thing about this meeting from 1800 to 1630 at the U.S. Embassy on Serrano St, is what it represents. For the first time in the history of Spanish-U.S. relations a U.S. President has met with a leader of the Spanish socialist party. As Gonzalez said on his way out of the U.S. Embassy, the aim was not to reach any agreement but mutual recognition of what the two men represent.

Media Figures Protest Visit

LD252226 Madrid Domestic Service in Spanish 1800 GMT 25 Jun 80

[Text] In connection with the U.S. President's visit to Spain a group of deputies, politicians and personalities from the worlds of Spanish culture and media have sent a letter to the foreign minister.

In the letter they accuse Carter of being responsible for the U.S. imperialist policy in Central and South America, for the escalation of the arms race, for the military aggression against the Iranian people, and for the attempt to nuclearize Europe. They also protest Carter's visit to Spain.

Youth Protests Outside Museum

LD252056 Madrid Domestic Service in Spanish 1800 GMT 25 Jun 80

[Excerpts] This afternoon President Carter spent an hour visiting the Prado Museum, accompanied by his wife and daughter. There was an incident outside the museum. A youth held up a placard which read: "Carter, jog back home." The youth was led away by the police. A reception was then held for Spanish political leaders at the U.S. Embassy.

Visit Ends

LD261046 Madrid Domestic Service in Spanish 0900 GMT 26 Jun 80

[Summary] President Carter left Madrid at the end of his 24-hour visit to Spain. He had a 15-minute meeting with King Juan Carlos in a lounge at the airport.

"According to sources in the Spanish administration, no agreement was reached during the visit. It was confirmed during the talks that there is a great coincidence of views on the international crisis, specifically, or particularly, on the problems of Afghanistan and Iran. The prospects for a new Spanish-U.S. agreement on friendship and cooperation were previewed."

After the farewell ceremony Prime Minister Suarez met with some of his ministers.

Joint Communique Issued

LD261048 Madrid Domestic Service in Spanish 1000 GMT 26 Jun 80

[Text] The governments of Spain and the United States have issued a joint communique summing up the visit of the U.S. President to our country in which they express their pleasure with the good (?state) of economic and political relations between the two governments. President Carter repeated his congratulations on the Spanish democratization process and on the progress of negotiations concerning our country's entry into the EEC.

In the communique the two heads of state express hope that the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe, to be held in Madrid next fall, will serve as an impetus to international trust and facilitate progress along the path to world peace.

They demand the complete withdrawal of the Soviet Union from Afghanistan in clear terms and judge terrorism to be the great threat to coexistence and democracy in the world at present.

New, 'Equal' Bilateral Relations

LD251835 Madrid in Spanish to Europe 1130 GMT 25 Jun 80

[Unattributed commentary]

[Text] The arrival in Madrid of the President of the United States is the next to the last stage of Carter's trip to Europe, a trip which has aroused fears and hopes, misgivings and effective solidarity. That is the way of politics in a democratic setting where the scene is dominated by change and sometimes unease.

The U.S. President's visit to the Spanish capital is a reality and an acknowledgement of the change which has occurred in the life of Spain, of the political maturity of the people, and of its full acceptance on the international scene.

After 27 years of agreements between the two countries, relations between them now have to be viewed in a new way; they must be viewed on a strict, equal footing and given new substance in keeping with the requirements of the times. To be able to view these relations on a new level, without letting prejudice or complexes intervene, will be the key to a new understanding which can no longer be based on identical premises for both sides. It is not enough that the United States might look favorably on eventual Spanish membership in NATO or on its full membership in the Common Market. What is important is that these two possible developments fulfill Spanish interests and fully conform, at the same time, with solidarity on a worldwide scale and with bilateral relations. Behind the toasts, the cordiality and the courtesy there must be serious talking so as to at least to trace the outline of a new understanding and arrive at a suitable starting point from which it will later be possible to negotiate and reach agreements fully acceptable to both sides.

Spain is now displaying an attitude which is both receptive and outgoing. Its geographical position, its relationship with and knowledge of the Arab world, and its close ties of understanding with Latin America form a more than sufficient offering for us to bring to the Spanish-American dialogue so that it might affirm our freedom and hence our fundamental solidarity with the free world.

PCE RESOLUTION ON 'RADICAL OPPOSITION' TO NATO MEMBERSHIP

LD251045 Madrid MUNDO OBRERO in Spanish 17 Jun 80 p 5

[Apparent text of resolution on foreign policy approved at the 15-16 June PCE Central Committee meeting: "Radical Opposition to Spain's Entry Into NATO"]

[Text] The PCE Central Committee vigorously protests Minister Oreja's irresponsible statements in which--on the eve of President Carter's visit to Spain--he announces that the Union of the Democratic Center [UCD] government intends to effect Spain's entry into NATO in 1981 by means of a simple majority vote in parliament.

1--The Communist Party reiterates its well-known stance of radical opposition to Spain's entry into NATO--a decision which would have the most detrimental consequences in all fields for our country.

It would mean breaking with a tradition of almost two centuries of a Spanish policy of neutrality, thanks to which our country did not take part in the two world wars despite the previous regime's relations with the Axis powers.

In the present situation, entry into NATO would entail handicapping the excellent prospects which Spain has, for historical and cultural reasons, for developing a simultaneously European and Mediterranean policy and privileged relations with the Arab world, Africa and Latin America. We could be a link, essential in international life today, between Europe and the Third World. This policy is also essential for tackling the serious energy problems.

No country has joined NATO for over a quarter of a century, and a certain balance of military forces between NATO and the Warsaw Pact, which is one of the factors of coexistence and peace, has thus been created. The Spanish Communists' stance on the need to dissolve the military blocs is well known. But as long as this aim is not achieved, it is essential to avoid upsetting the present balance, as would happen with Spain's entry into NATO.

The dialectic of the blocs would be intensified at a time of extremely grave international tensions and of increasing dangers of war, and a new factor of exacerbation of the European and international situation would be created, encouraging the arms race and creating new obstacles on the path of negotiation, detente and peace.

To announce that Spain will enter NATO precisely at a time when a trend toward an independent policy which would help surmount the tensions between the blocs and bipolarity--a trend recently manifested in Venice--is beginning to assert itself in West Europe, is to set us against the current of what is making progress in Europe and to diminish Spain's prestige. And we could pay for this in all the negotiations which concern our country.

We also denounce the falsification which Oreja perpetrated in his statements by mixing the issue of entry into NATO with that of recovery of Spanish sovereignty over Gibraltar and entry into the Common Market. We point out that these are separate and independent negotiations. Mr Oreja himself acknowledged this in the recent debate on Gibraltar in the Congress Foreign Affairs Committee.

2--The policy pursued by the UCD government in North Africa--apart from some positive but isolated and discontinuous gestures--has not been able to break with the policy of subordination to Moroccan expansionism, manifested in the unfortunate Madrid agreements. The announcement that Spain will join NATO means very gravely harming Spain's interests and the cause of peace in that area. Are we going to facilitate the Canary Islands' becoming a NATO base off the coast of Africa and attract the two superpowers' military rivalry toward this region so close to our territory? The consequences of an irresponsible policy of this kind could be extremely grave, to the extent of creating grave dangers to the peace of the Canary Islands' people.

The PCE reaffirms its support for a peaceful and just solution in the West Sahara, based on the UN resolutions and independence and self-determination for the Saharan people, and its solidarity with the POLISARIO and the Saharan Democratic Arab Republic. This is the only path which is in keeping with the interests of Spain and of peace and which takes objective reality into account. This is acknowledged by broad political and also military sectors in our country.

3--Oreja's announcement that Spain could recognize Israel with out the essential precondition that Israel end its aggression and withdraw from the occupied Arab territories means violating the stance defined by Spain to the United Nations in September last year. If carried out, this would entail very detrimental consequences for our relations in all fields with the Islamic world.

4--The way in which Minister Oreja made public a government decision of the utmost gravity for Spain runs absolutely counter to the government methods essential in a parliamentary system. It is a continuation of the former regime's practices of secrecy and cliquishness. Why was such an important matter kept silent during the recent parliamentary debate?

The Communist Party believes that, under the present conditions, there is a very urgent need for a Congress debate on Spain's foreign policy.

We address all political parties. We emphasize that, both for domestic policy reasons and because of the international situation, we are currently at the most inopportune moment for placing the issue of NATO at the center of Spanish politics. This would split public opinion when there are very urgent problems to be resolved. This would prevent a state foreign policy on issues vital for our country and on which broad agreement among the political forces is possible.

Because of all this, the PCE deems it essential that the issue of NATO remain frozen until a later time. This would make it possible to discuss within the constitutional framework and with the corresponding participation of parliament the renegotiation of the bilateral agreements with the United States, but separating the problem of NATO from this.

In any event, the PCE solemnly states that a majority vote in this parliament could in no way resolve an issue of such importance. As both the Spanish Socialist Workers Party [PSOE] and the PCE have repeatedly stated, a referendum would be essential for the country to express its opinion.

5--The Central Committee expresses its conviction that the coinciding stance on this matter which exists between the PSOE and the Communist Party will facilitate the development of an effective joint action, aimed at informing the country of the fateful consequences of joining NATO and at thus achieving a mobilization of public opinion which will help prevent this step which the UCD government is seeking to make.

6--The Central Committee emphasizes the crucial importance which the holding of the CSCE conference in Madrid next fall could have.

Despite the fact that Oreja's statements place Spain in a new situation, making it difficult for the present government to play the role of seeking initiatives and solutions and preparing positive results, the democratic, progressive and peace-loving forces in Europe rightly believe that this conference could represent a step toward surmounting present tensions and opening up paths of negotiation and peace. To this end the Communist Party will continue the efforts which it is making to ensure that the leftwing and progressive European forces define coinciding stances capable of mobilizing opinion and of contributing to the conference's success.

CARRILLO: UCD'S NATO STANCE USED FOR DOMESTIC POLICY AIMS

ID251417 Madrid MUNDO OBRERO in Spanish 19 Jun 80 p 9

[PCE Secretary General Santiago Carrillo commentary: "Domestic Policy Maneuver"]

[Text] A domestic policy maneuver--this is the only way to describe the surprising initiative of raising the issue of Spain's NATO entry now--an initiative which, prior to EL PAIS' publishing of Oreja's remarks was known only to Suarez and two ministers.

Later at the Viana Palace it was said that this was an attempt to force Giscard d'Estaing's hand, to prevent him from standing between Spain and the Common Market. If this was the reason Chancellor Schmidt has dealt a heavy blow to the Spanish Government by backing the idea of the "pause" proposed by the French president.

But that was not Suarez' intention. Feeling isolated in parliament following the Socialist censure motion, he tried to extricate himself from the difficulties surrounding him by "rushing forward." By shifting the political polemic from the field of the autonomies, the economic crisis, civil freedoms and security, Suarez believes that by placing it on another level--for or against joining NATO--he will recover enough support to enable him to continue governing until 1983. It is a coarse domestic policy move which demonstrates our government's provincialism and lack of political responsibility, which leads it to subordinate everything to retaining power, come what may.

Thus the Union of the Democratic Center presents itself as "the West's guardian against communism." The trouble is that this is an unpleasant reminder to us Spaniards of what we had time to soak up during the 40 years of the former regime.

Hitherto in this country no responsible political party had challenged the fact that Spain is situated in the Western area and connected to this area's defense through the agreements with the United States.

Within the left we Communists were perhaps the first to accept this situation, being concerned with a factor which has been very important in preserving peace: maintaining the strategic balance between the blocs until agreements are reached to eliminate them. And this, despite the fact that we do not like having foreign bases--U.S. or others-- on our territory, out of a sense of national dignity and not because Moscow tells us so. But we were willing to accept them until ever kind of base on both sides of Europe is eliminated and as long as they are not used to involve Spain in conflicts which the United States is waging in various parts of the world.

This being the case, there was a kind of tacit agreement between the government and opposition to shelve the NATO issue. And this tacit agreement was in line with the trend which is beginning to emerge in Europe, in favor of a European policy more autonomous from the two superpowers. Furthermore, it also granted Spain much more autonomy in its foreign policy, which is so important in the middle of the present crisis.

The government's present attitude was unnecessary from the objective viewpoint of Western interests and, unless it were a domestic policy maneuver, it would seem like servile compliance at a time when Giscard and Schmidt are disregarding us, the French are burning our trucks and the Moroccans seizing our fishing boats, that is, when a government worthy of the name should be taking other initiatives more consistent with Spain's dignity.

But even the domestic policy maneuver is short-sighted; it will create further serious problems for the country at a time when the existing ones are sufficiently worrying. By means of this inopportune topic the government could create a force of typically Third World tensions in Spain.

It is intolerable that such insanity and irresponsibility be displayed with the sole aim of clinging to power. Only those who have drunk from the Francoist troughs can accuse the PCE of being a tool in Moscow's hands, thus trying to turn the Communists once again into the scapegoat for their domestic policy maneuvers. They are as well aware as we of the falsity of this charge. So too are the editorial staff of DIARIO 16, to whose editorial yesterday we could reply: Whom do you serve? Certainly not Spain.

PSE'S MUGICA: NATO ENTRY NOT IN NATIONAL INTERESTS

LD260659 Barcelona LA VANGUARDIA in Spanish 17 Jun 80 p 17

[Mary Merida interview with Socialist Workers Party (PSOE) leader Enrique Mugica: "From Viewpoint of Spanish Interests, It Is Not Advisable To Join NATO"--date, place not given]

[Excerpt] Our Possible Entry

[Question] Since you have mentioned capacity for independence, and bearing in mind that you have never said you favored Spain's entry into NATO, do you still maintain this same stance and viewpoint?

[Answer] I still believe that it is not advisable to join NATO from the viewpoint of our interests. These interests, as far as the Maghreb, the Sahara and the Canary Islands are concerned, are not covered in NATO; nor is the issue of Gibraltar or our entry into the EEC. So joining NATO would have important diplomatic repercussions for us. Important relations with Latin America, the Middle East and Asia could be handled through Spain, and NATO would exclude us from these possibilities. Moreover, there are habits and customs of nonalignment here, and Spain has been outside the most recent major world conflicts.

[Question] However, it seems that our final integration into the West should involve our entry into both NATO and the EEC. Is that not so?

[Answer] It is true that we belong to the West and to the defense of the democratic world, but not through NATO. Specifically, there are deep doubts about membership in this armed force. You need only refer to the recent opinion poll in the journal DEFENSA and the information obtained to this effect among the company officers and NCOs [officiales y suboficiales] which must be taken very much into account. Moreover, in a democracy you must take people's wishes into account, and I believe that most of the country does not want us to enter NATO. It wishes to be well defended, but not through NATO. Even the Union of the Democratic Center is aware of this.

Independent Defense

[Question] So what kind of defense should be maintained?

[Answer] A defense which will be independent. And let this independence be linked with the defense of the West.

[Question] As a small power in the international context, can we afford to be neutral?

[Answer] The problem is not one of neutrality. Spain cannot be neutral, but there are paths between neutrality and alignment which can be traveled.

PRC MINISTER, OIL COMPANIES DISCUSS OFFSHORE EXPLORATION

OW260139 Hong Kong AFP in English 0039 GMT 26 Jun 80

[Text] London, June 26 (AFP)--Song Zhenming, the Chinese oil minister, has had a series of talks with British Petroleum (BP) and Shell in London over the past 10 days regarding offshore oil exploration in the Yellow Sea, it was revealed last night. The main subject of the discussions has been the year-long seismic survey by BP in the south Yellow Sea area over 30,000 square kilometers, where findings were understood to have been "encouraging," oil circles said. It is "too early" to think of China signing an oil exploratory contract with the two British companies, as the final report of the seismic survey is not expected to be completed for a few weeks, it is understood.

It has been "purely a fact-finding tour," according to BP. The Chinese minister has been looking at the different methods employed for offshore oil exploration, having visited North Sea oil installations and refineries. But the Chinese are known to be anxious to move to the exploratory stage, and oil sources believe that once the first studies have been completed, the next step will not be long delayed. Discussions have also taken place with the British oil companies concerning onshore cooperation, it was added. This could involve expanding new fields in China or providing expertise to develop existing sites. The minister, who leaves at the end of the week, was a member of the powerful trade mission headed by Vice Premier Kang Shien which toured Britain earlier this month.

THE DAILY TELEGRAPH: SUMMIT 'JUSTIFIES' ITSELF

[Editorial: "More Determination"]

[Text] This Venice summit has somehow contrived to justify itself, despite the odds that were given against it on the poor record of its predecessors. How did this happen? Only in part because of the rather wider range of perhaps a shade more convincing promissory undertakings to try harder. Bigger cuts in oil consumption over a longer period. No more oil-fired power stations (except exceptionally). More use of nuclear power (an impressive concerted lead to public opinions). The chorused exhortion to determined fiscal and monetary restraint should steel Mrs Thatcher and others who have to administer nasty medicine, although the recommended "dialogue among the social partners" is difficult with an opposition whose only interest is to thwart and thus destroy her. Good marks were also earned by abstention from populist lunacies, such as the proposed conferences with some or all of OPEC, the developing countries, the Russians and the United Nations. Dealing with OPEC as a whole from present weakness, as distinct from bilaterally with the more enlightened members, would have been an act of surrender. Bringing in the Russians would, if possible, be even more suicidal than soliciting their good offices in the Middle East.

But all this, after seven increasingly dangerous and extortionate years, still smacks, in the circumstances, of pussyfooting. Have the advanced industrialized nations not yet grasped that, unless they rouse themselves domestically and externally, it is a toss-up whether they become the helots of OPEC or the slaves of Moscow? A dawning hope that their representatives at Venice see this and are prepared to do more to prevent it--at the risk of unpopularity, or even sensing that public opinion would now respond to a strong lead--was the forthright declaration on Afghanistan. Their statement that all their plans for economic rescue and progress would be in vain unless the world was made safe against aggression of this kind must become an historic turning point from which there is no turning back. It gave, this time, that much more conviction to the economic litany. The leaders should have gone further and expressed their readiness to recognise a representative Afghan Government in exile.

RALLIS, KIPRIANOU DISCUSS CYPRUS PROBLEMS; NO DETAILS DISCLOSED

AT251848 Athens Domestic Service in Greek 1830 GMT 25 Jun 80

[Text] President Kiprianou visited President of the Republic Karamanlis at noon and exchanged views with him on the situation and the prospects in Cyprus.

In addition, Kiprianou had another meeting at the Foreign Ministry with Prime Minister Rallis. After the meeting, in reply to questions from the press, the prime minister expressed satisfaction with his talks with Kiprianou and with the further dealings on the Cyprus problem. He added: We do not consider it necessary to make public, however, the next steps we have decided upon and the details of the policy we must follow. Publicizing these dealings may not harm things but it certainly does not help and, consequently, the prime minister stressed, it is better to make them known only when we decide to do so.

In reply to a question regarding our country's return to NATO the prime minister said that this issue is very broad and is being examined from all aspects. The discussion, Rallis said, is being held between Greece and the Alliance and we expect that the Alliance will agree to the proposals which we submitted 2 years ago and which were accepted in principle by the NATO Military Committee.

In reply to another question, the prime minister expressed the wish for unity in Cyprus so that the difficult, as he described them, problems could be dealt with without other factors intruding. What always helps in critical moments, he characteristically stressed, is unity.

In conclusion, the prime minister said that after the departure of Kiprianou on Friday he will make a statement which will be some sort of message to the Cyprus people.

Cyprus President Kiprianou said in reply to a relevant question that he absolutely agrees with Prime Minister Rallis. I am also satisfied, he stressed, with our talks. There has been agreement, he said, both in assessments regarding the review of the entire issue and in decisions concerning further dealings on the issue. There is an identity of views, Kiprianou concluded, and certain decisions have been made. I agree that this is not the proper time to reveal what methods we shall follow in our next steps.

Later, Kiprianou attended a luncheon given in his honor by Prime Minister Rallis. In the morning the Cyprus president met with former Prime Minister Kanellopoulos, KKE [Exterior] Secretary General Kharilaos Florakis and independent deputy from Athens Mavros. NAP LEADER TURKES URGES RPP TO REMOVE ECEVIT FROM LEADERSHIP

[Text] Nationalist Action Party leader Alpaslan Turkes has said that the murderers of the NAP leader of Istanbul's Gaziosmanpasa District, his wife and daughter are enemies of the political system and want to divide the Turkish state and nation. At a press conference he held in Ankara, Turkes said that the communist and divisive murder gangs have reached such levels of monstrosity that they can raid a house and massacre an entire family. He said: Raiding a house in the middle of Istanbul in broad daylight and massacring the entire family--such savagery occurs only in wars--if at all. Criticizing RPP leader Bulent Ecevit's attitude regarding the political murders, Turkes said: Ecevit's provocations and his speeches that point to targets have played a great role in this loathsome family massacre.

Turkes said that the RPP members who are loyal to the unity of the state and nation and who believe in democracy have great duties regarding this issue. Turkes called on the RPP members to remove Ecevit and his friends from the party leadership. Stressing that the RPP was moving away from the Ataturkist line, the NAP leader said that if the Ecevit team is not removed from the party leadership then the party members who believe in democracy should resign from that party.

Turkes noted that the government was not taking any serious measures against the stepped-up attacks and murders against the NAP members. He called on the government to ensure the security of life of the party members by taking the necessary measures and to find the murderers. He said that the government should remember its promises of 7 months ago and purge the state from the communist and divisive militants. He added that the murders committed against the NAP members was strengthening the NAP's determination to fight communism.

PARTY LEADERS' STATEMENTS ON CONFIDENCE VOTE, INTERPELLATION

NSP Leader Erbakan

TA241518 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1400 GMT 24 Jun 80

[Text] In a second news conference he held at the parliament at 1500 today, National Salvation Party leader Necmettin Erbakan expressed his party's views regarding the proposed interpellation of the government. Erbakan announced that the NSP is in favor of conducting an interpellation at the National Assembly; however, the stand of the party regarding a vote of confidence will be determined at the end of the debate. Erbakan noted that the interpellation comprises the issues of anarchy and economy and that he views it beneficial to discuss these subjects at the Assembly.

JP Leader Demirel

TA241740 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1600 GMT 24 Jun 80

[Text] Prime Minister and Justice Party leader Suleyman Demirel has said: If we have the trust of the Assembly, we will continue to fulfill our duty. If not, we will not remain in power by force. In a speech during the JP National Assembly Group meeting today, Demirel asked the group members to vote in favor of placing the interpellation proposal submitted by the RPP on the agenda. Demirel continued: Let us vote in favor of including the interpellation proposal on the agenda. Let there be an interpellation. Let everyone say whatever they want. Let everyone reveal all they know. Then let us ask for a vote of confidence. If we have the confidence of the Assembly, then we will continue to fulfill our duty.

Demirel reiterated that his party is not seeking new support from anyone and that his government cannot implement the programs of the political parties which are supporting it. Demirel noted that his party assumed power in order to fulfill a duty. However, if it is not backed by parliamentary majority, then the government will not be able to continue in fulfilling this duty. Pointing out that it is (?erroneous) not to exert the necessary effort to maintain the government, Demirel said: We did make this effort. Noting that the government will either justify its criticized actions or amend them, Demirel added: Canceling the agreement with the IMF would be tantamount to facing shortages and difficulties again. We are not giving the IMF anything. The IMF is giving us a loan of $1.6 billion. In its agreement with the IMF, Turkey is by no means making any concessions on its prestige. The IMF is extending this loan to Turkey because it is a prestigious country. This is not something to be criticized. It should, on the contrary, constitute a positive factor.

RPP DESIGNATES KARAKAS AS NEW PRESIDENTIAL CANDIDATE

TA251439 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1300 GMT 25 Jun 80

[Text] The RPP joint parliamentary group decided during its meeting today to propose Deputy from Zonguldak Cahit Karakas as a presidential candidate. Replying to journalists' questions at the end of the joint parliamentary meeting, RPP leader Bulent Ecevit said: The majority of our group favored Mr Karakas. The result in favor of Mr Karakas is equivalent to the result obtained for Mr Batur on 13 April both from the viewpoint of the number of ballots and the amount of participation. The number of votes cast for Mr Karakas is almost the same. Pointing out that he notified Karakas about the preference of the group, Ecevit added that Karakas will be proposed as presidential candidate at the joint session of the Senate and National Assembly tomorrow.

As long as the candidacy of Faik Turun is still continuing, my colleagues and myself cannot promise Mr Karakas anything.

INTERIOR MINISTER BRIEFS CABINET ON HUNGARIAN BORDER INCIDENT

AU251418 Vienna WIENER ZEITUNG in German 25 Jun 80 pp 1-2

[Report on 24 June Austrian Cabinet meeting]

[Excerpt] The minister of the interior reported on the 22d session of the Austrian-Hungarian commission for investigating incidents at the state border, which had been convened by the head of the Austrian delegation as a result of the incident that occurred on 30 May 1980 at the Klingenbach-Sopron border crossing point. The Hungarian delegation immediately accepted the invitation so that the investigating commission was able to investigate the incident on the same day, 30 May 1980. The investigating commission agreed that the use of firearms by the Hungarian side against the semitrailer tractor, or the persons who were in it at the time, did not result in any violation of Austrian territory, and that there was no indication whatever of Hungarian border guards having trespassed on Austrian territory.

On the strength of the testimony of the only eyewitnesses, however, the Austrian delegation maintained the view that there had been a border violation when Hungarian border guards, who were standing on Hungarian territory, compelled two of the three refugees to return to Hungary. The Hungarian delegation, on the other hand, declared that these two persons were flung out of the vehicle before it had reached Austrian territory, and that they surrendered to the Hungarian border officials. Since the eyewitnesses were no longer available for questioning by the investigating commission, and an inspection of the scene of the incident did not bring any clarification either, the investigating commission was unable to reach agreement as to whether or not a border violation was committed by the Hungarian side.

DUTCH MINISTER FREEZES STUDENT EXCHANGE PROGRAM WITH USSR

[Own correspondent report: "No Students To Visit Soviet Union Next Year"]

[Excerpt] The Hague, 14 June--No Dutch students will take part in the Russian summer school in Moscow and no Dutch students will study in the Soviet Union in the 1980-1981 academic year. [Education] Minister Pais has decided to freeze a number of exchange activities between the Netherlands and the Soviet Union. In so doing the minister is deviating from the Cabinet's official stance on relations with the Soviet Union following the invasion of Afghanistan and the arrest of dissidents. In the wake of these events the Cabinet decided to cut top-level relations with Russia, which means no ministerial contacts, no visits by the Bolshoi Ballet and so forth. However, individual contacts between Dutch and Soviet citizens are regarded as important.

PARTIES VOICE REACTIONS TO CARTER VISIT

LD252156 Lisbon in Portuguese to Europe 1230 GMT 25 Jun 80

[Excerpts] President Jimmy Carter of the United States is due in Lisbon tomorrow morning, accompanied by his wife and daughter, for a 7-hour visit at the invitation of President Ramalho Eanes.

Reaction to the visit from the Portuguese political parties has been diverse, there being approval and agreement, for instance, from the parties which make up the Democratic Alliance and also the Socialist Party, and expressions of disapproval from the Portuguese Communist Party and the Popular Democratic Union [UDP].

While a Social Democratic Party leader stressed that Carter's presence will naturally be welcome and is important in strengthening the relations between the two peoples in the defense of their common values, and while the secretary for international affairs of the Socialist Party declared that the presence of Carter will not fail to have significance for the democratic values of the Portuguese people, the Communists underline that the visit is not opportune at a time when the North American administration is intensifying its policy of confrontation, arms race and cold war, apart from multiplying its attempts at interfering in Portugal's internal affairs. For its part, the UDP, the party with a sole parliamentary deputy, labels Carter's visit to Lisbon as an act of provocation and insult.

Huang Hua said that he does not think that international negotiations are realistic as long as Soviet troops are in Afghanistan. "To negotiate with the Soviet Union at the present time, while they have troops in the country, would be tantamount to accepting Afghanistan as a sphere of Soviet interest," he said. At the press conference at Copenhagen's Kastrup Airport the Chinese foreign minister further said that there is a need for a coordinated international policy toward the Soviet Union if the Afghanistan crisis is to be solved.

MINISTERIAL COUNCIL ISSUES JOINT COMMUNIQUE

TA261428 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1400 GMT 26 Jun 80

[Text] A joint communique was issued about 90 minutes ago in connection with the spring term meeting of the NATO ministerial council in Ankara. The joint communique points out that the efforts being made to solve Turkey's economic difficulties are satisfactory but that time is needed for these efforts to yield results. The communique says that it is necessary to continue to aid Turkey for a few more years. It adds that the NATO member countries are completely loyal to article 2 of the North Atlantic agreement which stipulates that economic differences among the member countries must be eliminated.

According to the communique, the NATO ministerial council decided to implement a program that aims at strengthening the scientific and technological capacities of Turkey, Portugal and Greece. The communique also says that the NATO ministerial council was pleased to see that a Turkish-Greek dialogue was continuing and that it hopes that the problems between the two countries are resolved peacefully. The communique points out that the developments in Southwestern Asia prove once again that the Alliance must strengthen its southeastern wing.

On the problems in the Mediterranean, the communique says that the balance of power must be protected in this region. On the Middle East problem, the communique says the NATO ministers believe that a just and lasting solution must be found for the Arab-Israeli conflict. The communique also points out that the developments occurring in the world during the past 6 months have greatly upset world stability.

Stressing that the Soviet Union's reasons for invading Afghanistan are unacceptable, the communique calls for the immediate, unconditional and total withdrawal of Soviet troops from that country. In the same section of the communique, the Soviet Union is called upon to respect Afghanistan's sovereignty, territorial integrity and the Afghan people's self-determination right. The communique also says that the invasion of Afghanistan greatly damaged political detente in the world.

MINISTERS COMMENT ON ACCOMPLISHMENTS AT END OF MEETING

ID261054 Hamburg DPA in German 0948 GMT 26 Jun 80

Genscher on East-West Relations

[Text] Ankara--Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt and Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher can set off for Moscow in a few days time with the West's full "backing." This was stressed by Genscher today after the conclusion of the NATO conference in Ankara. "A comprehensive agreement" was reached with the partners at the EC summit, the Western economic summit in Venice and the Atlantic pact session. This means that the preparations for the meeting with the Soviet leadership were optimal.

Genscher emphasized that the question of Germany's right to peaceful reunification was linked with the recent pledges of support for Bonn's policy of treaties with the East. This showed that there was an understanding in the NATO Alliance for the questions concerning Germany's division.

The goals which the Ankara conference set were unequivocally reached, according to Genscher. The Alliance declared its determination to implement last December's double decision, which envisages a modernization of medium-range nuclear missiles and a simultaneous offer of negotiations to Moscow.

The East must not get the impression that the West was lacking in determination as regards the implementation of its double decision and that the aims could be reached even without negotiations, said the federal foreign minister. It would not be possible to get Moscow around a conference table that way. He hoped the period of "lachrymose and self-torturing mediation" in the Western lliance was over.

According to Genscher, the present development within NATO should lead to the presentation of the French proposal for the holding of an (?all-European disarmament) conference at the next European security conference in Madrid. The proposal's "main" element is the fact that this conference should include the whole of Europe as well as the European part of the Soviet Union. This could help strengthen trust-inducing measures. All aspects of the final act of Helsinki should be treated equally in Madrid.

Genscher thought it was apparent at the Ankara meeting that everyone recognized the need to work out a "peace strategy" for the eighties, to pursue all disarmament proposals and to closely observe events around the NATO sphere.

He thought that a high level of agreement had been reached in Ankara in assessing international developments. All NATO states had recognized that the Afghanistan conflict was not merely an East-West but also an East-South probelm and that a strengthening of the Third World would be of great importance for stabilizing the international situation. Of importance was an equal partnership and not the "drawing" of the Third World "to the West's side."

Report on Muskie Statements

TA261445 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1400 GMT 26 Jun 80

[Report by TRT correspondent Kadri (name indistinct) on U.S. Secretary of State Edmund Muskie's news conference in Ankara on 26 May--recorded]

[Text] Edmund Muskie began by saying that the discussions were held amid solidarity and mutual understanding and were very successful. He said that the foreign ministers who participated in the meeting unanimously condemned the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan. He stressed that the Soviet Union must withdraw all its troops from Afghanistan. Only then could the United States and the USSR develop their relations, he said.

Pointing out that the Islamic Conference had also condemned the invasion, Muskie said that this was part of the international reaction to the invasion of Afghanistan.

Replying to a question, Muskie said that the NATO ministers did not discuss a direct aid to the Afghan resistance forces.

On the meeting to be held between the Turkish and Greek foreign ministers on Saturday, Muskie said that the two sides were approaching the problems with good will and that he hoped the problems would be resolved.

Mitsotakis on Meeting With Muskie

AT261330 Athens Armed Forces Radio in Greek 1100 GMT 26 Jun 80

[Text] In a meeting with Greek journalists, Foreign Minister Mitsotakis, who is in Ankara attending the work of the NATO meeting, referred to the private bilateral meetings he had had with his counterparts from other countries.

Mitsotakis stated that he is very satisfied with the meeting he had yesterday with U.S. Secretary of State Muskie, especially because Muskie accepted Greece's viewpoint that the two basic issues, the return to NATO and the bases, must be solved simultaneously.

As the Athens News Agency has reported, Mitsotakis stressed to both British Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs Lord Carrington and to his West German counterpart, Genscher, that the issue of Greece's return to military NATO is urgent and not subject to further delay.

Erkmen on Turkish-Greek Disputes

TA261316 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1300 GMT 26 Jun 80

[Text] Foreign Minister Hayrettin Erkmen said that the problems between Turkey and Greece should be solved through negotiations to be held at the political level from now on. Erkmen said that he will hold a meeting with Greek Minister of Foreign Affairs Konstandinos Mitsotakis on Saturday and that he will then put forward this proposal.

Erkmen held a news conference at the end of the NATO ministerial council spring meetings. Erkmen said that the approach to be adopted and the solutions to be sought for the problems between the two countries will be discussed at the meeting he will hold with Mitsotakis. He added that they will also try to eliminate the disagreements which occur from time to time, especially during military maneuvers.

Erkmen noted that Turkey is not opposed to Greece's return to the NATO military wing. He added that, on the contrary, Turkey believes that this return is necessary from the viewpoint of the strength of the Alliance. Erkmen said that this issue was not discussed during the meetings. Pointing out that the Cyprus issue did not directly concern Turkey or Greece, Erkmen said that the speedy solution of the Cyprus problem was important from the viewpoint of the Alliance as well as the interests of the two countries. Erkmen noted that he will participate in the EEC association council meeting to be held in Brussels at the beginning of next week and that Turkey will apply for full membership in the EEC before the end of this year.

CSU DEFENSE EXPERT SCORES GOVERNMENT FOR NATO 'CRISIS'

DW261206 Munich BAYERNKURIER in German 28 Jun 80 p 5

[Article by Ekkhhard Voigt, CSU Bundestag deputy and land chairman of the CSU defense policy working circle: "The Fault of Helmut Schmidt"]

[Text] A crisis in NATO is a crisis for our security. The confidence in the Alliance has been considerably disturbed, that is to say, not only in the relations of the Americans with the Europeans in general but also, and particularly, in the relationship with the Federal Government in Bonn. Chancellor Schmidt and the SPD are culpable of this acute crisis. The exchange of letters between Schmidt and Carter shortly before they planned to get together in person anyway is reminiscent of the exchange of cables and notes between quarreling states rather than of deportment among allies. No question about it: Carter and the United States regard with open suspicion Bonn's lone actions and its advance concessions vis-a-vis Moscow. Washington obviously fears that Schmidt's proposals concerning the suspension for the time being of the deployment of the nuclear medium-rante missiles in East and West may well again shake up the laboriously attained consensus of the NATO states and fan the disturbing potential of the Soviets and their auxiliary troops in Europe against the closure of the arms gap.

This is all the more regrettable since Spain's intention to join NATO not later than 1983, which has come at just about the same time, on the whole must be assessed favorably. Spain in NATO--this idea also raises problems. What this would require in the first place is that the Spanish Government clearly prevails over the leftist cartel of the Spanish Socialists and Communists. Socialist leader Gonzalez has announced resistance already. Through experience we cannot expect his political godfather Willy Brandt or the Socialist International to exert influence on him for a NATO recommendation. Nor can we expect Chancellor Schmidt to persuade his friend Giscard d'Estaing to give up his brusque attitude toward Spain's EC membership. Spain's accession to NATO and to the EC would strengthen Europe. Spain's strategic significance owing to its hinterland and, above all, with a view to the Mediterranean, is evident. Furthermore, Spain veritably offers itself as a training ground for NATO exercises, including those of the Bundeswehr.

This is why the crisis of confidence in NATO triggered by Schmidt is all the more regrettable at this very time. Meanwhile, President Carter's attitude, at first denied and then confimred with audible lamentation by the Federal Government, is not surprising at all, considering the previous history of the NATO decision on the closure of the arms gap. Was it not the Jusos [Young socialists' organization] who assailed the decision? And was it not the Berlin SPD party congress which made up its mind on a very conditional and reversible "yes" only after endless discussions?

No sooner had the Americans calmed down then Chancellor Schmidt sounded off as early as April that East and West should desist for several years from stationing additional medium-range missiles in Europe. Schmidt's letter to Carter after the abortive attempt to liberate the hostages probably played a role, at least a climatic one. This letter could have been taken only as an impudence, for apart from condolence for the victims it lacked any reference to concrete solidarity, for instance by the statement that the United States had been justified to undertake this operation.

Moreover, unnoticed by the public the Soviet Union has created in addition to the SS-20 missile and the backfire bomber a new, modernized generation of nuclear short-range and medium-range missiles which are expected to go into effect and to be delivered to the armed forces soon; the SS-21 and SS-23 missiles. NATO would have the potential to create a certain counterbalance against the SS-21 and SS-23 by modernizing its short-range arms, but with regard to the new SS-22 missile this possibility does not exist. It is as good as invulnerable because of its mobility; with its 500 kilotons it has the explosive effect of 30 Hiroshima bombs, and with its range of 1,000 kilometers it is tailored for nuclear war against the Federal Republic of Germany. Serial production and supply to the troops is slated for early 1981. No equivalent weapon exists so far in the West.

A new and enormous threat is growing here which will by far surpass the current preponderance of the Soviet Union--3:1 in the field of nuclear short-range arms and 4:1 in the field of medium-range arms.

This forbids all plans to discontinue NATO's modernization of medium-range arms or to slow it down, even if the Soviet Union were prepared to stop its SS-20 production or scrap some of these arms, although no chance exists in this respect anyway. And that even less because Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt has envisaged a stop to NATO's modernization decision of December 1979 prior to his Moscow talks. Such a halt would be a final farewell to the arms balance principle and a continuation of the Soviet preponderance. This is already expressed in the SPD election campaign program, and it is being confirmed by Wehner's perverse-demagogical term "closing the arms gap spiral" ["Nachruestungsspirale"]: He believes he must warn the West against it. Without an arms balance Europe cannot be defended any more, and we will become exposed to political blackmail.

The London International Institute for Strategic Studies has just stated that the Soviet Union had planned the Afghanistan invasion "at least 4 months in advance," that the Soviet leadership demands further armament of its already enormously strong naval units, and that the Soviet Union's preponderance in the field of arms continues to grow dangerously.

The United States naturally closely observes the role played by the Bundeswehr in Germany. The events that have taken place in connection with recruits taking the oath on Bremen certainly will have had a psychological effect on the Americans. They will also be concerned by the book "Combat Field Central Europe, the Danger of Too Much Technology in the Armed Forces," written by Brig Gen Dr Franz Uhle-Wettler. The general proves that the current army structure with its concentration on highly technical mechanized units will lead to a tactical, logistic, financial, political and strategic blind alley. It must be said in this connection that all this is not the fault of our soldiers, but the result of the fact that they have either not been at all trained for these tasks or in an insufficient way. The faults lie with the training conception and not with the soldiers. This, too, is after all the fault of the Federal Government and its supporting parties.

The Federal Government is therefore asked to face the facts which obviously threaten our security. It is urged not to cover up the facts with a view to the forthcoming election campaign--because this does not fit the theory of detente--but to eliminate the shortcomings as quickly as possible.

This is the only way in which the shaky confidence between the Federal Government and President Carter can be reestablished, and this is the only way to master the NATO problems. He who does not do this will not only be acting in a grossly negligent way, he will much rather intentionally be putting the security of the people in the free world at stake.

PAPERS COMMENT ON GISCARD ANNOUNCEMENT ON NEUTRON BOMB

DW270901 Cologne Deutschlandfunk Network in German to East and West Germany 0505 GMT 27 Jun 80

[Press review on French President Valery Giscard d'Estaing's 26 June press conference]

[Text] HANNOVERSCHE NEUE PRESSE notes: At first the bombshell went off only as a bit of news. It had been rumored for quite some time that Paris possessed the most vicious of all nuclear explosives, the neutron bomb. Ever since De Gaulle condemned the classical army to the single role of an extra, the French have build a nuclear strike force which might even scare the Russians. While heated discussions on the neutron weapon continue in the Federal Republic and in the United States, Paris has already developed, tested and built the weapon. This is no reason for France's friendly neighbors to express jubilation since a French retaliation strike would hit them the most, no matter what happens.

Dortmund's WESTFAELISCHE RUNDSCHAU argues as follows: The French president's cool hint is the latest card hand in the armament and disarmament poker game between East and West. At the moment the auspices are anything but favorable: The Soviets continue to produce their SS-20 missiles on the assembly line, and in the United States the wish seems to grow to meet this challenge head on and to force Moscow into swearing the pauper's oath by means of an arms race to the point of collapse.

MANNHEIMER MORGEN advocates this view: A new deepening of the cleft between the United States and Western Europe seems to be looming ahead. At a time when U.S. lack of concentration and leadership weakness are no longer denied in earnest, France and the Europeans, with the bomb foremost as a political weapon, gain a new weight of their own which can hardly be ignored in future disarmament negotiations.

The LEUTKIRCH SCHWAEBISCHE ZEITUNG stresses the following points: By this fundamental decision France is probably the first Western nuclear power to make its nuclear arms arsenal more effective by means of neutron projectiles. Giscard d'Estaing's statement is addressed to Moscow as a warning that France may well decide on serial production soon. Giscard d'Estaing, too, is alarmed by the Soviet missile power. His anxiety is also reflected by the decision to develop a new, mobile means of delivery.

CARTER, MUSKIE TRIPS SHOW U.S. 'RESOLVE

DW270845 Hamburg ARD Television Network in German 2045 GMT 25 Jun 80

[Excerpt from Gerd Knoxelmann commentary]

[Text] Carter is showing interest in Europe: He has come in person instead of sending others. The timing of the trip makes sense. While Carter is in the West of Europe, his secretary of state has become an important factor for Western solidarity at the other end. At the NATO meeting in Ankara he moved into the foreground with his physically powerful appearance as a politician who proposes to heed principles of common-sense and moderation, who keeps doors open without giving his partners the feeling that he wants to duck out through these very doors.

The top U.S. politicians have managed to perform the feat of waging an election campaign as well as of making an impression on the Europeans. To consider the Americans irresolute in world politics would be a mistake; in fact, it would be foolish.

GISCARD ANNOUNCES NEUTRON BOMB TEST, VIEWS CURRENT ISSUES

NC261526 Paris AFP in English 1521 GMT 26 Jun 80

[Text] Paris, June 26 (AFP)-- France has carried out its first neutron bomb tests, President Valery Giscard d'Estaing announced here today. He told a news conference that a decision to produce the new weapon in its current form "may be taken from 1982-1983" with a decision two years later on a later design. The president also announced that the last meeting of the French Supreme Defence Council had decided to plan a mobile strategic nuclear launcher. Technical decisions for this might be made by the end of this year, he said.

[Press conference given by French President Giscard d'Estaing in the Elysee Palace in Paris--live]

[Excerpts] [Giscard] Ladies and gentlemen of the press, during this ninth press conference [words indistinct] I will reply to questions which you will be kind enough to ask me about current issues, and I will also review the principal trends of action, led by myself, so that these trends can be well understood, notwithstanding tumults and the diversity of events. I remind you that these trends--as far as external affairs are concerned--have to do with independence, peace and security, and in domestic affairs involve freedom, justice and the economy, as well as social progress. For the sake of clarity I will answer first questions concerning the international situation, next questions concerning defense issues, then questions concerning social and economic prospects, and, finally, questions concerning the political situation and the problems of our society and culture. This is how I intend to answer your questions. I think it is Mr (Fernbach) who would like to ask the first question.

[Question] Mr President, in asking the first question I am a little anxious, because I read this morning and I have just heard it said that you would answer all questions except one, which is in fact my question. To avoid this risk I shall quote you here: 6 years ago you told us the world was miserable because it did not know where it was going, and that if it did know where it would find out it was heading toward a catastrophe. A few weeks after meeting Mr Brezhnev in Warsaw, a few days after meeting Mr Carter in Venice and a few days before meeting Mr Schmidt in Germany, do you know where we are heading?

[Answer] France's diplomatic action is one which is aimed at dealing with current problems and answering the difficulties faced by the world. [Words indistinct] the character of this diplomatic action which often, deliberately or not, leads to a certain mixed judgement. First, of all France's foreign policy is independent, but it is neither neutral nor neutralist. It is independent, and this is well known. Moreover, I note that during recent events [passage indistinct]. France's foreign policy is not neutral, because we are part of an alliance and should the clauses of the Alliance be threatened it goes without saying that France will fulfill its obligations. It is not neutralist, because France is a democracy of freedom and it wants, everywhere in the world, to help the success and development of democracies and of freedom. Of course it does this through peaceful means.

A second element of our foreign policy is to try to correct an anomaly, and that anomaly is the decline of Europe's role in the world, an anomaly which has causes--essentially the inheritance of the last two world wars-- but you will find this concern everywhere that France should strive to manifest Europe's existence in the world.

Finally, our foreign policy starts off from the idea, Mr (Fernbach),--and this answers your question--that at the present time possible solutions do exist to the problems which arise. And this does not mean that at the present time the actions which are undertaken necessarily go toward these solutions. But as we believe that these solutions exist, we have a duty to propose them. I will reply to your questions in this matter on the various situations of conflict or tension in the world.

[Question] [name indistinct] Spanish news agency....

[Question--interrupting] Joseph Paletou, France INTER, speaking. Politicians of the majority and of the opposition are saying that France should help the Afghan resistance [passage indistinct] the Venice summit.

[Answer] While we are on Afghanistan, are there any other questions concerning Afghanistan?

[Question] (?What connection do you make) with regard to Afghanistan, your Warsaw summit and with the first withdrawal of Soviet troops from Afghanistan? I should also like to ask you if there was any discussion with Mr Brezhnev during the Warsaw summit of a timetable for the withdrawal of Soviet troops from Afghanistan?

[Question] Together with this question, allow me, [name indistinct] of the Polish press, LE VIE DE VARSOVIE, allow me, Mr President, to ask this question: How do you evaluate the usefulness of your recent meeting with Mr Brezhnev in Warsaw?

[Question] (Bernard Edmonds), CBS News. Mr President of the Republic, what do you think of the proposal made in Belgrade by President Carter of finding a provisional arrangement to resolve the Afghan crisis? Does it resemble your ideas on the matter, and what needs to be done to settle the crisis?

[Answer] I will reply, if you don't mind, to this first round of questions on Afghanistan. There may be one or two additional questions concerning what I will say, to which I will reply at that time. Since the beginning, what has been our attitude and our analysis of the events in Afghanistan? First of all, our attitude is known to you: We consider that the intervention of Soviet armed forces in Afghanistan was unacceptable, and that it was therefore necessary to act in order to put an end to it. [words indistinct] Soviet Armed Forces from that country. From the start we thought that this intervention [words indistinct]. The first was the resistance of the Afghan people, a people with a tradition of independence and [words indistinct] during its history against external aggression wherever it came from.

The second reaction was the reaction of the international community, which was expressed--as you know--very widely, since in the United Nations 104 countries declared themselves opposed to the intervention, and twice in Islamabad almost all the Islamic countries repeatedly declared their condemnation of the intervention.

The third reaction was the effect of the intervention on the policy of detente. Here it was seen that there was already an initial consequence, which was that of the deferment of the ratification, nonetheless desired, of the SALT II agreement by the United States, and the pursuit of this intervention by bringing in a using military force would have made it (?even) more difficult to follow the policy of detente. This was our analysis from the beginning, and it was this analysis that I explained to Mr Leonid Brezhnev during our useful talks in Warsaw. These talks were brought about by an initiative from Mr Edward Gierek. We had exchanged a few thoughts between ourselves previously, and their principle aim was to do what must be done in a crisis, that is, to reestablish communication and open an exchange of views in depth on the situation among the main partners.

Thus I pointed out to Mr Brezhnev what our analysis of the situation was and what kind of reactions the Soviet Union was getting or would get. And I pointed out that there were two ways of acting to resolve this situation: On the one hand, to establish a timetable for the withdrawal of Soviet armed forces and then to begin this withdrawal, particularly in the Kabul region, since the reason the Soviets were giving was that of infiltration on the borders, which did not justify the presence of large armed forces in the capital. Moreover, I indicated that the solution could only be political, and I indicated what I felt were the main lines on which this political solution should be sought.

So I will remind you what are for us the three facets of the political solution: This political solution must involve the total withdrawal of foreign armed forces from Afghanistan; it must enable the Afgnan people to choose their future themselves, including its political expression, like all peoples of the world and in particular like peoples who have a tradition of independence and the national pride of the Afghan people; and third, Afghanistan must be reestablished in its traditional historical position, which was that of a non-aligned country who cannot constitute a threat to its neighbors and cannot be used as a [word indistinct] base to create any such threats to its neighboring states.

We have (?learned) of the decision to withdraw certain armed elements from Afghanistan. This decision was communicated to us, as you know, on Friday evening, and in the communication reference was made exclusively to a followup of the Warsaw meeting. (?Now you can) judge this decision, regardless of its limited scope as regards numbers--although the number is nonetheless significant--as a gesture in the right direction, of answering requests made to the Soviet Union. [several words indistinct] The first consequence is the recognition by the Soviet Union that it is in Afghanistan that one must first act to put a stop to the deterioration of international relations, because [words indistinct] the wide publicity given to it clearly shows that the Soviet Union [words indistinct] intended to put a stop to this deterioration beginning with Afghanistan. Moreover, the fact that this decision was taken and given such wide publicity means that it would be very difficult and would entail heavy consequences to go back. And, consequently, this involves an option in the seeking of a political solution, because, given the level of those means that still remain in Afghanistan, it is clear that it is solely through political means that a solution can be found.

Well then, to answer first your question: Should a country like France give military aid to the Afghan rebellion? The answer is a negative one: France is in favor of a search for a political solution. Second: Is there a further timetable for the withdrawal of the Soviet Armed Forces? No, not as far as we know, but in the request which we presented to the Soviet authorities, we pointed out that what is essential is a timetable for a withdrawal, beginning with an initial gesture but leading on to a timetable.

The third question: What do we think about approaching a political solution? I would say to you that it seems to me that at the present time one must not seek a temporary political solution, I believe on the contrary that a definitive solution should be sought since I do not see how a temporary solution would be possible since--being temporary--it would necessarily involve allowing the maintenance of some Soviet forces in Afghanistan, and therefore the continuation of the resistance or fighting operations and thus maintaining tension in the region. On the contrary, a comprehensive solution should be sought. That comprehensive solution contains the elements which I indicated a short while ago and should lead to the total withdrawal of the Soviet Armed Forces and to Afghanistan's heterogeneity being acknowledged. It is a fact that at the present time the attitudes toward this political solution are still very far off; this has to be noted. But the fact that from now on an option is appearing of this political solution being sought is a situation which should be used and exploited and in which certain initiatives are possible.

[Question] [name indistinct] You have recently met Chancellor Schmidt. I think that he will meet Mr Brezhnev [words indistinct] and you yourself, do you agree with the initiatives he is (?expected) to take?

[Answer] First of all, I consider that it is quite normal for Chancellor Schmidt to go to Moscow and to do so within the framework of periodic consultations which now exists, as you know, between the FRG and the Soviet Union. I also think that this visit is useful since it will enable the Soviet leaders to get to know better the points of view of great European states and of the FRG on existing problems and situations; and finally I have every reason to have confidence in Chancellor Schmidt, to expect that he will explain and support ideas in accordance with the statements we have made in common, namely the French-German statement on Afghanistan made, let me remind you, at the last French-German summit.

[Question] Mr President, I am a Polish correspondent, from TRYBUNA LUDU. During the meeting in Warsaw there was much talk about the middle and small countries which, while remaining true to alliances in which they participate, can and should play a certain role in international life. I would like to ask you in this context what is your appreciation of Polish efforts to preserve peace, international dialogue and cooperation?

[Answer] We observe the great and good efforts made specifically by Poland to maintain close contacts between those who endeavor to seek solutions at present of the difficult problem of East-West relations, and more precisely extra-European relations. You know that as far as Europe is concerned we carry out a policy of the Community and unity of Europe, of which we are a part. But I want to say emphatically that there should be another European circle and that this circle [words indistinct] a part of Europe, and, of course, Poland. We shall have the opportunity to receive the Polish foreign minister in a few days' time. I am going on a working visit to Warsaw in September and this proves better than through words the importance attached by us to the role of Poland in the maintaining of an open dialogue between different parts of Europe.

[Question] [words indistinct] on recognition of the PLO, its participation in peace negotiations as a partner and its right to self-determination. These statements resounded around the world, and your formula was recently adopted at Venice. Mr President, we would like to know what major reasons have prevented you from carrying out an official and historic visit to Israel. Do you not think, Mr President of the Republic, that it is necessary and even of value to study on the spot the delicate and complicated problems which affect Israel's security?

[Answer] Are there any other questions on the Middle East?

[Question] (Guy Burel) of PANORAMA DE MEDECIN: Mr President of the Republic, a certain amount of feeling was aroused in France, in Israeli circles, not least in medical circles, following this visit and the statements you made. What do you think of these very strong feelings which were aroused in France?

[Question, from unidentified journalist] Mr President, on 20 June last the Paris HERALD-TRIBUNE published an article by Mr James Reston who said that he had paid you a visit and gave an account of this meeting, without quoting you however. What was striking about this to those who are interested in the problems of Franco-Israeli relations was notably when you were said to have told Mr Reston that Israel's inflation is extremly dangerous not only to the economy of Israel but also to world security [words indistinct].

[Question] (Ahmed Klibi) of Tunisian Radio and Television: The Arab world has noted with satisfaction the results of your diplomatic efforts since your last journey to the Middle East. It has also noted with satisfaction that at last there should be established in the European Community and in the free world a consensus concerning the inalienable rights of the Palestinian people to a country and a state. However, it must be admitted, Mr President, that the Arab world remains in some doubt and it asks itself, and it asks you, how long must we wait for the diplomatic actions which are proper to bring to the Israeli Government the conviction that there can be no peace without talks and negotiations for peace, in the first place only between the two principal belligerents, the Palestinian people with at its head the PLO and the Israeli people with at its head the government that is installed there?

[Answer] Any other questions?

[Question] (Al-Ahaoui), of the paper AR-RIYAD: Will the Venice declaration be followed by a concrete initiative at the United Nations?

[Question] [name indistinct] of AN-NAHAR of Beirut: Mr President, what have been the points of convergence and of divergence on the Middle East question during your talks with President Carter in Venice?

[Answer] Well then, I shall reply to these questions. Are there any others on the Near East? It will enable me to reply at greater length. This is a very important issue which has a very strong emotional content for all parties concerned, as I was able to see during my trip in the region last year. And on this problem, as I said just now, we think there are solutions to the present problems but this does not mean that deeds are going in the direction of these solutions.

The solution to the Middle East problem lies in the reconciliation of two rights, both fundamental rights, and this is moreover what gives this problem all its emotive content. The first right is the right to security of the State of Israel, a right of security which exists for all states in the world but which naturally has a deeper sense and which responds to a more prudent sensibility among a people deprived of their homeland for two thousand years and which has just returned to its homeland and reconstituted its state since 1947. The other right is the right to existence of the Palestinian people, a right which is also universal. This people exists; it is a multitude, and at present as you know they are living in exile and deprivation far from home. They aspire to an existence as such, and this right must be recognized for them without any other restriction except that relating to the existence of recognized frontiers of neighboring states.

Thus we are in a position in which there are two rights to reconcile. Is the reconciliation of these two rights possible or not? I am convinced that it is possible. I am convinced that it is desirable. I am convinced that its present solution represents in fact a sort of race to the abyss, since time is not working in favor of the reconciliation of these two rights. And we are lucky at the moment that up to now the most modern weapons have not made their appearance in the region. They could be introduced at some time and would then give a tragic dimension to the confrontation of these two rights. Moreover at the moment we are witnessing a certain isolation [words indistinct] of the State of Israel [words indistinct] for a state which has just been reborn, but it is no longer a solution [word indistinct] thus a solution must be found [words indistinct] the search for this solution.

How, then, is one to approach this solution? In fact, regarding the approach to this solution, for several years now we have glided away from it. It is that supplied by Resolution 242. Curiously enough, while I was in the Middle East I was reproached by certain papers for not having quoted this resolution when in fact it is constantly referred to by France. It carries as its central point--and I come back to it--the evacuation of occupied territories.

In reality, the approach to the problem is through the evacuation of Arab lands occupied in 1967--territories which are truly Arab and I recall it here: There are at the moment 783,000 Palestinians in Transjordan. There is a total population in Ghaza--Ghaza and Transjordan--a population of 1,225,000 Palestinians, and there are in these same territories 14,000 Israelis. That is 1 percent. These are occupied Arab territories and they have to be evacuated. From the moment these territories are evacuated the problem of the organization of the Palestinian people can be treated in a positive manner, because they are a people who need organizing [words indistinct] next to internationally recognized borders, Israel's borders of 1967. [words indistinct] in that respect that when we speak of "secure" and "recognized" borders, internationally recognized borders, we cannot and shall never be able to include the occupied territories.

This means that in order to have the borders recognized, the evacuation of occupied territories must take place. Starting from this situation it then becomes possible to seek peaceful relations between the State of Israel and the neighboring states. Moreover, note that this is what happened in that part of the Camp David process which concerned relations between Egypt and Israel. What were the negotiations? They dealt with the pace of the evacuation of occupied territories and the reestablishment of normal diplomatic and political relations as the evacuation was being carried out. Thus, the part which is positive within this process and which enabled the settlement of the historic dispute between Egypt and Israel starts indeed from the evacuation of territories so that the problem can be settled. I add that we will not be able to solve such a problem unless one thrusts aside violence, extremist actions, the exclusives.

And this is where the stand of France and of the European Community emerges. What does France do? Everyone knows France has no interest, in the exact meaning of the term, in the region. Hints given here and there to the fact that our policy is supposed to be dictated by oil considerations are absurd. The oil regions are beyond this region and France has been concerned for a long time with the Middle East problem, long before any oil difficulties occurred. It is because France knows it is expressing a just stand regarding this topic. It is very important if one wants to avoid a race toward the abyss that there should be one or some who should express a just judgement or proposal. That is why we appreciated the unanimity reached together with our European partners in expressing this just stand. I point it out because it is important that this unanimity was reached without any difficulties. There was no need to impose the viewpoint of one party on another. Hence, the statements we made and which are included in our text: the right to security for Israel guarantees in which the EEC countries could possibly participate; the right of the Palestinian people to what we have called "full self-determination"; the totality of these provisions, and PLO participation in the negotiations we have reached [words indistinct] and reflecting a joint stand of the European countries.

So how is one to approach the problem now? It is necessary that thought be given to the evacuation of the occupied territories [words indistinct] the recognition that this evacuation must happen, negotiations later on the timetable for the withdrawal, and then notice to be taken of the aspiration of the Palestinian people to exist and to organize themselves. Reproaches are leveled at us sometimes concerning the patently obvious recognition of the fundamental and evident right of the Palestinian people to self-determination, like all peoples of the world. They tell us: But they do not recognize the existence of the neighboring state. I remind you that we have always said that this self-determination must be implemented within the context of a general peace settlement, which means that it should come at a time when the peace settlement consolidates the existence of all the states of the area, particularly, of course, Israel.

The third point is the need for Israel's security. I am well aware that in Israel people often ridicule the value of international guarantees, and refer to situations in the past.

I would warn them nevertheless of the fact that in the future the threats which might affect Israel's security are not necessarily threats relating to the particular drawing of a border or of a stream or a river, whose narrowness, moreover, I was able to measure myself, but relating much more to the introduction into the area of new weapons, highly powerful and of far greater range. I told you that in the past--I will not go any further today, but I have had the opportunity personally to make arrangements for opposing the introduction of such weapons in the area while negotiations or contracts are in force on this point, so these guarantees can exist.

And last, when this has been done, it will be possible to establish positive political relations among all the states of the area, to turn round the climate which has existed since 1947-1949, and to make it an area of progress and cooperation in the world. So that is our view on these four points. I could go on about the proposals which could be made, but I reserve it for our diplomatic actions. Nevertheless, there will be a followup to the Venice conference, that is the Presidency of the European Community, of the Council of Ministers of the European Community, will make contact with all the parties concerned to explore their views [words indistinct].

[Question] [name indistinct]: On the enlargement of the European Community you said at the beginning of the month when addressing the Chamber of Agriculture that you have proposed a time of reflection before opening the doors of Europe to Portugal and Spain--you did not exactly name Portugal and Spain but that was the general idea. This was interpreted as a pause, a pause in the enlargement of the Community. This pause in enlargement, did you also ask the Brussels Commission for this? And I also want to ask you, Mr President, what effect do you think this request for a pause will have on the relations between France and Spain. Finally, if you allow me, I would like to ask you whether you believe France is well prepared for Spain's admission into the Common Market?

[Answer] Are there any more questions on the enlargement of the Community?

[Question] [name indistinct] of EL PAIS: I would simply like to know if the pause will be useful. I also have a Franco-Spanish problem and this is the question I want to ask about it--it is about the Basque problem: For the first time ever, a member of the Spanish Government, that is the foreign minister, the other day denounced the permissive attitude of the French authorities regarding the ETA [Basque Fatherland & Liberty] members on French territory where, according to the Spanish minister, they are preparing their attacks on the Spanish Basque Country. Can you make a comment on these statements by the Spanish foreign minister?

[Question] Next Tuesday you will receive the Portuguese prime minister. Will you make it clear to him how long you think Portugal must wait until joining the Common Market and, on the other hand, can you indicate the contents of the talks you intend to have with him? Thank you.

[Question] Christine Claire, FIGARO magazine: Following your statements in favor of a pause in the enlargement of the European Community the Spanish Government asked for the integration of its country within NATO. Have you envisaged such a reaction and does this strengthening of Atlantic Europe worry you?

[Question] Apart from this problem of the pause, Mr Barre also mentioned the possibility of a grouping at various levels of the Eruopean countries which would allow progress at different rates. Can you now make it clear how you envisage in a more global manner the future of European construction?

[Question] [name indistinct] from Sud Radio: You have envisaged a pause before enlargement, before the admission of Spain and Portugal to the Common Market. What I would like to know is how long will this pause last, and will the South-West program be extended by the same length of time?

[Answer] So, I shall answer these questions and I shall start by answering the last one. The South-West program will be carried out independently of any timetable regarding the enlargement of the European Community. This is a 10-year program covering the period 1980-1990 and therefore will take place regardless of foreign events during this period. I return to the questions regarding enlargement.

I said something quite precise, a written text, and as I write my texts myself I know them well so I shall tell you what I said. I said this: I said at the talks which have just taken place in Brussels that there were consequences not yet noticed, and that these talks interfere with the talks regarding enlargement, and that it is not possible to make progress in the enlargement talks regarding points and topics on which uncertainty and instability has just been introduced in existing institutions. Thus, I did not speak of or suggest any "pause". I described an existing situation.

This existing situation is, moreover, so obvious that when we met in Venice the following week the problem of the enlargement--and I stress this point--was not raised by any of our partners. The statements I made did not result, at least in my presence, in any remark whatsoever. I said: In fact there are two difficult problems regarding the admission talks.

The first problem is to know how financial solidarity toward the new members will be carried out, because the new members--whether it is the case of Portugal as first candidate or Spain as second candidate--are countries whose living standards are below the Community norm. Therefore we imagine that they would wish the admission to result for them in a certain transfer of resources or financial aid from the European Economic Community. The second topic is that they are big agricultural countries producing Mediterranean crops [words indistinct] the existing market which supposes an organization of the market and therefore a consolidated and extended Common Agricultural Policy.

What happened a few days before in Luxembourg was that [words indistinct] that it had been decided to question certain regulations regarding the financing of the European Economic Community and in particular the functioning of our own resources. And secondly, questions were raised giving the Commission a mandate to reexamine certain aspects regarding the functioning of the agricultural Common Market. How is it possible in practice to conclude or to make negotiations progress on points where one of the interlectors is questioning the future of his own rules? Therefore, if I spoke of a pause, this is not part of the vocabulary I used on the occasion. You can refer to the text. I simply indicated that I could not see how it would be possible to make progress as long as these questions are not settled.

You have a very simple way of making the enlargement progress: This is that the whole Community of the Nine should announce starting today that as from 1982 they agree to the regulations of the financial policy as they are now and the regulations [passage indistinct]. France has said this, and so if our partners say so talks can proceed as they have begun. If, on the contrary, any of our partners indicates that we must alter the Community financial regulations or alter the regulations of the Common Agricultural Policy [passage indistinct] would apply to new members.

The French prime minister is also to visit Spain next week. We shall have talks with our interlocutors and we shall tell them that it is to the extent to which the uncertainties introduced by others are dispelled that we shall be able to reach progress in our negotiations. In the meantime, negotiations continue but they cannot reach progress on the points on which uncertainties currently remain. The French delegation will be instructed for the negotiating sessions to inquire what financial regulations are applicable as from 1982 and what principles of the Common Agricultural Policy are applicable from this date. This, I would say to the journalist from EL PAIS, has nothing to do with the situation inside the country, because you will recall I adopted a position--which I am sticking to--of principle, in favor of the European membership of Portugal and Spain. I did not do it at the time for electoral reasons.

My final point: I consider the violence directed at certain Spanish truck drivers in France as unacceptable. This is not in keeping with the idea, the image we have of our country. And so I am asking the prime minister to take the requisite steps to see that the persons affected receive fare compensation; and that steps are taken to prevent the repitition of unacceptable incidents of this kind. It does the cause of French agriculture no service to give this kind of picture of our way of applying, as far as we are concerned, regulations or of abiding by our own laws.

[Question] [Words indistinct] one word on the Basque problem.

[Answer] I have nothing to say on the Basque problem. The problem which you describe is a domestic Spanish problem. As far as France is concerned, we apply our own laws, that is to say that we punish the offenses which are committed according to our judicial procedures. We have always respected these procedures. We will continue to do so.

[Question] Mr President, (Olivier Mazerol), [interrupted by next questioner]

[Question] [Name indistinct] CBS News... [interrupted by Giscard]

[Giscard] This is a duet?

[Second questioner] [Name indistinct] French-American relations have been quite difficult in recent times. Has there been any change since the Venice summit, and did you speak frankly and achieve good results with President Carter?

[Question] Mr President, during your talks with President Carter in Venice was the participation of certain French athletes in the Olympic games discussed?

[Question] (Francois Sa'nte-Marie), Radio France International: Mr President, do you have the impression that the trilateral talks which you proposed many months ago between Europe, the Arab world and Africa could modify the consequences of the international economic crisis for the countries taking part?

[Question] Mr President, on 27 November you announced that you intended to submit a proposal to the Venice summit on the reconstruction of an international monetary system between the industrialized countries. Why did you give this up?

[Answer] Make that the last question. We will then turn to defense. Ladies and gentlemen, your questions dealt with French-American relations and the talks I had with President Carter. The talks which we hold periodically--the previous one was exactly a year ago in Tokyo--are talks at which we are in the habit of expressing ourselves in the most frank and complete fashion. Thus, there is no ambiguity in our positions. I reminded President Carter--who knows this--of the reasons why France's policy is and will remain independent. On the other hand, I pointed out to him our analysis of the East-West situation, particularly in the light of events in Afghanistan, and how we considered it necessary to act to put an end to them.

I observed that in the statements he made subsequently, President Carter seems to me to have noted a certain number of the facts I gave him in a positive way. Thus, we maintain relations which are trusting relations, of joint work in the sphere of international difficulties but in which France intends to conduct its own analysis and to present its proposals to its partners and allies, as well as to her other interlocutors. We did not discuss the issue of participation in the Olympic games in these talks.

As far as the three-way talks are concerned, the agenda was so full that it was not possible to discuss it under these circumstances, but we will continue our efforts with the three groups concerned--which are moreover not at all the same as the groups which were in Venice, because the United States, Canada and Japan were all together in Venice and they are not involved in the three-way talks. We shall have the opportunity to continue preparing the preparatory conference in the coming months.

Finally, an observer as shrewd as Mr Pierre Charpy had to note that there had been a massive increase in oil prices since 27 November, causing an increased balance of payments deficit of 110 billion dollars, about 70 billion dollars of that for OECD dollars and 40 billion dollars for developing countries. These are not circumstances in which one can make much progress with new proposals on putting the international monetary system in order. Only when a certain stability or at least an acceptable level of deficit has been reestablished will it be possible to make progress in reconstructing this system. This is why in the present circumstances we remain committed to the efficient working of the European monetary system, which certain people say will break apart and which is in excellent health more than a year after its implementation. We shall resume initiatives concerning the international monetary system when the effects, the first shock of this new oil price increase, are absorbed back into the international accounts balances. So now we turn to questions on defense.

[Question] [words indistinct] first question. Second question: The political parties, even in the majority, are calling for a reduction in national service. I should like to know what is the doctrine of the head of state and chief of the army?

[Answer] Thank you. We can perhaps separate, although there is a certain link, the nuclear questions and the conventional questions. Your second question is on conventional arms. On the nuclear question you have spoken of the neutron bomb. Are there any other questions?

[Question] Mr President, (Louis Margue) from French Television 1: I should like to ask if you think it possible to halt what you called just now the worsening of the international situation and to find with the Soviets a lessening of the crisis, while maintaining the NATO decision to install in Europe new nuclear missiles from 1983? Although this decision does not apply to France, I want to ask your analysis of this for the future and in particular in view of the coming talks between Mr Schmidt and Mr Brezhnev.

[Question] Mr President, can one continue indefinitely the studies of the neutron bomb without manufacturing it, and does the fact of deciding to supply France with it mean the renunciation of the strategy of deterrence?

[Question] Mr President, [name and designation indistinct]: Do you not think that nuclear deterrence loses all its credibility when it is rejected by the majority of the French people, who distrust, it seems, your determination to press the atomic button when the time comes? Is there a change in French military defense policy under your rule compared to General de Gaulle?

[Question] Mr President, (Reinhardt Uhman), German Television: Mr President, the French neutron bomb risks falling on Germany for the defense of France. Do you think that is why Franco-German military cooperation should be strengthened?

[Question] In more general terms, Mr President, Henri Tincq, LA CROIX: If we resume the political debate on defense, there is a choice between the national deterrent and/or European defense security. As far as you are concerned, what is the correct balance? What possible reconciliation is there between these two ideas? And with what means, what weapons?

[Question] Mr President, Guy (Marchand) of AGENCE MONDIALISTE DE PRESSE [Presumably WORLD INFORMATION AND PRESS AGENCY]: In New York you mentioned the need for satellite monitoring of disarmament. In order for this monitoring to be totally effective there will need to be on-the-spot supervision. The French Constitution permits this supervision, for the principle of limitation of sovereignty was maintained in it by General de Gaulle. Do you think, Mr President, that it would be useful to study the implementation of this (?article) in our Constitution with your country and Italy, Germany or [word indistinct] which have identical articles in their constitutions in order to (?bring detente) to the entire world?

[Question] Do you not think that in delivering 38 tons of uranium to India, Mr Carter is now taking risks in this part of the world in relation to this nonaligned country, especially at a time when the Vietnam war is starting again?

[Answer] We are replying to your questions on deterrence, on nuclear weapons, on the neutron bomb. Afterwards I will answer the question on the length of military service and other questions of this type if there are any. Firstly, a few thoughts on defense. Defense problems are among the most complex arising in today's world due to the power and variety of the equipment concerned, due to the diversity of the possible situations and the speed of reactions which they call for, due to the close overlapping of political decisions and military decisions in a time of crisis. This is why they cannot be simplified. This is why they cannot be dealt with lightly.

My second thought is that in the field of defense one cannot accept an impasse. There are a certain number of arguments or subjects where one can risk an impasse, but one cannot do so with defense. My third thought is that the defense effort of a country cannot be delegated to new weapons, to new weapons or to smart weapons, no more than it was not possible to delegate it to the cement of the Maginot Line. The defense effort is incorporated in the people's soul, as one notes moreover in the world today. This is why the defense effort necessarily concerns all French people.

I come back to our concept of deterrence and to our weapons in this field. Firstly what is deterrence? Nuclear deterrence is a collection of threats, a collection of risks directed toward the enemy, of which at least one is fatal. As for the use of the nuclear weapon there are (?various) kinds of possible situations and hypotheses; we need not list them here. However, there is a point which must be understood as central in our system. Its that any nuclear attack on French soil will automatically give rise to a strategic nuclear response. Those of you who are specialists in these matters will place this affirmation in its context.

At the moment we have strategic nuclear weapons relying on three components, and this structure will remain valid up to 1990-92. From 1984-85 multiple warhead ballistic missiles will be introduced on our submarines. From 1992 the problem will arise of replacing one or another of our strategic nuclear weapons. This is why the last defense council decided to begin the development of a mobile strategic launcher. The technical decisions concerning the characteristics of this launcher may be decided on before the end of this year.

The technical decisions concerning the characteristics of this launcher can be settled by the end of the year. As for the neutron bomb, in December 1976 I made the decision in the Defense Council to make a feasibility study of the neutron weapon.

These studies have resulted in the preparation (?of experiments), and the first experiments have been carried out. It will be possible to make a decision on production from the years 1982-1983 on the basis of the present structure of this weapon, 2 years later if a different structure is desired, and the decision made then will have to take into account the state of nuclear arms in Europe foreseeable at that time.

On the question put to me about the use of weapons, I remind you that there exists on the Western side at present 5,000 tactical nuclear weapons, so the particular question of the use of tactical nuclear weapons [passage indistinct] in our reflections on the use of this weapon we shall take account of the following proposition: France is directly concerned by the security of West European states. [Passage indistinct]

[Question] [Name indistinct] France INTER: Mr President, I should like you to explain what you meant when you said that France is directly concerned with the security of neighboring states in the nuclear field.

[Answer] Exactly, Madame, it is in the interest of this statement that it should remain as it is, for I shall have the opportunity to reply--in a way which I am looking for-- at greater length to all the reflections on the preoccupations of defense. Specialists know one cannot do that in 25 minutes to half an hour. But there are, in information on defense and particularily on the use of certain means, indications which should be given in a form which allows the possible questioner to put a certain number of questions to himself. [Passage as heard].

Concerning our conventional forces I will say this: The proposal to reduce the length of national service in the present state of world insecurity would be seen as abandonment or resignation France's part. And the government, which I consulted on this point, will not accept this abandonment nor this resignation. I remind you that at present the duration of service is as follows: 2-3 years in the Soviet Union, 15 months in Federal Germany, 7 months in Spain, (?12) months in Italy, 12 months in France. I add that this reduction [words indictinct] is, in addition, nonsense technically [words indistinct] and for this decision is irrevocable.

The problem concerning national service is first that of the training level of our forces. For 3 years we have made regular progress in the training level of our forces, and each time the young conscripts participate in active military life, they consider that their activity is useful for the security of the country.

And so the problem is to enrich the usefulness and the interest of national service for young people. That is why our defense budget will allocate growing funds for this usefulness and interest of national service for the young. But I remind you that we shall not agree either to the abandonment or to the resignation.

[Question] (?Are the muses silent when the arms speak)?

[Answer] No, when the nuclear weapon speaks, then there are no longer any muses.

COLOMBO COMMENTS ON EUROPEAN APPROACH TO MIDEAST PROBLEM

LD261519 Paris AN-NAHAR AL-'ARABI WA AD-DUWALI in Arabic 23-29 Jun 80 p 6

[Interview granted to AN-NAHAR AL-'ARABI WA AD-DUWALI by Italian Foreign Minister Emilio Colombo in Venice--date not given]

[Text] Venice--Italian Foreign Minister Emilio Colombo, who chaired the foreign ministers' meetings during the European Council's conference on the Island of San Giorgio, believes that the European move regarding the Middle East crisis is not directed against Camp David but is complementary to it.

[Question] Not having broached Camp David either negatively or positively and having contented themselves with mentioning it in name only, was that in compliance with an American wish or was it an indication of their [the EC] having judged it as having failed?

[Answer] We did not view it as having failed, especially since the [EEC] declaration came a few days before it was agreed to resume [Israeli-Egyptian] contacts. Although it has not yet been decided to resume the [Egyptian-Israeli] negotiations, the contacts are to explore the possibility of resuming the negotiations. We are glad about this because reviving negotiations and reaching results is a positive sign.

In any case, the Europeans have constantly said that the implementation of Camp David must be within the framework of a comprehensive solution. The solution we are seeking is along this line--the line of a comprehensive solution.

[Question] Then you believe that the European move will be complementary to Camp David?

[Answer] Yes, in order to achieve a comprehensive solution to the area's [the Middle East] issue. Our position is clear. We do not want to do anything that could be interpreted as being in competition with another initiative, particularly Camp David. Europe supports every effort to establish peace. Through its move, Europe is moving parallel [with Camp David] with a view to unifying the efforts along the same path toward the achievement of a comprehensive solution which must be based on mutual confidence and on negotiations acceptable to all parties, including the Palestinian people and the PLO.

[Question] Will the contacts which the European Council intends to carry out at a later stage include the Palestinians who are at home or those who are abroad?

[Answer] We said the Palestinian people, that is, including the PLO.

[Question] In the statement on Lebanon, the word "initiative" was mentioned. Is the Council aware of a certain initiative and who will make it and when?

[Answer] The Europeans will support any initiative that will insure the restoration of peace. This does not mean that there is a European initiative in this direction. There has been no such initiative so far.

[Question] But do you not think that the seriousness of the situation in Lebanon necessitates a practical European move beyond the declaration of Europe's adherence to the general principles which it has so often repeated?

[Answer] We regard Lebanon as an important element for stability in the area. The best proof of our interest in the Lebanese issue are the efforts we make whenever there is an opportunity for us to do so, in addition to the sacrifices in men which the nine states are making, especially through their forces in southern Lebanon. All this confirms their determination and readiness now and in the future to contribute to the restoration and consolidation of peace in the area.

PERTINI REFUSES TO SIGN DECREE MODIFYING REFERENDUM

AU260900 Rome ANSA in English 0835 GMT 26 Jun 80

[Text] Rome, June 26 (ANSA)--The decision of head-of-state Sandro Pertini not to sign a government decree modifying control norms for the request of repeal referendums was the major political event in Italy yesterday. The decree would have transferred verification of the referendum requests from the Supreme Court to local courts of appeal.

The Radical Party welcomed the president's move, accusing the government of trying to change the rules of the game even as the campaign for ten referendums ground to a halt Wednesday night. The Radicals issued a communique last night stating that it looked like at least five of the referendums had received enough valid signatures to get the official go-ahead. It was not yet clear whether the remaining five had gathered the necessary 500,000 names.

It seemed certain that referendums would be held against anti-terrorism legislation, against crimes of opinion, against military codes in time of peace, against the industrial application of nuclear energy and against hunting. Lagging behind were signatures calling into question life sentences, certain aspects of abortion legislation, the continued militarization of the finance guard, gun laws and the illegality of smoking hashish and marijuana.

L'UNITA, the official organ of the Italian Communist (PCI) Party, yesterday spoke of open violations of the law during signature gathering operations. Communist M.P.'s took the same tone in the Senate.

Radical Party leader Marco Pannella labeled "squalid" the reactions of L'UNITA and several "pseudo-communist" parliamentarians. The formation of local, regional, provincial, and communal administrations also riveted the attention of political leaders here.

After a meeting of Social Democratic officials, Alberto Ciampaglia said that this party looked to be extended to all the laic forces in open, clear and unequivocal negotiations.

The PCI Central Committee continued its work begun on June 24 with a wide-ranging report yesterday from Armando Cossucta, head of the party's local agencies office. Pietro Ingrao, former house speaker, urged Communist militants to reflect upon the changes that have occured within Italian realities, in the leftwing area, and in the political formations that respond to this area. He said that forms of organization existed today that did not correspond to the traditional notions of the historic parties of the Italian left. He spoke of the difficulties facing the European left faced with "a new historic stage."

Also last night, Premier Francesco Cossiga held a meeting with the secretaries of the three parties that make up his government: Giovanni Spadolini for the Republicans, Flaminio Piccoli for the Christian Democrats, and Bettino Craxi for the Socialists. Leaks from the top secret session claimed that the leaders discussed the Venice Summit of June 22-23 and government steps to combat the gloom surrounding Italy's automobile and chemical industries.

CARTER VISITS LEADERS, DISCUSSES INTERNATIONAL AFFAIRS

President Eanes' Greeting

LD261550 Lisbon in Portuguese to Europe 1230 GMT 26 Jun 80

[Speech by Portuguese President Ramalho Eanes welcoming U.S. President Jimmy Carter on his arrival at Lisbon Airport on 26 June--recorded]

[Text] Mr President: On my behalf and that of my wife and in the name of the people of Portugal, I wish to convey to Your Excellency and to Mrs Carter our warm and sincere welcome.

Your Excellency is the first President of the United States to pay an official visit to Portugal since the restoration of our democracy. As your excellency has already acknowledged, the Prtuguese people have demostrated to the world their strong attachment to freedom and to the democratic way of life by toppling a dictatorial regime and by surmounting the obstacles which ensured. And they have secured these gains in a climate of freedom and pluralism, of which we are justly proud. These are sure proofs that we will know how to defend the only possible road for Portugal--the democratic road, the road which is in keeping with the will and profound interests of our people.

We can thus meet today as the representatives of countries holding the highest ideals: freedom, justice and human dignity. On the basis of these principles the long friendship between Portugal and the United States has grown stronger than ever before. In the light of this friendship and of its future projection, I wish to express in the name of the people of Portugal and in their name to salute the great and friendly American nation which your excellency so deservingly symbolizes and represents here.

Eanes' Speech at Luncheon

LD262222 [Editorial report] Lisbon Domestic Service at 1830 GMT on 26 June carries a recording of President Eanes' speech at a luncheon in honor of President Carter in Lisbon on 26 June. Reception is poor.

At one point, Eanes says: "The international crisis which currently exist in various parts of the world require a serene analysis of their causes and an increasingly greater effort to achieve cohesion." He goes on to say: "It would be serious if exacerbated nationalistic selfishness or alocfness were to prevail when any member of the international community, whether a big power or a small country, is in difficulty. For us solidarity is not an empty word and I would like to reiterate, Mr President, that we support you and the American people in the drama currently affecting the American hostages in Tehran who remain the victims of a deplorable violation of human rights, in outright disrespect for the most elementary rules of international life.

"In other areas generalized regional conflicts pose a threat to world peace and stifle the legitmate right of some peoples to decide their own destinies. At this moment, the situation in the Middle East and in Afghanistan is particulary serious. The events in Afghanistan have created a [words indistinct] situation, inasmuch as they represent an attempt against the peoples' right to express their sovereignty. We cannot fail, therefore, to support all efforts leading to a [word indistinct] and comprehensive solution to this [word indistinct] problem."

Sa Carneiro on Afghanistan Measures

LD262200 [Editorial Report] Lisbon domestic service in Portuguese at 1600 GMT On 26 June reports that immediately after President Carter's departure from Lisbon Airport, at around 1500 GMT, Prime Minister Sa Carneiro gave a press conference. The radio announcer then introduces a report on the press conference from Lisbon radio's reporter at the airport, who in mid-sentence cuts in with: "during which he [Sa Carneiro] said that concrete measures have been taken with regard to Afghanistan and that Portugal is to participate in these measures which are to be implemented in the event that the Soviet troops fail to withdraw from Afghanistan. The nature of such measures, however, has not yet been announced and awaits further developments in the area. There was also a convergence of views between Portugal and the United States about the present international instability. International issues took up most of the time in this morning's talks, but on the bilateral level one should highlight the intention to increase cooperation in the spheres of agriculture and fisheries. Another topic discussed was naturally that of relations between Portugal and the United States within NATO." The reporter then hands back to the studio announcer.

Summary of Communique

LD262006 Lisbon Domestic Service in Portuguese 1830 GMT 26 Jun 80

[Text] A joint communique on President Carter's visit to Portugal released this afternoon points to very concrete targets. Special emphasis is laid on the present international situation and on the many ties linking the two countries. The communique notes with satisfaction the close relations between Lisbon and Washington, and points to new forms of cooperation aimed at strengthening security in the West as well as to consultations and coordination among Western countries.

Afghanistan and Iran are two issues referred to at length: Carter voices his satisfaction with the support expressed by Portugal (?in this connection). Concrete measures have already been agreed upon if the Soviet Union fails to pull out its troops from Afghanistan. These measures, however, will only be made public later, no doubt if it proves necessary to put them into practice.

East-West and North-South relations and Portugal's role within NATO were also topics discussed during the talks. The fact that both countries belong to NATO was also discussed, but there was no talk of the possible stationing of an aircraft carrier in Lisbon or even of nuclear missiles in Portugal--this, however, was stated by Prime Minister Sa Carneiro later on.

In brief, one could say that the communique expressed the Americans "thanks" for the support given by Portugal to the U.S. in the Iran and Afghanistan issues and points to a strengthening of bilateral relations [word indistinct] within NATO. Reference should also be made to increased U.S. assistance in the economic sphere: A U.S. delegation is to travel to Lisbon shortly in order to analyze the Portuguese situation.

ADDITIONAL DETAILS OF SPANISH-U.S. COMMUNIQUE REPORTED

LD261631 Madrid in Spanish to Europe 1130 GMT 26 Jun 80

[Excerpts] At midmorning today the Secretariat of State for information issued to the media the text of the joint Spanish-U.S. communique which was drafted following President Carter's visit to Madrid.

In the meeting between King Juan Carlos and Jimmy Carter, the communique says, both statesmen expressed their concern over the tension in several parts of the world and expressed their desire and intention to contribute to every effort which is made that leads toward the restoration of peace and stability in those areas. President Carter congratulated the king on the successful evolution of the Spanish democratic process and the Spanish side expressed its acknowledgement of the U.S. work in support of human rights and peace.

The joint communique said that it was once again noted that Western solidarity is one of the guiding lines of democratic Spain's foreign policy and that Spain will act jointly with other Western countries in search for peace and stability for all peoples. Carter and Suarez, continues the communique, expressed their hope that the outcome of the forthcoming Madrid conference on security would be favorable to world detente and peace and at the same time both leaders examined the ways of strengthening Western solidarity in the face of the serious threat which the Soviet aggression in Afghanistan entails. They repeated that only the complete withdrawal of Soviet troops and guarantees of nonalignment of and respect for the free will of the Afghan people are the necessary elements for a final end to the conflict.

President Carter expressed his thanks for the Spanish steps toward the release of the U.S. hostages in Iran, while both leaders agreed on the need to respect the norms of international law in the development of international relations and in the solution of the current world crisis.

FOREIGN MINISTER OREJA PREVIEWS MADRID CSCE MEETING

LD261453 Barcelona LA VANGUARDIA in Spanish 20 Jun 80 p 14

[EFE report: "Spain has Duty To Be Impartial and Nondiscriminatory"]

[Excerpt] Madrid, 19 June--Foreign Minister Marcelino Oreja appeared this morning before the Senate Foreign Affairs Committee at an informational meeting to report on the preparation of the CSCE conference which is to be held soon in Madrid.

Following the preparatory meeting which will begin in Madrid 9 September, Mr Oreja said, the second CSCE meeting will begin in the Spanish capital 11 November, it being assumed that the Belgrade meeting was in fact the first, since the guidelines of what is termed the "CSCE process" were laid down at the Helsinki meeting.

"The Helsinki final act," he continued, "is the great code of detente--a concept which is defined more by what is excluded than by what is asserted. Detente is not peace, but neither is it cold war."

"The poor results achieved at the Belgrade conference," he added, "were due to the socialist countries' intention to center the dialogue primarily on the field of economic cooperation and on that of the environment; the Western countries believed that it should be effected on the basis of human rights. It was impossible to achieve a consensus on most of the issues."

With respect to our country's role as the host of the conference, Mr Oreja stated that the only responsibility that Spain has undertaken is that of ensuring perfect organization of the conference. "An interministerial committee has been operating for several months," he stated. "The executive secretary has been appointed and approved, the work of adapting the Madrid conference building has been virtually completed and all the necessary facilities are ready."

Shun All Leadership

The minister added that, as a result of its role as the host, Spain has a duty to be impartial and nondiscriminatory toward those taking part. "It is thus obliged to shun all leadership, although Spain, as a participant, has its own stance on each issue of the conference. We have national interests to defend, which are inherent in our position as a Western and democratic country."

"We are in favor," Mr Oreja stated, "of the conference opening and closing at the foreign ministerial level. With respect to the duration, Spain is inclined toward the viewpoint that a target date should be set. It is envisaged that the proceedings will last about 3 months, not counting the 5-week Christmas break."

"Reviewing Helsinki Final Act Should Not Be Sole Aim"

"Of all the procedural issues, the conference's agenda is the one with the greatest political significance and the one which will pose the greatest difficulties," he added. "The Western countries wish the emphasis of the meeting to be placed on reviewing the implementation of the Helsinki final act; the socialist countries are placing the emphasis on new proposals. Spain deems it appropriate that the review process should be conducted without omissions or exclusions, with the proper depth, but believes that this should not be the Madrid meeting's sole aim. With respect to the new proposals, they should be few, concise and realistic."

Afghanistan is "Grave Action"

"The unquestionable deterioration in detente and the current tension in relations between the two superpowers," he said, "have an important effect on the state of people's minds prior to the meeting." "Afghanistan is not an isolated incident," the minister asserted, "or a minor hitch on the path of detente; it is a grave act of force carried out in flagrant violation of the Helsinki final act. The trials of dissidents, arrests and internments are measures conflicting with the necessary respect for basic human rights and also carried out in flagrant violation of the Helsinki final act."

With respect to security, he stated that there is a unanimous feeling in favor of the need to secure the approval of a mandate at the Madrid conference for the subsequent holding of a disarmament conference, which, "although it is currently designated by this name, it will instead be a conference which will study not so much disarmament--properly speaking--as confidence-building measures which will make this possible at a later stage. Spain will support the efforts made in this direction, knowing that it is necessary beforehand to restore confidence by means of substantive, general and compulsory measures."

Human Rights

"The topics included in the so-called 'third basket' will be those which will create the greatest risks of confrontation in Madrid (less at the time of submitting new proposals than during the period of reviewing the observance of the final act by those taking part). The sense of balance which inspired the final act involves consideration of the humanitarian aspects of detente, together with those which are purely military." [paragraph continues]

"We have decided," he stated, "to attach primary importance to the humanitarian aspects of detente and our conduct at the Madrid meeting will be consistent with this approach. Human rights, in the way in which they are viewed in this 'basket,' are not a weapon for questioning a model of society but something that affects personal and family relations in the daily lives of the citizens of our continent."

The minister then proceeded to broach the subject of the Mediterranean, which concerns Spain in particular and should be handled separately at the Madrid conference. "Procedurally--with respect to the contributions which the adjoining countries not taking part in the conference could make as far as security in the Mediterranean region is concerned--and, finally, with respect to regional cooperation," he stated.

In conclusion, Mr Oreja explained that holding the Madrid conference in accordance with the envisaged timetable is more important than ever. "The duty of all states is to come to Madrid with the resolute political will to achieve tangible results which will make it clear that Europe is committed to a path of peace and detente. The Spanish delegation will exert itself to the utmost to uphold these ideas."

PSOE COMMUNIQUE CALLS FOR REFERENDUM ON NATO MEMBERSHIP

LD261131 Madrid YA in Spanish 19 Jun 80 p 19

[EUROPEA PRESS report: "Official Spanish Socialist Workers Party (PSOE) Stance: Request for Referendum on NATO Membership"]

[Text] The PSOE has released an official communique stating its position on Spain's possible entry into NATO, EUROPA PRESS reports. The document states that the PSOE "believes that Minister Oreja Aguirre's remarks are completely inopportune at the present time, when international circumstances would adivse greater prudence with regard to topics affecting not only Spanish foreign policy but international coexistence.

"The emphatic nature of the remarks and the setting of a timetable for Spain's entry into NATO constitute a heavy blow to hopes for a successful outcome to the CSCE conference, especially bearing in mind that Spain is the host country and regarded as nonaligned in the military blocs.

"It is unacceptable that the government try to mix together subjects as disparate as entry into NATO, our EEC membership, the Gibraltar issue and the bilateral negotiations with the United States. The attempt to play with something as serious and delicate as our defense system to gain returns in other fields in which the government's bargaining power is not apparent cannot be tolerated.

"The PSOE confirms its stances of clear opposition to any kind of NATO membership for Spain and stresses that it is contrary to the policy of military blocs. The PSOE will take every initiative it can the government's decision [as published] and stresses that will try in every way to insure that it is the popular will, through a referendum, which has the last word on the matter."

NORWAY

NORDLI DISCUSSES RELATIONS WITH EGYPT, ATTITUDE TO MIDEAST

LD261347 Cairo AL-AHRAM in Arabic 21 Jun 80 p 5

[Interview granted by Norwegian Prime Minister Odvar Nordli to Salah ad-Din Hafiz in Oslo--date not given]

[Excerpts] Replying to my question on Norway's evaluation of the situation in the Middle East, Norwegian Prime Minister Odvar Nordli said:

First I must say that Norway, with its 4 million population, is strengthening its ties with Egypt in order to achieve peace in the Middle East. We believe that Egypt, being an important Arab and African state, indeed represents the cornerstone of peace in the Middle East. Therefore, public opinion, those concerned with politics, the government and the parties in our country sincerely follow and encourage efforts to reach a just settlement for all the parties.

Quite frankly, a few years ago we were not deeply interested in, nor did we have a significant role to play in, the Middle East. We had no specific ideas about solutions to the conflict. But the situation today has changed, for peace in the Middle East means peace for us. There is a certain link between the two areas despite the distance between them.

[Question] How do you believe the Palestine problem should be solved?

[Nordli] We believe that the fundamental solution of the Palestine problem is one of the keys to a comprehensive settlement. This solution should be based on recognizing the Palestinian people's rights while recognizing Israel's security. Any efforts to be made must take into consideration the Palestinian people's rights and Israel's security. What is important in our country's opinion is to avoid heated clashes and to prevent a return once again to the whirlpool of destructive wars in the Middle East. We are interested not only in the Arab-Israeli conflict but also in the situation in Lebanon.

We are afraid lest the situation in Lebanon explode if the situation there reaches a point where the United Nations is no longer able to keep peace there with its forces, in which we participate. Therefore, we believe that there is a need to pay attention to the peace-keeping forces throughout the area and the need for these forces to continue under UN command. This is a very important matter because failure in this would mean the return of tension and, consequently, explosion.

I asked Nordli, head of the Norwegian Labor Government since 1976: What is your evaluation of the international situation between East and West in the light of the possibility of the return to a cold war?

[Answer] First of all there are some who imagine that we, as a state with a small population and a large area and being comparatively technologically advanced, live in isolation from the world's problems. This is not true. In any case we are part of the Western alliance and therefore part of the international strategy of this alliance. Therefore, we are not far from the world's thorny problems today, especially the problems in the Middle East and Western Asia.

Military conflict in the hotspots is a threat to us simply because it creates problems for us. As for the recent developments, we reject any military intervention under any pretext. The Soviet intervention in Afghanistan was a violation of several principles of world peace as a whole.

[Question] What about the other violations?

[Answer] When our attitude is such as I have just stated, it is important that we should frankly express our views to all parties. We must find the means for discussion, dialogue and contact between the opposing forces so as to negotiate on the basic problems. Once again I say that we believe that dialogue is the only practical way because the alternative is war. The world's problems will not be solved by such a destructive method.

Both the Western and Eastern camps have their own policies and objectives but both camps are governed by the policy of coexistence, by dialogue, and not by clashes because clashes would mean destruction for both sides and for all mankind. It is important that voices should be raised on both sides stressing the desire for calm dialogue so as to ensure the continuation of the world peace process. I would once again like to emphasize that this is our understanding that peace efforts in the Middle East should achieve the objectives of the conflicting parties.

[Question] In recent years, Norway rapidly acquired an important international status following the discovery of oil in the North Sea, which you share with Britain. As a result, Norway has become not only a technologically advanced state but also rich in the sense of oil. Do you believe that the newly found oil has caused changes in your concepts and policies toward others, particularly toward the poor countries on one hand and the industrial oil-consuming countries on the other?

[Answer] First of all we are happy with the oil wealth which we are trying to exploit rationally and calmly. Secondly, we will not, for example, join OPEC--at least not at present--despite out great advance in the field of production and export of oil and its byproducts. But at the same time, we look at international relations in oil matters differently. Nevertheless, we are anxious to maintain ties of cooperation with OPEC and its countries.

Norway, as a small country, must play a substantial role in the relations between the oil-producers and oil-consumers. We must settle the existing strong differences between them regarding prices, export quantities and so on.

[Question] A final question: What is your opinion in the Norwegian-Egyptian relations and how do you see the horizon of future cooperation?

[Answer] Once again I would reaffirm our desire to develop cooperation between Egypt, the cornerstone of peace and progress in the Middle East, and Norway. I believe that we are passing through a phase of strengthening cooperation ties in the economic and technological field. In principle we have a general agreement on this but we must go deeper into discussing specific cooperation projects. Quite frankly, this is our problem with you. We have and you have too many "principles of cooperation" but both of us must define the cooperation projects more precisely so as to actually implement the principles.

DEMIREL COMMENTS ON RPP CANDIDATE, IRAQI BORDER KILLING

TA261554 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1400 GMT 26 Jun 80

[Text] The joint session of the Senate and National Assembly, which was to convene at 1300 today, could not be held due to lack of quorum. Meanwhile, speaking to journalists after the Council of Ministers meeting today, Prime Minister Suleyman Demirel also referred to the candidacy of National Assembly President Cahit Karakas.

[Begin Demirel recording] Why should the Justice Party [JP] support another candidate while it has its own candidate? While we have an extraordinarily honorable candidate from the JP? No JP member will vote in favor of a candidate from another party. Is this possible? Mr Karakas wanted to meet me. Of course, we can hold a meeting. I am ready to meet with everyone who wishes to confer with me. Does this mean that we will support his candidacy? Does a meeting have such a connotation? Must I refuse to meet him thinking that it might be interpreted in this manner? [end recording]

After the Council of Ministers meeting, which began at 1130 and lasted for 3 hours, Demirel said that the recent statements made by Iraqi authorities in connection with the killing of 10 Turkish citizens on the Turkish-Iraqi border had not yet officially reached the government.

[Begin Demirel recording] We are continuing to seek the rights of our 10 citizens who were shot in the back for having crossed the border in Hakkari. It is the duty of the Government of the Turkish Republic to secure the rights of not only these citizens who died but of all our citizens. We will fulfill our duty in the best possible way. We are right on this issue. Those who did the killing are wrong. The issue concerns the killing of 10 Turkish citizens. This act is not compatible with humanity, friendship, neighborliness, fraternity or Islam. There was no need to shoot our citizens just because they crossed the border.

This issue cannot remain as it is. I am stating this very clearly. We have submitted a note. They have answered our note. In our note we requested that those who committed this act should be punished. They were the ones who proposed a joint investigation. The Turkish Republic is a great state. We will pursue this matter in a manner befitting a great state. We shall pursue the issue with a cool head and with dignity. [end recording]

APPEALS BOARD UPHOLDS CANCELLATION OF PALESTINIANS' SENTENCE

TA270538 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 2000 GMT 26 Jun 80

[Text] The General Board of the Military Court of Appeals has approved the decision of the court's fourth section which had ruled that the First Ankara Martial Law Tribunal has not authorized to try the Palestinian guerrillas who raided the Egyptian Embassy, killed two Turkish policemen and took the embassy personnel hostage. The fourth section had also cancelled the sentences passed by the First Ankara Martial Law Tribunal--death sentences to the four guerrillas and prison terms for their collaborators.

The General Board of the Military Court of Appeals discussed the issue today because the chief prosecutor of the Military Court of Appeals had objected to the decision of the court's fourth section. The General Board approved the decision of the fourth section and ruled that the Ankara martial law first tribunal was not authorized to deal with that trial.

KREISKY: PLO WILL NOT BE INVITED TO NEXT SI CONGRESS

AU261202 Vienna DIE PRESSE in German 26 Jun 80 pp 1-2

[Georg Possanner report on interview with Chancellor Bruno Kreisky: "After Damascus Resolutions: Kreisky-PLO Relations Cooling Off"; date, place not given]

[Text] Vienna--Relations between Chancellor Kreisky and the Palestinian Liberation Organization have cooled off noticeably since PLO chief 'Arafat reiterated at the recent Al-Fatah congress in Syria the intention to destroy Israel. In a talk with DIE PRESSE Kreisky declared in reply to the question whether the PLO would be invited to attend the next congress of the Socialist International [SI]: "I am not in favor of it after the latest resolutions adopted in Syria." These resolutions may have been adopted in a fit of anger over recent developments, but now "I cannot advocate an invitation." He added, however, that he would continue to take an interest in the cause of the Palestinians.

As far as his invitation to the mayors of Hebron and Halhul, (Kawasmah) and Milhim is concerned--they had been expelled by Israel and arrived in Vienna last night--Kreisky said he was not ready to tolerate anything like that. The two democratically elected mayors were prevented from exerting their function "against every democratic principle," and were taken out of the country, he said, adding that this was "regrettable and grotesque," because Israel is probably the only country where there are democratically elected Aray mayors. "You have got to hand that to Israel," but it makes the two mayors all the more legitimate. The question arises, with whom do the Israelis want to talk at all, Kreisky said. "Not with the PLO, not with the freely elected mayors--so, with whom? It is outrageous."

In reply to the question how he assessed the role of Jordan's King Husayn today, the chancellor declared: "He is playing an important role. He is a very important man, one of the most intelligent people in a very stable country, a very cool head." Does he believe that Husayn is in favor of a Palestinian state? "I believe that he is not against a Palestinian state." It could, after all, lead "to a federation." At any rate things are not as easy as some people believed who wanted to give back the occupied territories to him--Husayn feels bound by the Rabat resolutions of 1975, the chancellor said.

DUTCH GOVERNMENT SURVIVES PARLIAMENTARY CENSURE MOTION

Initial Loss

WA270331 London REUTER in English 0327 GMT 27 Jun 80

[Text] The Hague, June 27 (Friday), REUTER--The Dutch Government lost a key parliamentary vote early today after refusing to implement a resolution calling for a unilateral oil boycott of South Africa. Seventy-nine of the 150 members of the lower house voted against the Cabinet despite a pledge by Prime Minister Andreas van Agt to launch new initiatives to bring about an international embargo because of South Africa's apartheid policy. The opposition Labor Party (PVDA) then introduced a separate motion requiring the government to step down. Voting on this resolution was due to take place following an adjournament requested by leaders of the governing Christian Democratic Party (CDA). Thirteen CDA dissidents voted against the government, which was supported by only 66 deputies. The other members of the Chamber either abstained or were absent.

Two-Vote Margin

WA270359 London REUTER in English 0357 GMT 27 Jun 80

[Text] The Hague, June 27 (Friday), REUTER--The Dutch Government, by the margin of two votes, survived a parliamentary censure motion early today over its refusal to impose a unilateral oil boycott of South Africa. Some dissident members of the governing Christian Democratic Party (CDA), who had earlier backed a resolution demanding such an embargo, later voted against a motion which would have meant the downfall of the center-right Cabinet. A censure motion introduced by opposition Labor Party leader Joop den Uyl was supported by only 72 of the 150 lower house deputies. Seventy-four voted against it, with the remaining deputies absent or abstaining.

TRUDEAU, THATCHER CONFER ON CONSTITUTION REVISION

WA251143 London REUTER in English 1110 GMT 26 Jun 80

[Text] London, June 26, REUTER--Canadian Prime Minister Pierre Trudeau left by air today for Stockholm after talks with Prime Minister Margaret Thatcher on Canada's plans to gain full control of its own Constitution from Britain. From Sweden Mr Trudeau will go on to Norway for a short visit, completing his European tour.

In his talks yesterday with Mrs Thatcher, Mr Trudeau put Canada's case for changes in the British North America Act (BNA), which serves as Canada's Constitution. This could end what Canadian officials called the anomaly whereby a sovereign Canada is obliged in certain cases to seek British parliamentary approval for constitutional change, since the BNA is an act of the British Parliament. The projected changes would involve key provisions covering the division of powers between the federal government and provinces. Mr Trudeau's commitment to constitutional change received new impetus in the recent Canadian referendum in effect rejecting separatist proposals on Canada's future.

CARRINGTON 'DEPLORES' VIETNAMESE ATTACK ON THAILAND

LD261330 London PRESS ASSOCIATION in English 1225 GMT 26 Jun 80

[By Tom McMullan, PA diplomatic correspondent]

[Text] Foreign Secretary Lord Carrington today deplored the "violation" by Vietnam of Thailand's territory and called for the withdrawal of all Vietnamese troops from Cambodia. The foreign secretary, who was flying back to London from the NATO foreign ministers meeting in Ankara, instructed the Foreign Office in London to issue his statement. It follows strong condemnation of the Vietnam military intervention in Thailand by American secretary of state, Mr Edmund Muskie.

Lord Carrington said: "The Vietnamese incursion into Thailand on June 23 and 24 marks a serious escalation in Vietnamese aggression against neighbouring countries." He added: "The British Government deplores this violation of Thailand's territory and the further suffering inflicted on the Thai and Cambodian civilian population. Apart from the human suffering involved, it is clear that such irresponsible action could have serious consequences for the stability of the area. The Vietnamese Government and those who support them must respect the resolution passed by a large majority of the General Assembly last year and withdraw all Vietnamese troops from Cambodia."

FRG PAPER ON NATO MEETING, GREEK-TURKISH PROBLEMS

DW271158 Duesseldorf HANDELSBLATT in German 27 Jun 80 p 12

[Report signed V.H.: "Athens and Ankara Are Problem Children"]

[Excerpt] Ankara--At the Ankara meeting of NATO foreign ministers, like in Venice at the European Community summit and the meeting of state and government chiefs of the most important industrial countries, there was talk of signals, determination to face the Soviet Union and of the changed strategic situation following the intervention of Soviet troops in Afghanistan.

It was not merely the waiting of the NATO foreign ministers for a verbal signal from the Soviet Union that characterized the NATO meeting for the past 2 days, but also the inability to put the new geostrategic conception (division of work and distribution of new NATO tasks) on solid pillars to give the new NATO roof a strong foundation so as not to support it merely with signals. NATO's southern flank is involved in this effort. This flank consists only of Turkey, a militarily, socially and politically poorly organized alliance partner, and the intention of Greece to incorporate its armed forces into NATO's military sphere. NATO's task cannot consist only in the intention of preparing the Turks for possible dangers lurking in the Middle East and Iran.

Talks took place in Ankara on this subject between the U.S. secretary of state and the foreign ministers of Greece, the Federal Republic and Turkey. On Saturday the foreign ministers of Greece and Turkey, Mitsotakis and Erkmen, will discuss bilaterally, so to speak, no longer under the protection of NATO, the possibility of Greece's returning to the military wing of NATO, as well as Turkey's veto in Ankara with regard to Greece's becoming a full-fledged NATO member again (Greece belongs only to the NATO political committee). Chances for a positive outcome of the Greek-Turkish meeting are not good. The unstable political situation in Turkey, from where NATO wants to strengthen its Middle East position, does not seem stable enough for Greece to make compromises involving Greece's sphere of security.

LUNS ADDRESSES ATLANTIC ORGANIZATION IN ISTANBUL

TA281736 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1600 GMT 28 Jun 80

[Text] NATO Secretary General Joseph Luns expressed the conviction that NATO might soon find a solution acceptable to both Turkey and Greece aimed at improving relations between the two countries. Luns was addressing a meeting organized by the Turkish Atlantic Agreement Organization in Istanbul. Luns briefed the meeting on world and NATO problems.

Noting that NATO is well aware of Turkey's difficulties, Luns said that the improvement of Turkish-Greek relations will be a factor in increasing the economic and military aid being extended to Turkey.

Pointing out that the Soviet intervention in Afghanistan was one of the most important issues concerning NATO, Luns said that NATO, despite all, discussed the issue with great understanding. [as heard]

TWO WEST BANK MAYORS MEET KREISKY, HOLD PRESS CONFERENCE

Meeting With Kreisky

AU271047 Vienna DIE PRESSE in German 27 Jun 80 p 2

[Special DIE PRESSE report: "PLO Mayors in Vienna: Severe Charges Against Israel"]

[Text] Vienna (GPE)--Severe charges against Israel's occupation policy which climaxed in the statement that Israel has pushed the situation to the brink of war marked the statements made late on Wednesday evening [25 June] by the mayors of Hebron and Halhul, Al-Qawasimah and Milhim. They are in Vienna at the invitation of Chancellor Kreisky, together with the Islamic judge of Hebron, At-Tamimi, who has also been expelled.

In the course of an information tour, which has already taken them to the United States, Great Britain, the Netherlands and France, they want to draw attention to the conditions existing in the occupied territories. "We, the elected and deported mayors, are suffering at the hands of the settlers and the government police, Al-Qawasimah complained after his arrival.

Who in Austria--he asks--knows anything about the fact that 500 persons have been arrested in Hebron since 2 May, that all telephone lines were interrupted for a long time, and that a curfew has been imposed?

Stressing that the PLO is the only representative of the Palestinians, the two mayors emphatically called for self-determination and for a sovereign Palestinian state. They denied any possibility that such a state might become dangerous for the Israelis: "They can actually gain security", Milhim said, "namely, through an independent, Palestinian state. That is the only guarantee for peace and security in the Middle East."

In reply to DIE PRESSE'S specific question whether they saw any possibility of coexistence between a Palestinian state and the Israeli state, Milhim said: "Yes, we can imagine living side by side."

The visitors enthusiastically praised their host, Kreisky, calling him a friend of the Palestinians and of 'Arafat, and a man of vision and ideas. Kreisky is to date the only government chief who has received the three expelled notables on their current trip.

Report on Press Conference

AU271325 Vienna Domestic Service in German 1040 GMT 27 Jun 80

[Ferdinand Hennerbichler report on press conference given by West Bank Mayors Al-Qawasimah of Hebron and Milhim of Halhul in Vienna on 27 June--with recorded excerpts, beginning in English, fading into summarized German translation by Hennerbichler]

[Text] Ladies and gentlemen, the press conference has just ended. Its subject matter was frequently not very substantial, it was very moderate, marked by normal heat but never actually emotional or passionate. But let us get down to brass tacks. The democratically elected representatives of the Palestinian population of the Israeli-occupied West Bank say: Autonomy is not a solution for them, because it is not fair. To them, autonomy means a deadend. There will be no solution with Begin, the Israeli prime minister. Nor will there be a solution with the Israeli Labor Party, not even if it should come to power after Begin. The Labor Party's proposal to cede parts of the West Bank to the Kingdom of Jordan is also unacceptable, because in that case the Palestinians would again have no rights.

The mayors argue, moreover, that the Israeli Social Democrats were pursuing aims similar to those of the religious-conservatives in Israel surrounding Begin. It was indeed the Social Democrats who invented the settlement policy, and--like the religious-conservatives--they, too, denied the Palestinians their rights and oppressed them. Thus there can be no compromise with the Israeli Labor Party.

As far as the Americans are concerned they, too, are at present unable to bring any solution. The United Nations: At the moment there is no basis for a new UN solution. And as for Jordan: An agreement with Jordan is possible only after a fair Palestinian solution, but not before. The upshot: little optimism on the subject.

Then a psychological approach, following up what the mayors had earlier indicated--serious charges against the Israelis: They oppress the Palestinians, they want to wipe them out. Literally, the Israelis do not want peace, they want Palestinian land without Palestinians. Palestinians are treated as third-class people, like blacks. So much for these charges.

But then again an enormous optimism--Mayor Milhim of Halhul: [Begin recording] And I believe, all the time, that coexistence existed between the Jews and the Arabs before 1948, and this could be also--it could exist--after 1980. Jews and Arabs can coexist, whether in two different states or in one state.... [recording fades out]

He says he believes in a peaceful coexistence between the Jews and Arabs and with a nuance that did not come out very clearly in that excerpt: It would be possible in one common state as well as in two separate states, one for the Jews and the other for the Arabs.

And then, for the first time here in Vienna, there ensued at the press conference a little dispute with Israeli correspondents. (Marta Halquart), an Israeli correspondent, asked among other things whether one could rely on a Palestinian state actually being democratic rather than being remotely controlled by the PLO.

Milhim answered unequivocally that first the Israelis would have to withdraw their forces, but then the Palestinians would elect people's representatives in free elections and build up a completely independent democratic state.

Finally, on the prospects for the future, Mayor al-Qawasimah of Hebron: [Begin recording] There are no solutions without the PLO, there are no solution without self-determination of Palestinian land. This is [words indistinct] that must be understand. Anything else will be a temporary solution as Mayor Milhim says.... [recording fades out]

He says--let me sum up very briefly--there is no solution without the PLO. There will be no solution without the Palestinians' right to self-determination and this people's right to a country of its own. The only solution is to recognize the PLO. That has been done to date by over 100 states in the world. A solution can be found only in direct talks between Israelis and Palestinians. The Palestinians are ready for such talks. There must be an identity, a fatherland, a flag for the Palestinians. And then, in conclusion: All proposals submitted so far only amount to going around in circles. All this would break down very soon. However, the Palestinians could certainly wait for their solution, if necessary even for decades.

That ends my report from this press conference.

POLAND'S BABIUCH MAKES 2-DAY OFFICIAL VISIT

AU261144 Vienna WIENER ZEITUNG in German 26 Jun 80 p 1

[Unattributed report: "Poland's Premier in Vienna"]

[Summary] On Wednesday [25 June] Polish Council of Ministers Chairman Edward Babiuch arrived in the early morning at Vienna-Schwechat for his official 2-day visit, accompanied by his wife Lidia, Foreign Trade Minister Ryszard Karski, Power Minister Zbigniew Bartosiewicz, Deputy Foreign Minister Joszef Czyrek and several high-ranking officials. The Polish guests were welcomed at the airport by Chancellor Kreisky and State Secretary Adolf Nussbaumer.

The guests proceeded from the airport to their Vienna residence, the Imperial Hotel. President Kirchschlaeger gave a luncheon in Premier Babiuch's honor at the presidential office. Among those present--in addition to the Polish guests--were Chancellor Bruno Kreisky and several members of the Austrian Government, the floor leaders of the three political parties represented in Parliament, and high-ranking officials of the president's office, the Federal Chancellery, and the foreign and interior ministries. "In the afternoon, the talk scheduled with Chancellor Kreisky was held at the Chancellery."

"Following a discussion by experts, Trade Minister Staribacher and Polish Foreign Trade Minister Karski signed an agreement on Polish coal deliveries to Austria combined with an Austrian loan to Poland. This practically gave a green light to a 300 million dollar loan by a bank consortium headed by the Creditanstalt-Bankverein. The credit agreement is to be signed today at this bank. Because a Federal Treasury guarantee is required for the loan, a bill to this effect will have to be submitted immediately to the Nationalrat. According to Chancellor Kreisky, the bill could be passed in October."

In the evening, Chancellor Kreisky gave a dinner for the Polish guests at the Chancellery Congress Hall. Today Premier Babiuch will visit the Voest plant in Linz. He is scheduled to depart in the late afternoon from Vienna-Schwechat Airport.

Kreisky Hosts Dinner

[Unattributed report: "Intensification of Relations: Official Visit of Polish Premier in Austria Ends"]

[Excerpts] The 2-day official visit of Polish Council of Ministers Chairman Edward Babiuch ended yesterday [26 June]. Early last night, Babiuch and his entourage left for home from Vienna-Schwechat Airport. Yesterday morning the Polish guests inspected the Voest plants in Linz and then returned to Vienna by special train. On Wednesday evening [25 June], Chancellor Kreisky on behalf of the Austrian Government gave a dinner at the Chancellery in honor of Premier Edward Babiuch.

In his dinner toast the chancellor referred to the substantial intensification of the cultural, economic and political relations between Austria and Poland, two countries whose peoples have been linked by mutual sympathy for centuries.

The chancellor expressed thanks for the invitation to visit Poland that was extended to him, and went on to say among other things: "If our bilateral relations are developing in a desirable way and have thus very clearly provided visible evidence of a workable coexistence between states with different social systems, then it should nevertheless not be overlooked how much the policy of detente has been strained in the past few months.

"The developments in the Middle East and in Afghanistan are causing us most serious concern, and we fear that unless an easing of tensions can be achieved in these regions the policy of detente, which has had such beneficial effects so far, could be endangered. Countries such as Austria and Poland, whose peoples have to such an extent been victims of numerous wars, especially value peace and security, and this is why we have paid special attention to these questions in our talks.

"We are aware of the real conditions of power in the world. Nevertheless we believe that states such as ours have the duty to speak up again and again and to prove primarily through their practical policy that a peaceful and constructive coexistence of states with different systems is workable."

In his reply Premier Babiuch gave thanks for the hospitality extended to him and his entourage in Austria and for the chancellor's manifestation of friendship vis-a-vis the Polish people. He said he was pleased to be able to visit Austria and his first visit abroad.

The frequent contacts and mutual visits have become a good tradition in Polish-Austrian relations, he said. They serve the cooperation between the two countries that is developing in a great variety of fields, and make a constructive contribution to peace, security and cooperation in Europe. Moreover, they constitute an essential factor in the pan-European endeavors for defending the process of detente in the current difficult international situation. As the exchange of opinions in Vienna has confirmed, Poland and Austria are taking a vivid interest in supporting the positive trends in international politics, he said.

Joint Communique Issued

["Joint Communique on the Visit of the Polish Council of Ministers Chairman"]

[Text] At the invitation of Austrian Chancellor Bruno Kreisky, Edward Babiuch, chairman of the Council of Ministers of the Polish People's Republic, paid an official visit to Austria on 25 and 26 June. During this visit Council of Ministers Chairman Babiuch was received by the president of the Republic of Austria, Rudolf Kirchschlaeger.

Within the framework of their talks, which were marked by a constructive and friendly atmosphere, Chancellor Bruno Kreisky and Council of Ministers Chairman Babiuch had an exchange of opinions on topical international questions as well as on the development of Austrian-Polish relations. The talks were attended on Austria's side by Vice Chancellor Hannes Androsch; Willibald Pahr, minister for foreign affairs; Josef Staribacher, minister for commerce, trade and industry; Guenter Haiden, minister for agriculture and forestry; Karl Lausecker; minister for transportation; and State Secretary Adolf Nussbaumer. On Poland's side, they were attended by Ryszard Karski, minister of foreign trade maritime economy; Zbigniew Bartosiewicz, minister of power industry and atomic energy; and Jozef Czyrek, first deputy minister of foreign affairs. Also present at the talks were Friedrich Zanetti, ambassador of the Republic of Austria in Poland, and Franciszek Adamkiewicz, ambassador of the Polish People's Republic to Austria.

The two government chiefs stressed the need to make resolute endeavors at all levels to prevent a further deterioration of the international situation and to strengthen detente with the aim of safeguarding world peace. They manifested their countries' determination to work in this sense within the scope of their possibilities.

Special attention was paid to the development of cooperation in Europe; here the implementation of all provisions of the Helsinki final act is of special importance. Both government chiefs agreed that the Madrid CSCE followup meeting will have an essential significance for international detente. They stressed the need for thoroughly preparing this meeting and advocated its convocation on the scheduled date.

Both sides emphasized the importance that could be acquired by the convening of a conference on military detente and disarmament in Europe, the first phase of which should deal with confidence-building measures. They agreed that the confidence-building measures should be followed by effective disarmament steps. In this context they discussed the initiatives launched to date, including the Polish proposal to convene such a conference in Warsaw. The hope was expressed that, within the framework of balanced decisions by the Madrid meeting on all sectors of the CSCE final act, it will also be possible to achieve a decision on convening this conference.

The sides stressed the need for intensifying international endeavors to eliminate underdevelopment. In this respect, the forthcoming UN General Assembly special session will be of particular importance.

Within the framework of the exchange of opinions on bilateral relations, Chancellor Bruno Kreisky and Council of Ministers Chairman Edward Babiuch noted with satisfaction that the multifaceted cooperation between Austria and Poland continues to develop satisfactorily. The relations between the two countries constitute a good example of the development of positive relations between countries with different social systems. The government chiefs advocated the further development of the dialogue and cooperation between the two countries, the more so as they are convinced that the continuing development of the relations between Austria and Poland also serves the process of detente in Europe and in the world. In this context they emphasized the importance of the exchange of visits at the political level as well as of the direct contacts between the peoples and people of the two countries.

The sides paid special attention to the present state and the prospects of economic cooperation between the two countries. On this occasion attention was drawn to the recent signing of the agreement on the expansion of economic, industrial and technical cooperation of small and medium enterprises of the two countries, the signing of the protocol on the deepening of industrial cooperation between Austrian and Polish enterprises in third country markets, and of the long-term agreement on grain deliveries. In this context the sides stressed the importance of these agreements for the further development of trade and economic cooperation both in the bilateral sector and in third markets.

Both sides emphasized their interest in a satisfactory development in the energy sector which at the same time must be regarded as an essential contribution toward deepening economic cooperation in Europe. The sides stressed the importance of the agreement--signed during the visit--between the Ministry for Commerce, Trade and Industry of the Republic of Austria and the Ministry of Foreign Trade and Maritime Economy of the Polish People's Republic on the exportation of Polish bituminous coal, combined with the granting of a loan to Poland for the expansion of its coal mining capacity. It was also agreed to continue the talks for the further development of cooperation in the energy sector.

The sides welcomed the development of Austrian-Polish cooperation in the fields of culture, science and education, which contributes toward a better understanding between the people and peoples of the two countries, and advocated the further intensification of that cooperation. The new government agreement--signed on the occasion of the visit--on the implementation of the Austrian-Polish cultural agreement of 14 June 1972 also serves the same goal.

Both sides also paid tribute to the conclusion of the agreements on legal aid in criminal law cases and on extradition, which went into effect on 1 May 1980 and are aimed at facilitating legal exchange in criminal law cases and at insuring better legal protection for individual citizens.

Chancellor Bruno Kreisky and Council of Ministers Chairman Edward Babiuch expressed their full satisfaction with the cordial atmosphere and the success of their talks, which constitute a useful contribution toward deepening the friendly relations between the two countries and toward European cooperation.

Council of Ministers Chairman Edward Babiuch has invited Chancellor Bruno Kreisky for an official visit to Poland. The invitation has been accepted with thanks; a date will be fixed through diplomatic channels.

ARGENTINIAN FOREIGN MINISTER MEETS WITH LEADERS

Meets With Kirchschlaeger

AU260942 Vienna WIENER ZEITUNG in German 26 Jun 80 p 1

[Text] President Rudolf Kirchschlaeger yesterday met Carlos W. Pastor, minister of foreign relations of the Republic of Argentina, who is paying an official visit to Austria. Also present at the reception were Francisco Jose Pulit, Argentinian ambassador to Austria, Gerhard Gmoser, Austrian ambassador in Argentina, and Ambassador Friedrich Froelichsthal, chief of protocol.

Attends Dinner Hosted by Pahr

[Text] At a working dinner given for Argentinian Foreign Minister Carlos W. Pastor, who is paying an official visit to Austria, Foreign Minister Willibald Pahr referred to his latest visit to Argentina and noted with satisfaction that relations between Austria and Argentina have developed favorably in the past few months. The two states have proved that, although situated far apart geographically and having different political systems, they can foster intensive bilateral relations to mutual advantage, Pahr said. He stressed that Austria is convinced of the increasing importance of the dialogue between Europe and South America and is pleased to note that the Argentinian foreign minister's visit also reflects Argentina's interest in this dialogue.

Pahr pointed out that it was absolutely necessary for the international community of states to move closer together and to make joint efforts for the preservation of peace as well as for respect of human rights, without which there can be no genuine peace. Thus Austria considers intensified contacts with Latin America and especially with Argentina as particularly important, Pahr said. He assessed the establishment of friendly relations between Argentina and Brazil as guarantors for the peaceful development of the South America subcontinent, adding that this also would have a positive effect on the respect for human rights.

Politburo Member Axen Meets Kreisky

[Text] On Thursday [26 June] Chancellor Kreisky received [SED Politburo member] Hermann Axen for a talk. Hermann Axen is heading an SED delegation that is in Vienna at the invitation of the Austrian Communist Party [KPOe]. Both politicians agreed that intensified efforts by all forces interested in safeguarding peace are necessary to overcome the dangerious exacerbation of the international situation and to continue the process of detente in the spirit of Helsinki. In this context they stressed their states' readiness to make a constructive contribution to the success of the Madrid meeting.

Bruno Kreisky and Hermann Axen noted with satisfaction that the relations between Austria and the GDR are developing favorably in all fields. They drew attention to the importance of the forthcoming visit to Austria of Erich Honecker for deepening the cooperation between the two countries in the interest of their peoples and of peace in Europe.

The trade mission had been chosen for occupation because it is a "branch of American imperialism." The number of occupiers is still unknown.

STRAUSS 'WARNS' SCHMIDT ABOUT MOSCOW VISIT

LD271927 Hamburg DPA in German 1833 GMT 27 Jun 80

[Text] Munich--The union's chancellorship candidate, Franz Josef Strauss, has warned Chancellor Helmut Schmidt "not to place at risk German, European and Atlantic interests" during his Moscow trip. Schmidt would have "to bring back home considerable results from his talks," if his trip is not to have a harmful effect on the future development of the Federal Republic, Europe and the Atlantic Alliance, Strauss said in a statement published by the Bavarian State Chancellery in Munich tonight.

According to Strauss the Kremlin will have to be induced to withdraw all its troops from Afghanistan and to reconstitute the full sovereignty of that country. The Soviet Union will also have to abolish completely its arsenal of nuclear medium-range missiles. While in Moscow Helmut Schmidt should not allow himself to be turned "for electioneering purposes and in order to retain power into a tool of Soviet westpolitik." Unless far-reaching concessions by the Soviet Union are obtained, "Schmidt's trip will have caused untold damage even before he has set off."

SPOKESMAN BOELLING DISCUSSES TOPICS FOR MOSCOW SUMMIT

LD271420 Hamburg DPA in German 1144 GMT 27 Jun 80

[Excerpt] Bonn--It is becoming increasingly clear that the efforts to begin negotiations quickly between East and West on the limitation of new medium-range nuclear missiles in Europe will be one of the major items in the talks between Chancellor Schmidt and Foreign Minister Genscher with the Soviet leadership due to start in Moscow on Monday. According to Bonn sources the chancellor will try to find out from Brezhnev, the Soviet state and party leader, whether Moscow is prepared to enter into such negotiations even without the ratification of the U.S.-Soviet Salt II agreement.

In Bonn emphasis is laid on the "great interest" of the West for such a clarification, and attention is drawn to the latest Western confirmation of NATO's decision to introduce new nuclear weapons as well as the offer to negotiate with the USSR. Government spokesman Boelling told a press conference in Bonn today that Schmidt will seek a positive reply from Brezhnev to this decision of the Western alliance which remains unaltered and valid in both its parts.

Bonn's aim, Boelling said, is to ensure that talks will be held as soon as possible, "preferably preliminary negotiations without preconditions."

So far the USSR has made negotiations on the Eurostrategic weapons dependent on the annulment or suspension of the NATO decision. Boelling spoke of a disquieting Soviet superiority in these weapons. The Federal Government regards the military equilibrium as a key problem which must be solved satisfactorily if peace is to be made durable. Regarding Bonn's "thorough consultations," especially with the United States, the government spokesman stressed that the views which the chancellor will put forward in Moscow are in complete accord with those of the allies. They not only know the (views) of the chancellor and foreign minister regarding their Moscow visit but have expressly endorsed them.

Alluding to the skeptical views about concrete results from the Moscow trip Boelling said that to ask what could be expected from it is a "slanted question". It is the duty especially of the Germans to seize any chance of talks with the Soviet leadership on possibilities of resolving the current crises. In Moscow, Schmidt and Genscher want to provide a stimulus for the continuation of the dialogue between the two great powers in which they have a vital interest because of the future of detente.

Concerning the Soviet occupation of Afghanistan, which has been repeatedly condemned by Bonn, the chancellor and foreign minister will put forward their views "with due clarity" on the basis of the Western declarations, the most recent being those of Venice and Ankara, Boelling said. Concerning the Iranian crisis, Boelling said, Moscow's attention will be drawn to the duty of all members of the international community of states to contribute to a positive solution of the hostage affair. As far as German-Soviet relations are concerned, Bonn sees no urgent questions. However, Boelling announced that the chancellor will raise the question of the drop in the number of persons who have left the USSR since 1978 under the family reunification program.

29 Jun Interview

LD291104 Hamburg DPA in German 1007 GMT 29 Jun 80

[Excerpts] Bonn--According to government spokesman Klaus Boelling, Chancellor Helmut Schmidt and Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher intend to discuss with the Soviet leaders in Moscow "calmly, openly and in detail" the incursion into Afghanistan.

Boelling said on Sunday during the "Frankfurt Talks" on Hesse Radio that this refers especially also to the announcement by the Soviet leaders on the partial withdrawal of troops. The political value of this announcement could be assessed only after "pressing and detailed questions", Boelling said. He assumed that the Soviet Union was prepared for such questions, which would be asked by Schmidt and Genscher not only on behalf of the Federal Republic.

According to Boelling, no date has as yet been fixed for the chancellor's planned meeting with SED Chief Erich Honecker. The 29th of August and the venue of Rostock could not yet be confirmed, Boelling said. However, he stressed the Federal Government's interest in making this trip this summer "in the interest of our own citizens and those of the GDR."

GENSCHER INTERVIEWED ON 27 JUN MOSCOW VISIT

DW300740 Hamburg ARD Television Network in German 2030 GMT 27 Jun 80

[Excerpts from reporter Ernst-Dieter Lueg interview with Federal Foreign Minister Genscher on the program "Report From Bonn"--recorded]

[Text] [Question] Expectations, expectations that are too high are being linked with this new spectacular Moscow visit, expectations the German delegation will hardly be able to fulfill. This visit will obviously not be a normal working visit. Will it not also carry the additional burden of domestic political reflections?

[Answer] The visit will certainly be of special importance due to the international situation. But particularly in such difficult international developments it is important not to keep quiet. One would much rather speak with firmness and clarity to those to whom one wants to explain one's ideas. I believe it would be a black day for our country if some day the government refused to talk about peace and security.

[Question] How can this visit take place, contradicting as it does other interests--national interests and commitments vis-a-vis the alliance?

[Answer] This contradiction does not exist. It has just been confirmed once again at the Ankara NATO session that all our allies back the solution of the problems which weigh upon us in a special way because we are a divided nation. Seen in this way we will be entering the Moscow talks with full backing with regard to this problem. I think it will add special weight to what we have to outline there.

[Question] No problems involving trade and economy between the two countries. What could be done to improve bilateral relations, say with regard to the problem of resettlement affairs?

[Answer] Family reunification problems are an important matter which ought to be discussed against the background of the Helsinki followup conference slated to take place this fall in Madrid. The family reunification issue is a very important result of the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe.

SCHMIDT, GENSCHER DEPART FOR MOSCOW

LD300712 Hamburg DPA in German 0640 GMT 30 Jun 80

[Text] Hamburg--Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt and Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher left Hamburg by air this morning for their 2-day visit to Moscow.

The talks with the Soviet leaders are scheduled to begin late this afternoon. The main topics will be the deployment of medium-range nuclear missiles in Europe and the crisis in the Middle East, particularly the Soviet occupation of Afghanistan. Schmidt and Soviet state and party leader Leonid Brezhnev will have a total of 6 hours of talks over the 2 days.

Regarding disarmament policy, Schmidt will press Brezhnev for Soviet readiness to enter into East-West negotiations on the so-called Eurostrategic weapons. With regard to Afghanistan, the chancellor wants to determine what long term solution the Soviet leaders have for the problem in the wake of the Soviet announcement of the withdrawal of some troops.

GENSCHER TO VISIT WASHINGTON FOLLOWING MOSCOW TRIP

[Excerpt] Washington--Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher, during a lightning visit to Washington, is to inform the U.S. Government next Wednesday on the outcome of talks by Chancellor Helmut Schmidt in Moscow, the German Embassy said on Friday in reply to an inquiry that the minister would remain in the U.S. capital only a few hours.

FOREIGN OFFICE CONDEMNS SRV ATTACKS ON THAI REFUGEE CAMPS

LD271528 Hamburg DPA in German 1510 GMT 27 Jun 80

[Text] Bonn--The Federal Government sees in the outcome of the 13th conference of ASEAN foreign ministers "further proof for the stabilizing and peace-keeping role of this regional association of states." The Foreign Office today pointed to the Federal Government's concern about the military conflicts on the Thailand and Cambodian frontier area. It also condemned the Vietnamese attack on refugee camps and the violation of Thai areas by Vietnamese troops which seriously violated (?peace) in that whole region.

MARCHAIS INTERVIEW ON PCF POSITIONS, AIMS

AT291455 Athens RIZOSPASTIS in Greek 29 Jun 80 p 3

[Exclusive interview with George Marchais, secretary general of the French Communist Party Central Committee--date and place not given]

[Text] Question: Comrade Marchais, recently a number of new factors have appeared on the international scene, especially that of the extremist tendencies of the cold war which is dominating imperialism's policy. It is well known that you personally had a great number of meetings recently with distinguished personalities within the international revolutionary movement. Therefore, are you optimistic or pessimistic regarding developments and prospects on the international level?

George Marchais: It is true that recently I had the opportunity to meet a certain number of leaders of revolutionary and national liberation movements from many countries. All these meetings--and the events which have taken place since the meetings--confirm the analyses of our 23rd Congress, which took place in May 1979, concerning developments of the international situation.

We believe that the world in our time is undergoing a profound change. Huge forces have been drafted to defeat exploitation, oppression and war. They have achieved very great successes. In a few years the correlation of forces on the international scale has shifted noticeably in support of peace, independence of peoples and nations, socialism. The weight and the prestige of the socialist countries have increased; the working class and the other popular classes of the capitalist countries are waging strong fights specifically against the policy of austerity and unemployment; the people of the developing countries are being liberated from the obstacles of colonialism and neocolonialism and are rightfully claiming their complete independence and multilateral development.

In order to stop such a development and recover, if possible, lost ground, imperialism has started this blunt counterattack whose violence you have stressed. It is involving itself in the internal affairs of the peoples, as the piratical operation in Iran has shown. It is supporting the most reactionary regimes, as in Salvador, Uruguay, South Africa, South Korea. It is restarting the arms race, specifically increasing threats against the security of the European people by upsetting the balance of forces on our continent through the installation of many hundreds of new U.S. nuclear missiles on European territory. It is waging a true ideological war. It is increasingly relying on social democracy to strengthen or support and preserve its interests or achieve its aims. You ask me if I am optimistic or pessimistic. I reply unhesitatingly: I am optimistic. Conditions truly exist to thwart imperialism's aims. This is splendidly shown by the fiasco of the boycott of the Olympic games. The forces of peace and progress currently have all the prerequisites to achieve notable results through a determined action and the broader rally of popular classes in all countries. Many initiatives which were adopted by 14 democratic organizations will be implemented before the end of this month. After all, this orientation is acceptable to many peaceful forces and above all to the communist parties of Europe which recently had a meeting in Paris that was very positive on these issues and called the people to a struggle.

Question: Our country's bourgeois press supports the viewpoint that France supports a "third road", an independent road. How do you assess Giscard d'Estaing's current foreign policy?

George Marchais: Giscard d'Estaing's foreign policy--like his domestic policy--is characterized by duplicity. Basically it concerns a policy of alignment with the Federal Republic of Germany and devotion to the United States.

Certainly Atlanticism is no longer as evident as during the 1950's. Its followers are obliged to take into consideration the correlation of forces on the international scale, imperialism's true possibilities and its contradictions. Within these conditions the strategy of the imperialist forces currently entails, together with devotion to the United States, some allocation of the work. After all, Chancellor Schmidt explained this publicly when he said that "within the framework of common goals everybody should focus on the thing for which one has aptitude and competency."

This is what Giscard d'Estaing is doing. At no point has he expressed the slightest reservation in connection with the decision to install new U.S. missiles in Europe, to increase the defense budgets of the NATO forces, to create a U.S. expeditionary corps of 100,000 men, to install bases in Turkey and elsewhere. Therefore, one cannot at all describe Giscard d'Estaing's foreign policy as independent. Quite the contrary. The truth is that the existence in France of an active and influential Communist Party and our people's profound dedication to independence and peace lead the president of the republic to cloak his policy with certain precautions.

This explains the meeting of the leader of the French state with Leonid Brezhnev in Warsaw--a meeting that we evaluated as positive. This also explains the fact that France was not able to boycott the Moscow Olympic games. Finally, this explains his preelection bluff on the issue of an "interval" in the procedure of the expansion of the Common Market.

Question: In Greece the defenders of the accession to the EEC have declared--at every opportunity--that our country's participation in the Common Market would bring significant benefits to Greek workers, working people, small and medium businesses. What is the experience you have from France's participation in the EEC regarding the consequences for French working people? Is there a conflict of interest between French and Greek farmers?

George Marchais: The "arguments" currently being made in Greece by the supporters of accession to the EEC are sometimes word for word the same as those made by the representatives of all the French political parties--with the exception of our party--to persuade France to join the Common Market when it was being established. If one had listened to them, full employment, social progress and democracy would have been guaranteed ever since!

Currently, however, everyone in our country can make the following report: a significant increase in unemployment and austerity for the working people; the disappearance--planned in cold blood--of entire sectors of our industry and of 1 million agricultural related businesses; an increase of autocracy in businesses and institutions; the reduction of the French Parliament's privileges in favor of the European supranational organs; hegemony of the strongest capitalist complexes, principally of West German complexes. Most simply, the Brussels committee usurps the right to decide the future of French production, specifies the size, the prices.... In a sector as vital as metallurgy, installations of great economic and technical value are being destroyed and thousands of workers dismissed. For 5 years the share of French metallurgy in the EEC has clearly dropped while the share of German metallurgy has increased. The same assessment can be made regarding other principal sectors like ship construction, weaving, coal and agriculture.

As for 1980, the European Community's predictions speak for themselves: This year the percentage of development will drop from 3.1 to 1.2; inflation will increase--on an average--from 6.8 to 11.3 percent and unemployment will increase from 5.2 to 6.4 percent for the working population. This is a brief summary of the Common Market report which will become worse because of the expansion.

This is the policy which our party fights, confronting the entire right and the social democrats who defend the same position. Our position has always been the same, without ambiguity. We do not want to hear of any conditions, intervals or precedents. We candidly say no to expansion.

By defending this position obviously we have in mind the interests of French workers and of France. But in what way would this fight against the businesses of large capital be contrary to the interests of the Greek people or of the other peoples? The adversary is the same: the multinational companies and the banks which dominate the EEC. Furthermore, we share with the KKE this national and class position. We even had the opportunity to express this together when my friend, Secretary General of the KKE [Exterior] Central Committee Kharilaos Florakis, visited Paris.

Question: It is well known that you are the chairman of the human rights committee in France and the international one. What are the reasons which prompted you to establish this committee and what are the first initiatives you have taken?

George Marchais: Ever since it was born 60 years ago our party has actively defended the freedoms and rights of man. It does this by fighting unemployment, exploitation, misery, attacks against the rights and dignity of the working people. It does this by working for disarmament and by supporting all the struggling people of the world.

We decided to establish this committee and put it under my chairmanship mainly for two reasons:

The first reason is that imperialism, the nature of which leads to the oppression of millions of people and to attacks against people, currently is waging a great campaign to cover up its crimes. It is thus generating a huge propaganda movement to deceive international public opinion on the issue of human rights. We considered it necessary to rebut this campaign. This is the first reason why we established this committee.

The second reason is that most of the people who claim that they defend human rights have a narrow and truncated concept of these rights. In our eyes human rights include--together with individual and collective freedoms--the rights to work, health, education, the right to life, to contribute to the development of a richer concept of human rights. This is what led us to our decision.

Although our committee is new, it has many initiatives to its credit that have met with great response. We have published, handed to the United Nations and have propagated en masse a document showing a report--aggravating for imperialism--of the slaughters and political or racial murders that have taken place in the world in the last 20 years.

We have also published a list of 13 men and women who are unjustly in prison for political reasons. We express our satisfaction that we have won for one of them, Paraguayan Professor (Virgilio Barrero) [as published]. In addition to this, we have visited the Directorate of the International Red Cross in Geneva and handed over--before publication--a document on flagrant violations of human rights in various areas of the world.

Furthermore, we have demanded the establishment of a committee in the European Parliament to investigate violations of human rights in the nine countries of the EEC.

At the same time, we have prepared and published a document which refers to attacks against the freedoms and social rights of working people in French businessess and of people in general.

Finally our committee intervenes daily to support the rights of men and women both in France and in the whole world.

In a few words: We speak and act in support of human freedoms and rights without restriction and discrimination. This is our principle.

Question: More than 2 years have passed since parliamentary elections were held and since the socialists abandoned the common program of the left. How do you think it is currently possible for one to rally the forces of the left in France in order to accomplish change?

George Marchais: We have drawn two main lessons from the division of unity by the Socialist Party and the failure of the left which followed in March 1978.

The first lesson is the following: In order for unity to endure, which is needed by the working people to impose the necessary changes and to defeat the class adversary, this unity must first become the concern of the working people themselves. Therefore, we must build at the base through the struggles themselves.

Regarding the second lesson we have drawn from experience, it is the decisive role played in implementing a strong and steady unity by the strength and influence of the Communist Party. Truly, the Socialist Party was able to break up the unity because the Communist Party was not strong enough to preserve it. The Socialist Party was able, at the decisive moment, to thwart the change because the Communist Party was not strong enough to overcome the pressure being exerted inside and outside the country by the reactionary and social democratic forces.

Thus our goal is to work for the strengthening of the Communist Party so that this unity can become the true concern of the working people, so that the agreements to be concluded at the top when the time comes can be truly respected and implemented.

Our people need this new unity so that the situation can truly change so that they can proceed with democracy on the road of socialism.

So that these conditions can be created, so that the unifying struggles at the base can develop, a great Communist Party is indispensable. We are devoting all our forces to this.

ROLAND LEROY REBUTS PS CRITICISM OF PCF AFGHAN COVERAGE

LD260841 Paris L'HUMANITE [illegible] French 14 Jun 80 p 1

[Roland Leroy editorial: "[illegible] None So Deaf...."]

[Text] The Socialist Party [illegible] weekly magazine [presumably L'UNITE]--devotes almost all its first page to one article this week. With what do you think it deals? The workers' demands! [paragraph continues]

The right to strike at the French electric company? The police intervention in Nancy, Little or Amiens? Peyrefitte's repressive plan? Rises in food prices, postal charges, gasoline prices?

It deals with none of these. Claude Estier's magazine, like Hersant's LE FIGARO, attacks the communists and the very idea of socialism.

Both launch into flights of fancy about "the Communist Party's alignment with Moscow." It is about the situation in Afghanistan that both vent their wrath. L'HUMANITE's readers have read Martine Monod's reports. They were not speculative articles like those of the press "correspondents" most frequently sent from Pakistan. Today another L'HUMANITE journalist arrives in Kabul and he will report what he sees in the capital and in the rest of the country.

Today I would merely like to dwell on three questions.

First, the Socialist Party newspaper quite shamelessly writes: "People are dying in Afghanistan today, many people, under the socialist soldiers' bullets." Let us repeat what nobody wanted the Soviet military intervention but, when it became necessary, many of us thought about what the French attitude ought to have been in helping the Spanish Republic in 1937, for instance. However, the essential point is that the Soviet Army intervened in Afghanistan against the feudalists and against the activity of foreign forces which were using Pakistan as a base. Let us note at this point the outrageous attitude taken by those with convenient memories. In France, communist militants were executed--for instance Jean Catelas on 24 September 1941--under the terms of the decree issued previously by Socialist Justice Minister Serol. In Algeria 15 years later Fernand Yveton was guillotined. The prime minister at that time was Socialist Party Secretary General Guy Mollet. Francois Mitterrand was justice minister.

Second, Claude Estier's and Robert Hersant's newspapers simultaneously criticize us for paying tribute to the socialist countries' positive record. We will return to this question in detail in our newspaper. I would simply like to recall what we said, what Georges Marchais said on our behlf at our last congress: "We will not leave any uncertainty on the question of the record of several decades spent building socialism for that would prevent us from giving a simple and clear reply to the only question which ultimately matters: Is it or is it not a good thing that the peoples concerned have built socialism or would it have been better if they had not? Our reply to this question is energetic and unambiguous: Yes, it is a good thing for them and for us."

Third, and finally, if we move for a moment beyond the language of the socialist newspapers--as it happens more American than the Americans--we must assess the possibilities of seeing a normal situation restored in Afghanistan. Is the withdrawal of Soviet troops possible? It can be carried out, the Afghan Government says, if an agreement establishing noninterference and the country's independence is concluded with Pakistan and Iran. Such an agreement could be guaranteed by the Soviet Union and the United States and by France, as Georges Marchais added on the radio 2 days ago.

There is none so deaf as he who will not hear. When questions of peace and peoples' independence are raised the Socialist newspaper and LE FIGARO hear nothing.

L'HUMANITE WARNS OF DANGERS POSED BY EUROMISSILES

LD261225 Paris L'HUMANITE in French 20 Jun 80 pp 1, 2

[Michel Naudy article: "The Consensus of Terror"]

[Text] In Matignon yesterday evening and in Brussels tomorrow similar delegations are following one after the other: People are coming tirelessly from all corners of France to demand a halt in the nuclear escalation in Europe. On 20 December last year 80,000 Parisians poured into the streets for a similar reason and many different forces united behind the communists with the one aim of preserving peace.

Nonetheless the danger was not averted. Under the U.S. stick, NATO is persisting in its decision to deploy 180 Pershing-2 and 464 cruise missiles with nuclear warheads in Europe. In her haste to comply with the White House orders Mrs Thatcher has preceded all her partners by announcing that the sites for the U.S. nuclear missiles have already been chosen. Finally, according to the West German press, Mr Carter has personally warned Chancellor Schmidt "against a delay in deploying the medium-range missiles in Europe." All this is a prelude to a NATO meeting due to take place in Ankara on 24 June.

In other words, they are going full steam ahead and the United States is "forcing" matters so as to impose an inbalance of forces in Europe to its advantage.

This is the real point.

By forcing the NATO decision on 12 December last year with the determined support of the FRG Social Democratic leaders, the United States deliberately endangered the detente process.

Although the SALT II agreements crowning the strategic arms negotiations had been signed in Vienna only 6 months earlier, Mr Carter took the responsibility of destabilizing the whole structure and designating Europe as the future nuclear cemetery.

Of course there has been no lack of arguments to justify the capitulation to the Americans: Kampuchea, Africa and Vietnam (at that time they did not have Afghanistan to write about) have served as pretexts in turn. However, the main piece of deception is to be found in the assertion, as widespread as it is untrue, that the Soviets themselves had broken their promises by deploying their SS-20 missiles.

There is no answer to that, is there?

However, the SS-20's have existed since 1975. They are medium-range missiles which do not threaten U.S. territory and were accepted by the United States to such an extent that SALT II does not mention them....

President Carter himself in a fit of honesty confessed 2 months before the NATO decision that "nobody in the world surpasses our defense forces" and there is reason to think that the Soviets would find it very difficult to "surpass" this "superiority" in 60 days.

It is therefore a political decision. A dangerous decision too.

Indeed, the deployment of the U.S. missiles creates a new balance of forces in Europe and those who see the effects of Soviet "misinformation" everywhere would do well to refer to their own strategies in this sphere. For instance, the Italian General Pasti, who is a former top NATO official, bluntly admitted on 20 December that "the deployment of Pershing-2 and cruise missiles would substantially undermine a balance which has only just been attained."

The fact is that, contrary to one type of logic, one missile does not necessarily equal another. With their Pershing and cruise missiles the United States, which alone controls their use, is in fact capable of reaching Soviet territory. The Soviet Union is incapable of hitting U.S. territory with the SS-20 missiles which have a comparable range. This is an important nuance if you remember the loud protests which followed the plan to deploy Soviet missiles in Cuba....

This is a comparable situation but it is reversed.

Hence there is threefold danger.

First, since it is not very probable that the USSR will tolerate such a situation for very long, the U.S. decision will revive the arms race. It is ruinous for peace and also for development.

Second, it marks Europe as the future battlefield in a tactical nuclear war in which (as usual....) the United States would only be involved from a distance.

Finally, since most of the missiles will be concentrated in the FRG, that country is confirmed in its role as imperialist spearhead against the socialist countries.

However, some people are asking what France is doing in this affair? Is it unconcerned because it is not a member of the Atlantic Alliance military organization?

Indeed, the NATO leaders have not refrained from proclaiming that the deployment of the new missiles was unlikely to displease Mr Giscard d'Estaing and it is difficult to imagine the latter being indifferent to such a nuclear concentration on our borders.

Indeed, there are many ways of playing Washington's trump cards, from complete alignment to relative autonomy.

Mr Giscard d'Estaing, who has to take account of the achievements of some aspects of Gen de Gaulle's policy, of the strength of the workers' movement in his country and the interests of the French trusts, has chosen camouflage dress.

Therefore, although France has not been reintegrated into NATO, all efforts have been directed since 1974 toward the gradual abandonment of the deterrent strategy in favor of a doctrine which tends to implicate us in a European tactical nuclear conflict and make us reintegrate our bastion of defense into the "free world."

Despite appearances this is what is at stake in the current debate on the neutron bomb. Indeed this new projectile is designed for quasi-automatic use in a conflict and its technical characteristics mean that it can "vulgarize" nuclear fire and definitely remove from people's memories the "inopportune" pictures of Hiroshima.

It is true that the decision has not yet been taken. But everybody knows that the bases of a consensus of terror have been established. The armed forces chief of staff is in favor and so is the Union for French Democracy, the Rally for the Republic and the defense minister are not opposed to it and the Socialist Party, in keeping with its refusal to join the current demonstrations, has just rejected a motion opposing its manufacture. If you add to that the fact that a holy alliance has been formed in support of the U.S. missiles you will understand the extent of the danger.

This is one more reason for not accepting this situation.

UDF OFFICIAL DISCUSSES CONCEPT OF NEUTRON BOMB

DW271203 Hamburg ARD Television Network in German 2030 GMT 25 Jun 80

[Reporter Wickert Paris interview with Michel Pinton, manager of the Giscardists, the UDF, in French with superimposed translation; date not given--recorded]

[Text] [Question] While the Gaullists fear that the concept of nuclear retaliation could be softened by the construction of the neutron bomb, the party of State President Giscard d'Estaing considers it a completion of deterrence measures.

[Answer] For us the neutron bomb is an additional weapon in the framework of deterrence policy. According to Giscard's party's defense doctrine, the neutron bomb is supposed to be used in Western Europe. It is supposed to be an excellent weapon for such use particularly. It would protect the population of the friendly country, and it would increase the losses of the enemy divisions. So it is a weapon that will deter the antagonist.

[Question] Suppose the neutron bomb will be used on German soil under your concept; will this not require some coordination?

[Answer] If this weapon is fired from German soil--and this would be terrible--this will require a minimum of coordination between the German and French governments. This is my personal opinion. For the decision rests exclusively with the president and solely is a matter of his conscience and remains his secret. But the weapon primarily serves the defense of French soil.

[Wickert concluding remarks] It is just for the benefit of the Gaullists that they say the bomb exclusively serves the defense of French's borders. Under the real concept, which is kept secret, however, the neutron bomb is to be used even before the tanks of the aggressor have advanced far into the territory of the Federal Republic. But this means that missiles would have to be fired from German soil.

BOFFA COMMENTS ON VENICE SUMMIT, FUTURE OF DETENTE

LD271455 Milan L'UNITA in Italian 24 Jun 80 pp 1, 16

[Giuseppe Boffa commentary: "Faultless Hospitality"]

[Text] Doubtless the world's most serious problems that were discussed in Venice over the past 2 days. Both political and economic problems--the former perhaps even more than the latter. Furthermore, the talks seem to have been anything but formal. As for the conclusions, leaving aside superficial shows of unity--which were inevitable but which seemed qualified already by the spokesmen for the individual delegations--only developments during the coming weeks will be able to show us their real importance.

The Afghan issue assumed a prominent place in the summit's proceedings, as was inevitable. It was influenced by the Soviet announcement of a partial withdrawal of troops. Yesterday Moscow sources also specified how many troops: a division of about 10,000 men and their tanks. Obviously this is not yet the solution to the problem and nobody pretends that it is. It is, however, a political gesture which, it is hoped, will be followed by others. A gesture not only to the seven governments represented at Venice but also to the Islamic and nonaligned countries which have tried recently to open the door to negotiations. The U.S. administration preferred to regard it as a worthless move. Other governments, including the French and German governments--the ones most committed to a resumption of the dialogue--preferred to devote more attention to it. Certainly not abandon the total withdrawal of troops that they all hope for, but to take note of its implications as an opening to a political solution of the problem.

In any case, the Afghan issue is part of broader issue which formed a backdrop to the entire Venice meeting from the preparatory stage on. This is the future of detente. The Americans, with the thesis that detente must be global, tried to block and annul its results in Europe; unfortunately they were followed along this path by the Italian Government. The Germans and French, who are aware that they represent a tendency common to other European states, preferred to defend the gains of detente on our continent, seeking a starting point here for extending its benefits elsewhere as well. They did not abandon this option in Venice. It augurs well for Schmidt's imminent visit to Moscow. It is something on which the U.S. administration (not to mention the Italian one) would do well to reflect on, without irritability or demagoguery.

There remain the economic problems, which rather lapsed into the background, though at least formally they constituted the first point on the agenda. These are discussed more fully in another report. However, the results do not seem satisfactory. In particular, the final communique contains no adequate reply to the trade unions' appeal to the summit to undertake a more committed struggle against the growing scourges of inflation and unemployment. Nor does it seem that any noteworthy progress was made with regard to the problems of the underdeveloped world, though some interesting ideas did circulate, especially under the stimulus imparted by the report from the Brandt commission--for instance, the idea of a broad world action involving the industrialized countries of both East and West, as well as the oil-producing countries, in a direct dialogue with the most underprivileged peoples. On this point too, however, it seems that there was clear U.S. and British opposition.

My final observations concerns Italy's presence. Italy provided the summit with the seductive setting of Venice and with a hospitality which seemed to us faultless, as well as a prime minister who, judging at least from the television pictures, seemed demoted to the rank of master of ceremonies. Unfortunately everyone could see that it was the others who discussed the serious matters. In fact you have to secure a prominent positions in these debates through the consistency of your ideas and your strength to defend them. Otherwise there is no point in complaining or you risk being excluded, whether or not formally is only important up to a point.

L'UNITA SEES CARTER-COSSIGA COMMUNIQUE AS 'GRAVE, WORRISOME'

[Unattributed commentary: "Calculated Torpedo"]

[Text] Over the past 2 days the Italian Government has had a chance to speak directly to the foremost leader of the foremost world power, one of the two powers on which the future of world peace a large extent depends. It had recently claimed that it considered this opportunity for top-level dialogue very valuable. In the present international crisis its significance could and indeed should have been very great. But the communique released yesterday evening at the end of the talks tell us that this opportunity did not serve to make the U.S. administration heed our country's voice and aspirations but instead to give a public demonstration of willing alignment with U.S. stances, in obvious contrast with the specific reservations prompted by Washington's policy throughout the rest of Western Europe. The communique is therefore grave and worrisome.

This passive adherence to the U.S. policy line can be observed in connection with all the issues mentioned in the communique. It is particularly alarming with regard to the issue of weapons in Europe. The communique practically shuts the door on serious negotiations for their reduction. Indeed, there is no point in announcing that you intend to carry out at the same time ("simultaneously," the document says) both arms "limitation" and the deployment of new missiles. These two things cannot go hand in hand because, as the most elementary logic shows, they are mutually exclusive. Not even the slightest mention is made of the so-called "cancellation clause" (allowing the possibility of abandoning the new weapons in exchange for a similar renunciation by the Soviets, which Chancellor Schmidt has pushed so hard for). But, even more seriously, not a single word is said about the SALT treaty to which the Italian Government until yesterday claimed to attach great importance.

The same applies to all the other points. To Afghanistan, in connection with which not a word is said about the EC's latest proposal, call for the Soviet troops' withdrawal, but which also proposed a quest for guarantees capable of ensuring the country's neutrality and noninterference in its internal affairs: Nor indeed is there any mention of a political solution, to which not only other European leaders, but several representative of the nonaligned bloc including the Islamic countries are now committed. The same applies to Iran, mention being made only of the diplomatic prisoners' release, with not a word of sympathy for the country and its people. Last, the Middle East.

It is true that on this final topic Cossiga and Carter did introduce into the communique a slight hint of discrepancy in their stances. In any case one cannot see how our prime minister could avoid such an observation, having signed in Venice a few days ago a European communique which differs greatly with the theses which Carter came to support in Rome. [paragraph continues]

But in presenting his own line Cossiga moved radically away from the Venice European option, failing to mention precisely its two most decisive points: the Palestinian people's self-determination and the PLO's association in the negotiations. He has thus casually gone back on what he solemnly accepted a few days ago.

This flaunted alignment is all the more alarming inasmuch as it constitutes a calculated stab in the back for the other European countries, equally Italy's allies and members of the same community, which have sought with patient skill to develop an autonomous initiative capable of reflecting Europe's own interests in the present international crisis. It is in particular an attempt--a clumsy one, even--to paralyze in advance the difficult diplomatic mission that Chancellor Schmidt is about to undertake.

At this point we must ask ourselves how the political forces that make up the present government--and especially the Italian Socialist Party--can reconcile such an attitude with the very different stances on these same topics which their authoritative representatives have frequently stated in public.

In particular, we must ask how the Cossiga-Carter communique can be reconciled with their claimed Europeanism. It was not accidental that the document evaded even the ritual tribute to European unity, just as not the slightest reference is made to Europe's world role.

PLAN TO FREEZE WAGE INDEX SCALE ELICITS LABOR PROTEST

AU271057 Rome ANSA in English 0830 GMT 27 Jun 80

[Text] Rome, June 27 (ANSA)--Organized labor was reported here today to be girding itself for battle against the government's widely-reported plans to revise the sliding cost-of-living scale which determines the size of inflation-compensation payments added to workers' wages initially. Two days of press leaks about the measures that will be forthcoming in the government's anti-crisis package stirred up a hornet's nest of reactions from the nation's leading trade union centrals. The pro-Communist "CGIL" labor organization had an "incredulous" reaction to the news and the most typical comment from its labor leaders was, "we can't believe that the government would agree to the measures announced in the press". If put into effect, the measures would amount to an unprecedented "attack" against the unions, "almost a coup".

But there was reason to doubt today that the whole government was in agreement with the measures, none of which have as yet been officially disclosed. For one, Labor Minister Franco Foschi told reporters at the Foreign Press Association yesterday that his stand was "very similar" to the one taken by the unions. Foschi stated in part: "I am not in a position to guess what the government's final decision will be...but I must say that my own view is that you cannot enact unilateral measures without the consent of organized labor".

The leaders of the "FIM" Metal Workers Union, the vanguard of the Italian labor movement, have urged the joint "CGIL-UIL-CISL" federation to consider extending the July 1 metal workers' strike to all categories. A formal call for a nationwide general strike also came yesterday from the "CISL" textile workers union. The "UIL" leadership issued a statement reiterating its opposition to "any move, even a partial one, tampering with the cost-of-living scale". The confederation (Socialist-Republic) demanded an immediate meeting with the government on the grounds that the unions "could hardly relate to press leaks".

In the wake of these reactions, a series of on-the-spot assemblies, debates and brief protest walkouts were staged yesterday in northern factories throughout Lombardy, Veneto and Piedmont. Shop union leaders of Fiat's Mirafiori autoworkers in Turin voiced their "indignation" about the government's plans to freeze the wage indexation scale.

From the world of politics, Proletarian Unity (PDUP) Secretary Lucio Magri went on record as branding the purported development "doubly serious" from the standpoint of "method and merit". But the other side considers the sliding inflation-compensation system "harmful to the whole economic system" as the president of the National Business Association (Confindustria), Vittorio Merloni, told television viewers last night. Dubbing the automatic wage adjustment scale "perverse" Merloni stressed that the "Confindustria" did not want to do away with it altogether, but merely wanted to "revise" it.

Foschi on Talk With Fiat Leader

AU271118 Rome ASNA in English 0845 GMT 27 Jun 80

[Text] Rome, June 27 (ANSA)--The Fiat automotive giant would not be justified in hacking a sizeable chunk of its labor force off the payroll, according to Italian Labor Minister Franco Foschi. The Rome government official came to that conclusion after hearing "Fiat" Vice President Umberto Agnelli's justification of threats of mass dismissals. Agnelli granted a controversial interview to a leading Rome daily this week in which he suggested a devaluation of the lira and mass firings in crisis-ridden factories.

Foschi gave the following rundown of a meeting he had in Rome yesterday with Agnelli: "I summoned Umberto Agnelli to my office to hear his assessment of the situation. The Fiat vice president briefed me on the international automobile industry crisis and the troubles his company is having, which would justify its recourse to dismissals.

"My reply to him was that such measures would not be justified. There are other measures to take to cope with the auto crisis, like the ones that will be included in a plan for the sector that the government is currently firming up. It shall look into all possible paths to prevent recourse to dismissals. It should be said, however, that the government should be free of psychological pressures while making its decisions".

Asked by a reporter to elaborate on the latter point, Foschi said that Agnelli's interview was "a bid to influence the government's decisions". Yesterday's meeting with Agnelli, Foschi disclosed, marked the start of a "confrontation" between the labor minister and Fiat, whose stands, he added, are "completely opposite".

Agnelli also paid a call yesterday on Budget Minister Giorgio La Malfa to display his views about the auto crisis and his company's fears of a decline in demand. La Malfa confirmed the government's "absolute determination" to protect the lira's exchange rate and assured Agnelli that the government was about to enact a series of measures to check inflation and boost the competitiveness of Italian exports.

PCI Opposition

LD272052 Rome Domestic Service in Italian 1700 GMT 27 Jun 80

[Excerpts] As has already been announced, the Council of Ministers will decide on Wednesday afternoon on the measures [words indistinct] economic crisis. This topic was discussed today at a meeting of the Christian Democratic Party and it was also dealt with by the various parties and their political spokesmen. Here is Angelo Haver, who also refers to the conclusions of the Communist Central Committee:

The situation of economic crisis which the government is preparing to deal with is now being examined by the parties, especially on the already announced trade union reactions. This morning there was a Christian Democrat meeting at Piazza del Gesu, with the participation of top party spokesmen.

The conclusive document of the Communist Central Committee also refers to the economic situation. The text of the document was published this afternoon, along with the text of the speech made by Berlinguer. The Communist Party, the document affirms, will lead the fight of opposition in order to counteract and combat all attempts to strike at the interests and basic gains of the workers, such as the cost of living index. The communists reaffirmed their critical view of the present government and its policy and confirmed their pledge to bring to life wherever possible regional, communal and provincial administrations based on agreement between communists, socialists and other left-wing and democratic forces.

In his speech to the Communist Party Central Committee, Enrico Berlinguer emphasized the pledge of opposition of his party to the government and the political doctrine it expresses. According to the secretary of the Italian Communist Party, there will be no turning back as regards the strategic line on an agreement which (?stems) from the historic forces belonging to the workers movement. Berlinguer said that there would be no retreat, even before the misery of Christian Democracy of the preamble [as heard], which in his opinion had received a harsh blow at the 8 June poll. Regarding the Socialists, Berlinguer said that attempts would be made to search for and pursue unity, but not the necessary [word indistinct], that is to say, taking into account that the present Directorate of the Socialist Party maintains, with Christian democracy of the preamble [as heard] a relationship and moves in a framework which objectively leads to division of the working masses.

FRONT LINE GUERILLAS STOP TRAIN, HAND OUT LEAFLETS

AU261548 Rome ANSA in English 1523 GMT 26 Jun 80

[Text] Turin, June 26 (ANSA)--A seven-strong commando unit from Front Line, Italy's second most effective urban guerrilla organization after the Red Brigades, stopped a commuters' train near here today and handed out leaflets voicing support for the armed struggle.

The train was the 5:50 from Susa to this auto capital. The six men and a woman stopped the train at 0640 local (0440 GMT). The urban guerillas got away aboard a waiting car after disarming and tying up a guard.

The leaflet opened with a reference to the "hundreds of comrades arrested...thousands of sackings, people thrown out of their homes, mass layoffs". It also referred to the slaying of four Red Brigades members when anti-terrorist police under General Alberto Dalla Chiesa broke into an urban guerilla hideout in Genoa.

"The struggle against the bourgeois state is not a fact that regards the combatants alone, but also the whole practice of struggle produced by the proletariat over the years", the leaflet said. "No-one is authorized to speak of surrender when the anger and determination of the proletarian struggle are increasing". The leaflet which the commando forced some travelers to read under the threat of arms, concluded with a series of slogans, one of them pointing out that "factory and jail are two sides of the same coin".

The participants in the raid did not bother to hide their features and police are now trying to reconstruct their (?identity), apparently without much success.

SOARES CARNEIRO ANNOUNCES BID FOR PRESIDENCY

LD261509 Lisbon DIARIO DE NOTICIAS in Portuguese 19 Jun 80 pp 3, 11

[Unattributed report: "It Is Desirable for a Revision of Constitution To Represent Genuine National Agreement"]

[Excerpts] "Since it should correspond to the broadest possible majority, it will be desirable for the revision of the Constitution to represent a genuine national agreement, in which all the democratic parties in the country will take part," Gen Soares Carneiro said yesterday during the press conference at which he presented his formal candidacy for the presidency of the republic. And, enlarging on the idea which he had just mentioned, he added: "Otherwise, exceptional recourse to a referendum could be the only way to make it possible to break occurring deadlocks, and thus involving popular sovereignty in an act of genuine democratic legitimacy."

Soares Carneiro began by stating: "In light of an inexorable history, Portugal and the Portuguese people are experiencing, with a concern not devoid of anxiety, the desire for change."

"It is the future--which will undoubtedly be a difficult future--which constitutes our collective problem and the challenge which, by running, I have accepted."

"This candidacy is prompted by no desire to deepen or make irreversible regional, social or party rifts.

"The only rift which will concern me and which will be rigorously examined lies in the gap which exists between democratic and antidemocratic behavior.

"This is because it is believed that the establishment of political democracy--the basic and ultimately victorious intention of the 25 April revolution--is a definitive affirmation of collective maturity and constitutes the basis of our public law."

And Soares Carneiro continued: "However, the realization of democracy has not always been clear, nor has it ceased to oscillate with respect to basic options in the course of the revolutionary process and down to the present, specifically with respect to foreign policy, the economic and political system, membership in the European community and the Atlantic Alliance, and even in the field of citizens' basic rights and guarantees."

"My candidacy is aimed at asserting itself with a constant intention of clarification and a firm option, without compromises or ambiguities, on all the basic issues of collective life. And it is aimed at placing itself at the service of all of the people whom we constitute: in Portugal, among the emigrants, in Macao and in Timor.

"The presidential elections cannot be reduced to the oversimplification of seeking to confirm or invalidate in them the results of the legislative elections, which are indeed based on party differences."

And he later stated: "The greatest possible national consensus is not to be confused with an aim to achieve unanimity, but it concerns, in the opinion of most Portuguese people, irrespective of their political convictions, some basic rules of coexistence: the dignity of the human individual, the everlasting nature of the fatherland, the democratic nature of the system and the need for social reforms, progress and economic development."

"The country should know without room for doubt what each candidate advocates and what he firmly and clearly condemns.

"Representing the nation does not mean seeking to reconcile the irreconcilable or supporting mutually exclusive options, or even speaking in one way in order to be better able to do the opposite."

Referring in particular to the Portuguese Communist Party [PCP], Soares Carneiro then asserted: "In a Western-type democracy, there is freedom to be a communist. We will live with this and bestow on noone the privilege of clandestinity. But the PCP, whose outlook is antidemocratic, and which has acquired in the state structure and in society itself an influence out of proportion to its electoral significance, poses a particular problem."

"Any citizen who, in adopting this--or any other--political option, acts as if democracy and the fatherland were only precarious and dispensable creations, will know that he will have to face a severe and constant democratic struggle which can only end with his political defeat.

"The existence in Portugal of a communist party clearly subordinate to other countries is a responsibility which rests with few people and of which many people belonging to it or supporting it are not even aware.

"As president of the republic, I will be absolutely firm: I will not agree to entering with it into explicit or tacit pacts or compromises such as those which over the last few years have enabled it to abuse freedoms, destabilize democracy or weaken our foreign policy, whether by preventing Portugal's socioeconomic adjustment to Europe or by subtly calling into question the country's membership of the Atlantic Alliance."

Referring next to the autonomous regions, the presidential candidate stated: "National unity and solidarity entail the acceleration of the development of the Azores and Madeira--regions in whose case the country's unity is the only limit to the full autonomy at which they are aiming."

"Within the framework of the fundamental solidarity which the nation does and must constitute, there are economic, political and social conflicts in Portuguese society which, since they are real, we should not conceal or suppress and, far less, imperatively seek to reconcile. On the contrary, it will be useful and beneficial for them to manifest themselves freely, since if they take place in accordance with the law and in a spirit of general responsibility for the country's destiny and prosperity, they will be a creative, powerful and irreplaceable force."

Gen Soares Carneiro continued: "Our European option requires that integration proceed methodically and firmly."

"But it will not merely be a matter for the Portuguese people of adjusting to European prerequisites, since we already have our own prerequisites. In the first place, the defense and protection of our territory, our citizens and our culture--none of which we agree to surrender. Second, national independence, which will not be exchanged for any material advantage. And last, our independence in decisionmaking and freedom to choose among the forms of political and social organization, to which only the sovereign people's freedoms and wishes will be accepted as a limit.

"In an international situation moving from crisis to crisis toward as yet unknown horizons, Europe itself, the community and each country comprising it are experiencing grave difficulties and are also changing.

"Ability to innovate and the strengthening of economic and defense potential could be a consequence of these transformations under way. Portugal will not join a static and immobilist Europe but a Europe whose history and deep-rooted traditions will enable it to be one of the richest sources of change and progress and to have its own influence on the major world problems."

"We need no restoration: Portugal is Portugal, and we are independent," he stated, and added: "We do need building and modernization--the building of a democratic state, creation of wealth, development of citizenship and the strengthening of society--in order to complete its process of liberation from the state. With the modernization of techniques and administration we will improve the Portuguese people's quality of life and well-being and educational and working conditions. There is much to be reformed, corrected and renovated.

"As far as the state is concerned, some noble and essential functions will rest with it: to strengthen national dignity, consolidate democracy, direct development and, above all, to protect the weak part of the social contract--the workers, the uneducated, those lacking bargaining power--specifically the retired and those seeking their first jobs--the underdeveloped regions and the backward economic sectors, such as agriculture.

"As far as citizens enterprise is concerned, it will be important to encourage all that is creative and modern in this and thus to revive the private sector--an essential basis for the country's development and an instrument for its rebuilding.

"Moreover, the modern and democratic state is incompatible with centralism and gigantism, with stifling bureaucracy and with this mutual distrust which has grown up between citizens and the authorities.

"The borders of democracy cannot be defined arbitrarily at the whim of temporary arrangements, because they do not allow freedoms to be despised or our collective life to be subordinated to foreign interests."

"Consistent with this, the political remedying of the errors and distortions of decolonization demands that none of its wounds be reopened. It will consist mainly of a fertile reorganization of relations between Portugal and the Portuguese-speaking countries. Of fundamental importance for preserving a distinct individuality within Europe and for strengthening our national independence, these relations demand from us much more than we have managed to give but must also give us rather more than we have received," he said, adding:

"Eliminating the opposite temptations of resentment and subservience, as well as feelings of superiority or guilt, they must be characterized by real reciprocity. Our amenability is complete and we hope for the same from peoples with whom we have spent a large part of our history.

"A constructive democratic stability is needed to resolve the problems inherent to our present life, all of which reflect ambiguity, anxiety and difficulty in realizing objectives.

"The pursuit of this real national objective demands that as far as the state bodies are concerned it constitutes the joint concern of the presidency of the republic, the government and the parliament majority which supports it in the Assembly of the Republic. This implies a normal institutional relationship among these state bodies and a political view of the objective to be achieved free from lasting conflicts or fundamental differences.

"It also demands that an attempt be made to prevent the threat of organized violence from exerting a direct or indirect effect on the citizens.

"In this connection I emphasize the need to prevent any political group from trying to instill its own reflection and image within the armed forces.

"Only if they are free from such threats or interferences can the Portuguese people feel safe in shouldering their most basic civic responsibilities and participating fully in collective life."

"The Constitution must be the instrument whereby the people govern themselves and decide their own destiny. Therefore, it must be a rule of life and never a rule of death. It neither embodies a particular point in time nor summarizes an ideology, but rather determines the future.

"Since it should correspond to the broadest possible majority, it will be desirable for the revision of the Constitution to represent a genuine national agreement, in which all the democratic parties in the country will take part. Otherwise, exceptional recourse to a referendum could be the only way to make it possible to break situations of deadlock, by involving popular sovereignty in an act of genuine democratic legitimacy."

"The challenge therefore lies in the Portuguese people asserting their hope in a progress which is only possible with them and which is impossible without them; and in the bodies to which the people entrust the exercise of their sovereignty exercising it with humility in their work, harmony in their objectives, dignity in their procedures and efficiency in their results.

"This is the significance of my candidacy for a post whose legitimacy only the Portuguese people can confer on me and which only the Portuguese people can refuse me."

Next Gen Soares Carneiro answered innumerable questions put to him by representatives of the media, both Portuguese and foreign, who were present. Many topics were discussed and in short it can be said that the presidential candidate did not evade any of the questions put to him. Nevertheless, sometimes he did diplomatically skirt round the difficult aspects of some questions.

The current president of the republic was also the subject of several questions put to Soares Carneiro. He said in this connection that in his opinion Ramalho Eanes should not run for reelection, adding that "this is the reason for my own candidacy." However, that was not all. Asked whether if elected he would keep Gen Eanes as chief of general staff of the armed forces he said: "I do not believe that would be either in General Ramalho Eanes' interests or in my own interests."

In the opinion of the Democratic Alliance's candidate, the Revolutionary Council "has a limited future," an opinion which, he said, seems to be held by almost all the Portuguese political forces. In any case, Soares Carneiro added, it is general knowledge that some Revolutionary Council members, specifically those covered by paragraph "E" [presumably of the Constitution] have already stated their lack of confidence in him. "If I am elected while the Revolutionary Council still stands," he said, "I believe that those members would not want me as chairman of the Revolutionary Council."

Expanding on his opinion of what being president of the republic means--"essentially a civilian post"--he added that if elected he would not accept the post of armed forces chief of general staff. The president of the republic, he said, must be "a spokesman for the people's suffering," adding that "the country's worst suffering is that which it suffers in [line apparently dropped in original] trade union or party demands."

Gen Soares Carneiro also discussed international topics, such as the possible stationing of a U.S. aircraft carrier on the Tagus River--"Portugal must accept the risks of NATO membership," he said--and detente. Furthermore, he added, the imminent Madrid conference, cited in one journalist's question, should be regarded as a continuation of the Helsinki conference, whose conclusions "died so soon." Be that as it may, the free world's action must be reflected on bearing in mind the risks of a possible Finlandization.

SOCIALIST ASSEMBLY DEPUTY QUESTIONS CONDUCT OF U.S. SECRET SERVICE

LD272250 Madrid Domestic Service in Spanish 2000 GMT 27 Jun 80

[Text] Antonio Garcia Miralles, a Spanish Socialist Workers Party deputy, has raised a question in the Legislative Assembly directed at the government on the conduct of the U.S. Secret Service in Madrid during the visit by Jimmy Carter. The U.S. Secret Service detained 2 days ago for a few moments a Spanish citizen who was carrying a sign which read: "Carter, go home and do your jogging there." The sign was torn and taken away from the citizen so that Carter would not see it. The socialist's question contains the following points: Whether it was Spanish or U.S. agents who carried out the action; whether the U.S. Secret Service took the initiative or only obeyed orders from the Spanish; and what explanation does the government give on this prevention of freedom of expression when a Spanish citizen attempted to protest against the Carter visit.

MADRID COMMENTS ON U.S.-SPANISH TALKS, JOINT COMMUNIQUE

LD271512 Madrid in Spanish to Europe 1130 GMT 27 Jun 80

[Unattributed commentary]

[Text] The joint communique issued at the conclusion of President Carter's visit to Madrid states that the United States fully supports the Spanish Government's efforts to join the EEC and views positively the possibility of Spanish entry into the Atlantic Alliance. The two principal subjects of Spanish foreign policy, that is, the EEC and NATO, are actively supported by President Carter, who, without denying the election motives of his European trip, fully confirmed the already deeply rooted bilateral relations and showed a cordial and thoughtful (?understanding) of the new democratic reality.

Apart from bilateral relations, Carter's trip has made up for Spain's absence from certain international forums, specifically the EEC, since the government was informed of the results of the Venice summit and, in general, of the major issues affecting the international community. In this area, Carter and Spanish Prime Minister Adolfo Suarez expressed similar views on Soviet expansionism, and both attached great importance to the successful development of the forthcoming Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe in Madrid. A common desire for peace and detente was expressed throughout their meetings, but at the same time there was clear agreement on the risks facing Western society [words indistinct] in this respect there was agreement on the need to bring about a total withdrawal of Soviet troops from Afghanistan and the opposition in Washington and in Madrid to the perpetuation of a situation which contradicts the free determination of the Afghan people. This indicates a global outlook which does not just apply to one area of the world but demonstrates an awareness of all the problems directly affecting the very existence and future of the world's peoples.

Carter's stay in Madrid has had positive results and could signal the complete consolidation of a real and sincere alliance which remains compatible with differences of opinion and which respects the wishes of each country.

AFGHAN RESISTANCE LEADER SEEKS WESTERN SUPPORT

LD301149 London THE DAILY TELEGRAPH in English 30 Jun 80 p 6

[Robert Moss article: "Afghan Voice of Resistance"]

[Excerpts] One of the foremost Afghan resistance leaders is now in London, seeking to mobilise more effective Western support for his campaign against his country's Soviet invaders. He is Mr Sayed Ahmad Gailani, the 45-year-old chairman of the National Islamic Front of Afghanistan (NIFA), the largest of the half-dozen organisations that agreed late last year to unite in a loose coalition called the Islamic Alliance for the Liberation of Afghanistan.

NIFA has recruited an impressive number of former Afghan ministers, government officials and diplomats. Western observers who have recently toured the fighting zones in eastern Afghanistan were impressed by the efficieny of NIFA's military committee and its potential for enlisting majority support inside the country.

Significantly, many of the officers and soldiers who have deserted the Afghan Army over the past year have joined up with NIFA. By Mr Gailani's estimate, some 30,000 Afghan troops (compared with an original army strength of only 60,000) have either deserted, surrendered to the resistance, or joined the guerrillas since the fighting began.

"I doubt whether the Afghan Army can be used to exist as an organised force today" he told me. He says that more than 5,000 Afghan troops have joined NIFA.

Last September, an entire brigade of the Afghan 8th Division, formerly based in Rishkour, transferred its allegiance to his movement. NIFA units in the field are commanded by former Afghan Army officers.

A man of quiet, aristocratic bearing, Mr Gailani told me that his movement could put up to 300,000 fighters into the field if the necessary weapons and equipment were made available. So far, he complained, Western governments have been more lavish with promises than with practical support.

The NIFA is desperately in need of anti-aircraft guns, surface-to-air missiles (it currently disposes of only live captured SAM-7s), anti-tank weapons, and ammunition for the 303 Enfield rifles with which most of its guerrilla fighters are armed.

Equally pressing is the need for field communications equipment. At present, contact between its tribally-based units in the field depends solely on runners.

The urgency is great because Mr Gailani foresees a major new Soviet offensive in the aftermath of the Moscow Olympics, in which the Russians may make more extensive use than so far of chemical and biological weapons.

In recent interviews, two Afghan doctors--Dr Omar Isar Nazar (formerly chief medical officer at the central prison in Kabul) and Dr Saifurrahman Maruf--described the condition of victims of Soviet gas attacks in Khugani Province.

"It is a tragedy," Mr Gailani told me, "if there is a will to fight the Russians, but the means are not available."

He is also seeking support to establish a mobile radio transmitter to broadcast to the Afghan people: a "Radio Free Afghanistan."

In the view of some Western observers, an even more effective (and low-cost) option for Western governments in responding to the Soviet invasion would be to support a programme of Russian-language broadcasts aimed at the Red Army divisions deployed in Afghanistan. It is remarkable, in view of the chorus of Western criticism of Soviet aggression that was again rehearsed at the Venice summit meeting, that no serious attempts to encourage Soviet troops to defect have so far been mounted.

A modest beginning has been made through the private initiative of a Russian emigre group; the NTS [expansion unknown] which recently produced Russian-language leaflets for distribution to the Soviet forces in Afghanistan. This is no substitute, however, for a programme of radio transmissions that might induce members of the Soviet invasion force to question their role in Afghanistan and would reassure them that they would receive a warm reception and a refuge in the West if they decided to change sides. The heavy casualties incurred by the Russians in recent fighting must have dampened the enthusiasm of many soldiers for continued operations.

An effective defection programme would also involve persuading the Afghan resistance groups to abandon their "no-prisoners" policy--a response to Soviet brutality--and inducing the Pakistani Government to agree to provide safe transit for Russians en route to the west. The Russians have steadily increased their pressure on President Ziaul Haq's regime to limit its support for the Afghan rebels, who rely on Pakistans as their base. The sophisticated and highly sociable KGB station chief in Islamabad, V.I. Gusgenev, has been notably active in seeking to persuade key Pakistani officials that an accommodation with Moscow is possible.

Mr Gailani warns that "the Pakistanis cannot afford to forget that is Afghanistan becomes a Soviet satellite, their country will be next."

DEFENSE SECRETARY REBUTS SOVIET MISSILE CHARGE

LD301147 London SUNDAY TELEGRAPH in English 29 Jun 80 p 1

[Political correspondent's report: "Britain Rebuts Missile Charge"]

[Text] Britain and Russia clashed yesterday over the basing of cruise missiles in this country and mainland Europe. Mr Pym, defence secretary, accused Russia of "blustering" and dishonest propaganda after the Kremlin accused Britain of worsening the arms race.

The Soviet outburst against Britain in the military newspaper RED STAR will be seen as part of a drive to persuade Herr Schmidt, the West German chancellor, to drop his commitment to the NATO missile plan. He begins a two-day visit to Moscow tomorrow but has promised President Carter that he will stand by NATO policy.

In an exchange that will mark a further worsening of relations between the two countries, Mr Pym issued a statement sharply rebutting Soviet propaganda claims that the American-owned cruise missiles to be based at Greenham Common, Berks, and Molesworth, Cambs, would make Britain a primary target. "Our political, geographical and industrial importance would inevitably make us a target." Mr Pym retorted, "and basing cruise missiles here does not change that."

The Russians would be more helpful if they made a serious response to the Western offer to negotiate on limiting theatre nuclear forces instead of refusing to talk unless we abandon our own programme.

"Such blustering is all the more dishonest against the background of the accelerating deployments of Soviet SS-20 missiles at a rate of over one a week, while the cruise missile deployment will not be taking place for another three years."

PRESIDENT KIPRIANOU RETURNS FROM TALKS IN ATHENS

Arrival Statement

NC271637 Nicosia Domestic Service in Greek 1400 GMT 27 Jun 80

[Statement by President Kiprianou at Larnaca Airport on his return from Athens on 27 June--recorded]

[Text] I sincerely believe that the talks which I have had in the Greek capital have been very useful in all respects. I had a private meeting with Mr Karamanlis, president of the Republic of Greece, in a most friendly and cordial atmosphere. We had a conference with Greek Prime Minister Rallis, the foreign minister, and their associates. We reviewed the latest Cyprus developments and views and information were exchanged. In general, I can say that both from the point of view of review and of information, the positions are identical [with regard to the Cyprus problem].

Further, both during the conference and the private meeting with Greek Prime Minister Rallis--these talks were also held in a very friendly atmosphere--we discussed the future handling of the national issue. We exchanged views, we arrived at a number of conclusions, and we drew the conclusion that the Cyprus Government rightly favors the inter-Cypriot dialogue provided that resumption of the talks will not be accompanied by preconditions or the imposition of terms. Besides, the fact that the Turkish side is so eagerly asking for this must definitely mean something, to say the least.

Thus, we agreed that the correct procedure is the inter-Cypriot dialogue based on the 19 May 1979 agreement which--as is well known--includes among other things the Makarios-Denktas agreement, the UN resolutions, demilitarization, the question of fundamental freedoms and human rights of citizens [of the Republic of Cyprus], the question of Famagusta as a question of priority and various other constructive elements. Therefore, we are ready for a dialogue based on this agreement, without preconditions or terms. The Greek Government fully agrees with this, while Prime Minister Rallis has also stated so publicly.

We also disucssed various other things pertaining to the handling of the question. As has been stated, it would not be advisable to announce them--at least at present--because they are matters of handling. It must be appreciated that many times such matters should not be disclosed, not because the people should not be informed about them, but because if disclosed the rival side would also learn about them.

To summarize, I wish to stress that I am totally pleased with my visit to Athens. There is interest, lively interest, in Cyprus. I have reasons to believe that Greece's role will become more effective in the course of time. There is support from all sides and in various forms. In general, the Cypriot people rightly consider Greece to be the basic mainstay of their struggle for survival and vindication. Just as we are, Greece--the government and the political parties--is also concerned about the preservation of the existence of Cyprus as a state, as it is internationally recognized, and about the termination of all undermining activities. Just as we are, the Greek Government and the Greek political parties are also concerned about the existence at all times of harmonious cooperation between Athens and Nicosia--a thing which we will safeguard and strengthen to the greatest possible extent, and this also applies to the unity of the Cypriot people because both of them [harmonious cooperation between Athens and Nicosia and the unity of Cypriot poeple] are indispensable, they are indispensable prerequisites, if you like it so, for the successful outcome of our struggle.

Regarding the unity of the Cypriot people, I repeat that for my part I will do everything humanly possible to achieve it. I appeal to everyone to consider the current, crucial efforts being made for the country, to abandon issues of secondary importance and to restrict themselves to the need for unity in order to promote our national cause and to claim justice.

I know that various things have been said during my absence--things which have been misleading and slanderous--in connection with my character. But I am not going to answer anything. My answer is a call to everyone to consider the crucial circumstances and to rally together in order to achieve what we must achieve, and which we owe to our people and our country. I repeat, for my part I will do everything possible. Undermining the existence of the state serves nothing. Only the Turkish side would benefit from this. Undermining the president of the republic serves nothing, only those who want to promote other things would benefit from this; and this is irrespective of who the president of the republic is because the question is not personal at all. I repeat that I am solely devoted to the national cause of Cyprus. I will carry on the struggle until we find a fair Cyprus solution that will do justice to the Cypriot people and will secure their survival and their rights.

In Athens I had the opportunity to meet--apart from the government--all the political leaders of the country. I had a long meeting with Mr Papandreou, leader of the main opposition party [PASOK]. I also met the leaders of all the other political parties and I bring unanimity over the handling of the national issue: I bring unanimity in connection with support; I bring the unanimity of all the political quarters--the government and the political parties--in connection with the need for unity of the Cypriot people in their struggle for freedom.

I believe that my visit to and talks in Athens have not only been useful but they have also further strengthened cooperation between the governments of Greece and Cyprus--cooperation which is one of the necessary prerequisites for the successful outcome of our struggle.

I return to Cyprus fully satisfied and I bring the Greek people's message of support and backing to the struggle for freedom.

KHARAVYI on Greeks' Role

NC291000 Nicosia KHARAVYI in Greek 29 Jun 80 p 1

[Editorial: "Greater Responsibility"]

[Text] The president of the republic returned from Athens fully satisfied. Not knowing the goals of Mr Kiprianou's visit it is impossible to judge whether or not he has succeeded and thus understand why he is satisfied. However, it appears that one of the goals, perhaps the main one, was to secure in Greece--if only verbally--what is denied him in Cyprus: the trust and support of the politicians. Being aware of most of the statements made at the talks with Mr Kiprianou, we understand why he is satisfied. Flattering words were said about him, appeals to the Cypriot people to rally around him were made and accusations against those that criticize him were cast. The zenith of these statements was Mr Zigdhis', namely: Kiprianou is Cyprus. This exaggerated courtesy must obviously have fortified Mr Kiprianou's self-confidence to such a point that he described, on his return, all criticisms against his policy as having the aim of undermining the president of the republic and serving the anti-Cyprus circles. We believe that Mr Kiprianou had much more important things to discuss and much more important goals to achieve in Athens. First of all, the clarification of the positions of the Greek political parties' representatives on the essence of the Cyprus issue; on the line and tactics to resolve our problem, which cannot be any other than Makarios' lines. [paragraph continues]

The president had the duty to secure in Athens the clear support of the inter-Cyprus talks based on the Makarios-Denktas and Kiprianou-Denktas agreements and not to secure nice words for himself. The Cypriot people demand deeds and strict adherence to the correct line. If Mr Kiprianou bases his full satisfaction on these words, then his satisfaction is unjustified and so is his visit to Athens if it was made for this reason.

We expected greater responsibility from the Greek politicians. How can it be that almost all agree with Mr Kiprianou, but disagree among themselves, on what line to follow in the Cyprus issue? How can Mr Papandreou declare positions which are in complete opposition to those of the Greek Government and at the same time fully agree with the Cypriot president? Most of the political leaders spoke about the need for unity among the Cypriot people. However, they did not say on what basis this unity should be. Namely, they did not touch upon the core of the disunity, namely: the government's deviation from the Makarios line. These political leaders--who, from Athens, inconsiderately and frivolously criticize those who dissociate themselves from the government for exactly this deviation--encourage the complete derailment from the correct line and exacerbate the division within the domestic front. We expect exactly the opposite from them--to clearly and categorically support the Makarios line and using their influence over the Cypriot president so that he will remain faithful to it. Only in this way can they contribute to the unity of the Cypriot people in whom they are so interested. If they have nothing to say on this important issue, their silence would have been preferable to their nebulous statements.

I SIMERINI Criticism of Kiprianou

NC291400 Nicosia I SIMERINI in Greek 29 Jun 80 p 1

[Editorial: "Who Undermines Whom...!"]

[Excerpts] We must praise the president's decision to stop the pompous ceremonies when he comes and goes. We have proved many times to the president that the ceremonious departures and returns were not serious things. Although late, he grasped it and took the decision to at least cut down on manifestations that only lower his prestige...

We will touch on two points in the presidential statements: unity and rallying around, and undermining the president and the state. Mr Kiprianou gives the impression that he lives in another country. Perhaps his frequent trips away from Cyprus have influenced him. Perhaps the luncheons, handshakes, receptions, contacts and formalities have removed him from reality and have taken him away from his country. What unity does Mr Kiprianou talk about? Who is going to unite with whom and on what issues? What rallying around does he hint at? Who is going to rally around? Around whom and for what reasons?

Definitely, Mr Kiprianou has not enough political portrayals on what is happening in this country. Otherwise he would not be talking the way he does in June 1980. Unity and rallying around him are as unlikely as the sun rising in the West tomorrow! Has he not realized yet that it is too late? A possibility may have existed in the past. Then the president, instead of creating unity with deeds, wasted efforts in tracking AKEL's intentions and wishes!... Instead of taking initiatives, as he should, he let himself swing inside the petty political expendiecies. At present unity does not exist and the popular front as the leader and political product is responsible for this!

Kiprianou calls AKEL for unity. Obviously, it is possible for this party to rally again... the party has shown so many inconsistencies, frivolities and ouside expediencies that anything can be expected from it. [paragraph continues]

But AKEL describes him as "impotent and inefficient." It tells him that "he has dug his own grave." How can it unite with him? How can it rally around him? And how can AKEL and EDEK rally around the president after all the utterances against each other. And how can "muddy" Kliridhis, the "underbidder," unite and rally around with the "patriots" and "democrats" of the popular front?

The president is out of the picture. Although he knows that today he is leading a hopeless insignificant minority, he speaks from the pulpit of authority with a strongly provocative paternal air. Although he knows that AKEL and EDEK are at loggerheads and abuse each other, he still speaks about political unity. Although daily he hears Kliridhis calling on him to resign, he speaks of rallying around him! How can one describe this presidential behavior?

It appears that Mr Kiprianou has not received the messages of the times. It appears that he has not realized that unity has been shattered by the moronic ambitions and the petty policy of the popular front's leadership. It appears that he has not yet realized that the state's existence and the president's prestige have been harmed by the presidential handlings, decisions and his undecisiveness.

Of what stature does the president speak when for over a year now he has been unable to change a minister? Of what presidential stature does he speak when he cannot achieve a government reshuffle? By his timidity and his fears he has destroyed his prestige. He can blame no one else. His ties with the popular front associates have totally damaged his own and the state's prestige. His latest statements on unity show once again that the president lives in another world. He does not see things as they are. He cannot find solutions. Unfortunately, the near future will be even more disheartening both for himself and the country.

I DHIMOKRATIKI LAUDS GREEK-TURKISH RAPPROCHEMENT

NC300837 Nicosia I DHIMOKRATIKI in Greek 30 June 80 p 2

[From the "Democratic Comments" column: "Greek-Turkish Affairs"]

[Text] It is definite that Greece and Turkey cannot resolve the Cyprus problem; this is not a dispute between Greece and Turkey. The Cyprus problem must be solved by the two communities of Cyprus. This is unquestionable and is precisely what Mr Mitsotakis has said.

However, it is also unquestionable that if differences between Greece and Turkey are resolved--then a Cyprus solution would definitely become easier or at least a better climate and more favorable conditions for a settlement would be created.

Therefore, every effort for a proper rapprochement of Greece and Turkey would contribute more positively to developments in Cyprus. However, with the words proper rapprochement we imply cooperation between the two people, who are not and must not be enemies. Enmity is being promoted and developed by circles outside the interests of the Greek and Turkish peoples.

Regardless of the fact that NATO is now becoming active, for the sake of its own goals and plans, in achieving "allied solutions," the truth is that every step toward a settlement, through peaceful means, of any disputes or problems reflects positively on the Cyprus problem as well--indirectly but really.

In this light, and beyond the NATOite intervention, it is gratifying that a dialogue has begun between the governments of Greece and Turkey; and in view of the fact that Greece has been emphatically stressing its well-known stand toward Cyprus, unorthodox interferences are ruled out.

KIPRIANOU REITERATES DECISION TO REMAIN AS PARTY CHAIRMAN

NC291213 Nicosia Domestic Service in Greek 1030 GMT 29 Jun 80

[Text] A pan-Cypriot conference of Democratic Front cadres was held today in Nicosia. Speaking at the congress, Mr Kiprianou, the chairman of the party and president of the republic, has declared that he neither intends to resign nor to abandon his struggle. He stressed: For me, resignation would mean desertion.

Mr Kiprianou stressed that he would continue to lead the country with consistency, determination and daring until the people themselves decided otherwise in the next elections. He then called on all parties and factions to abandon their differences and turn their attention toward the national cause.

Mr Kiprianou said: I am ready for a dialogue with party leaders that would bring full unity to this country and that would mean the safeguarding of our national cause and not the betrayal of our people's rights.

Referring to the Cyprus problem, President Kiprianou said: We are seeking the implementation of UN resolutions. He added that the internationalization [of the Cyprus issue] would be continued until the prerequisites were created to put pressure on Turkey.

President Kiprianou said that the government was seeking an honorable dialogue without advance commitments for a biregional solution. What we do not accept, he stressed, is partition, the creation of two countries or the betrayal of the people's rights. No solution is conceivable without the withdrawal of Turkish troops and immigrants and without safeguarding the right of the refugees to return to their homes.

President Kiprianou also criticized the Turkish Cypriot side for not implementing its promises on the missing persons issue. He also said: We do not consider the Turkish Cypriots to be our rivals. He added that the government was not responsible for the delay in implementing the measures that it had declared for the Turkish Cypriots. Once these measures are implemented, he said, the government will announce other measures as long as they do not strengthen the occupation and partitionist solution. He said that the cooperative movement would be strengthened and safeguarded. Referring to the purge, he said that the issue of treachery and crimes against Cyprus had not been closed; at the appropriate time, the file would be opened to ascertain those who were responsible from the beginning.

RALLIS CONCLUDES MEETINGS WITH LEADERS, RETURNS TO CYPRUS

Conclusion of Kiprianou Talks

AT261525 Athens Domestic Service in Greek 1500 GMT 26 Jun 80

[Text] President of the Republic of Cyprus Kiprianou has concluded his talks with the government in Athens. This evening he will have a meeting with EDA [United Democratic Left] Chairman Iliou and tomorrow morning he will have a talk with PASOK Chairman Papandreou. After the conclusion of his talks with Kiprianou, Prime Minister Rallis stated the following:

The recent effort of the UN secretary general for the resumption of the intercommunal dialogue has not produced results despite the constructive position of the Cyprus Government which responded positively to Dr Waldheim's proposals. In the light of this latest development and within the long established framework of our regular contact and cooperation with the Cyprus Government we met with President of the Republic of Cyprus Kiprianou. During our talks we exchanged views and assessments on the developments and prospects of the Cyprus problem and agreed on the next steps. Specifically we agreed that the dialogue should be free and not dependent on prior commitments of one of the participants to the benefit of the other because in such a case there would be no dialogue but submission to conditions. Also on this occasion we assured President Kiprianou that Greece's support for Cyprus Hellenism is undivided and firm.

Meeting With KKE'S [Exterior] Florakis

AT271250 Athens RIZOSPASTIS in Greek 27 Jun 80 pp 1,5

[Excerpt] President of the Republic of Cyprus Spiros Kiprianou, who has completed a 4-day official visit to Athens, is due to leave for Nicosia today. Within the framework of contacts he had with political leaders here Kiprianou met Kharilaos Florakis, secretary general of the KKE [Exterior] Central Committee on Wednesday afternoon.

After the meeting, which lasted for more than a half hour, Comrade Florakis made the following statement to representatives of the press and the Cyprus television service which filmed the meeting:

"The president was good enough to brief me on the present situation in Cyprus. He also briefed me on certain efforts which are being made for a just solution of the Cyprus problem. On my part I assured the president that the KKE [Exterior] will support every effort by the government and the people of Cyprus for a just solution of the Cyprus problem, for an independent, nonaligned and demilitarized Cyprus."

Referring to his meeting with Comrade Florakis, Cyprus President Kiprianou made the following statement:

"We have had an extremely useful conversation with Florakis. I had the opportunity to brief him on the developments of the Cyprus issue. We exchanged views and, as Florakis stated, his position is in support for all our efforts for a just solution to the Cyprus problem."

Final Meetings, Departure

AT271155 Athens Domestic Service in Greek 1130 GMT 27 Jun 80

[Text] Cyprus President Kiprianou today concluded his talks in Athens and departed for Nicosia by air at 1130. In a statement at Ellinikon Airport on his visit to Athens and the talks he had, Kiprianou said:

I wish to express my full satisfaction for the talks I have had with Karamanlis, president of the Republic of Greece, and with Prime Minister Rallis. We conducted a broad review of the Cyprus issue and exchanged views on additional aspects of the issue. There was a complete concord of views. I wish to reiterate that Greek assistance to Cyprus is valuable. The support expressed both by the Greek Government as well as by political leaders and the Greek people to the struggle of the people of Cyprus for their natural continuity and survival are also well known.

Kiprianou added that he also briefed the leader of the majority opposition as well as the leaders of other political parties. He established that their support and assistance to Cyprus are generally unanimous.

The president of Cyprus was visited this morning at the Grande Bretagne Hotel by majority opposition leader and PASOK Chairman Andreas Papandreou, who had a long talk with him on the Cyprus issue and its developments. Speaking to the press after the meeting, Papandreou made the following statement:

I am particularly glad because I have had the opportunity to meet Cyprus President Kiprianou with whom we exchanged views on whatever affects recent developments in the Cyprus issue and on current prospects. We once again established a complete concord of views on offering a long militant course which will guarantee the unity of Cyprus, its demilitarization, and its nonaligned policy, a unified, free, independent and democratic Cyprus. We stressed to Kiprianou, Papandreou concluded, that we here will offer whatever we can to the struggle and we particularly stressed the importance of unity so that we will truly be able to act decisively and effectively.

At Ellinikon Airport the President of Cyprus was seen off by Ambassador Moliviatis, secretary general to the presidency who represented President Karamanlis; Deputy Foreign Minister Rendis; Cyprus Ambassador to Athens Hatzimiltis accompanied by senior embassy personnal and by other officials.

I AVYI Editorial

[From the "I Avyi" column: "Important Talks"]

[Text] The talks which Cyprus President Kiprianou had in Athens both with President of the Republic Karamanlis, Prime Minister Rallis and with the leaders of political parties, confirm the basic concord of views between the Cyprus Government and the political world of Greece. One point which was completely cleared up during these talks is that both the Government of Cyprus as well as the political world of Greece consider resumption of intercommunal talks under UN auspices to be essential. This resumption, however, cannot be undertaken under advance conditions and away from the joint foundations agreed upon to date. Turkish tactics on this point, with insistence to dictate advance conditions before commencement of the talks, are responsible for the failure of all efforts by UN Secretary General Waldheim to date. The concord of views on this point during the talks Kiprianou has had in Athens, has a special political significance because it better explains certain problems which came under discussion between political forces in Cyprus and it strengthens not only mutual understanding between Greece and Cyprus but also the efforts toward tightening the national front of all Cypriot patriots.

GREEK FOREIGN MINISTER MITSOTAKIS MEETS DEMIREL, ERKMEN

Demirel Meeting

TA271737 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1600 GMT 27 Jun 80

[Text] Prime Minister Suleyman Demirel has said that Turkish Government views the solution of the problems between Turkey and Greece through peaceful negotiations as a major policy. Demirel stated this after his meeting with Greek Minister of Foreign Affairs Konstandinos Mitsotakis, who arrived in Ankara to attend the NATO ministerial council spring meetings, at the prime minister's office at 1530 today. Noting that it was wrong to consider each problem between the two countries as a cause of enmity, Demirel added that it was in the interest of both countries to secure peace in the region. Pointing out that Turkey does not create conflicts with neighboring countries, Demirel said: We are loyal to great Ataturk's principle of securing peace, his principle of "peace at home and peace in the world," because this principle is both rational and beneficial to our country and nation.

Noting that efforts to solve the problems between the two countries through peaceful means to be continued, Demirel added that it was necessary to seek solutions to the problems through more frequent negotiations to be held at the political level. Demirel said that a strong Turkey that has solved its economic problems will be in the interests of the free world and Greece, and that the strengthening of Turkey will not harm anyone.

In reply to a question, Demirel said that Turkey was not opposed to Greece's return to the NATO military wing and that this issue was not discussed at the meeting. Demirel concluded by saying that this was an issue which concerned Greece and NATO, and not Greece and Turkey.

Mitsotakis said that his meeting with Demirel was beneficial. Mitsotakis will meet with Foreign Minister Hayrettin Erkmen tomorrow morning.

Foreign Ministers' Joint Statement

TA281728 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1600 GMT 28 Jun 80

[Text] The foreign ministers of Turkey and Greece have agreed to refrain from activities aimed at slandering the other side and to exert every effort to create an atmosphere conducive to solving the problems between the two countries. Foreign Minister Hayrettin Erkmen and Greek Minister of Foreign Affairs Konstandinos Mitsotakis held a meeting in Ankara today to look for an approach to the problems between the two countries. The meeting, which began at the Foreign Ministry at 0900, lasted 3 hours. The Turkish and Greek foreign ministries' secretaries general as well as the officials concerned with the technical problems between the two countries attended part of the meeting.

In a statement to journalists after the meeting, Mitsotakis said that they decided to raise the dialogue between the two countries to a political level. Noting that Turkey and Greece, as friendly and neighboring countries, should solve the problems existing between them and should restore the positive atmosphere prevalent during the period of Ataturk and Venizelos, Mitsotakis said: I believe that we have embarked on a positive path.

Erkmen said that agreement has been reached to solve the problems between the two countries through peaceful negotiations and that it is impossible to think of any other alternative. Erkmen said: Aggression and use of force are not part of our language.

Noting that others should not come between the two countries with the aim of mediating or applying pressure, Erkmen said: We agree that the negotiations should be conducted in a positive atmosphere. This positive atmosphere can be achieved through mutual respect and by avoiding all sorts of activities aimed at negative propaganda. This is a requisite for good will and neighborliness.

A statement has been issued on the meeting between the Turkish and Greek foreign ministers in Ankara this morning. The statement says that the ministers have confirmed that neighborly relations and friendly cooperation between Turkey and Greece are requisites for mutual interests. The statement adds that the two ministers expressed the belief that the problems between the two countries should be solved through meaningful negotiations and that they stressed the necessity for good will and political will throughout the negotiations in order to achieve progress. The two ministers also decided to meet at regular intervals. Noting that the secretaries general of the Turkish and Greek foreign ministries will continue their dialogue within this framework, the last part of the statement says: The two ministers have agreed that the two sides should refrain from activities aimed at slandering the other side and should exert every effort to create an atmosphere conducive to solving the problems between the two countries.

Mitsotakis, who paid his respects at the Ataturk mausoleum after the meeting, left Turkey.

Ministers' Statements to Press

AT281740 Athens Domestic Television Service in Greek 1600 GMT 28 June 80

[Excerpts] The Greek and Turkish foreign ministers recognized that good neighbor relations and friendly cooperation between the two countries are to their mutual interest. Consequently, they believe that problems between the two countries just be solved through basic talks. This was stressed in the joint statement issued at the end of today's talks between the Greek and Turkish foreign ministers, Mitsotakis and Erkmen, held at the Turkish Foreign Ministry in Ankara. Talks were held in two stages: From 0900 to 1030 the two ministers had a private meeting and from 1030 to 1100 they were joined by their aides.

On the Greek side the talks were attended by Secretary General of the Foreign Ministry Theodhoropoulos; Greek Ambassador to Ankara Pappoulias; Director of NATO Affairs at the Foreign Ministry Ambassador Tsamadhos; First Counsellor to the Greek Embassy in Ankara Tsalikis and Director of the Minister's Bureau Stoforopoulos. On the Turkish side the talks were attended by the Secretary General of the Turkish Foreign Ministry [Ozdemir] Yigit; Turkish Ambassador to Athens Tezel and other officials. The two ministers then received representatives of the press to whom they made statements.

Mitsotakis made the following statement:

[Begin Mitsotakis videorecording] We have had the opportunity with my colleague Erkmen, whom I would now like to call a friend, to discuss the issues in two stages: First between us and then with our aides. Our discussion centered on problems between the two countries. We have had a very sincere exchange of views and we have agreed to proceed to search for solutions toward this end. We elevated the dialogue to a political level and we will continue it. We have jointly undertaken the responsibility of direct political dialogue but also of auxiliary and simultaneous dialogue at the technical level. We have both expressed our deepest belief, which is also the belief of our governments, to settle differences between us like good neighbors and friends and that we must return to the Elevtherios Venizelos-Kemal Ataturk spirit.

We have considered that there is great significance in improving the atmosphere between us. This is the first task and then there is the avoidance by both sides of every act which might disturb this atmosphere. Both countries must live in friendship, peace and in alliance because both are members of NATO. Both sides have confirmed their respect of today's frontiers and there is nothing which surrounds this issue. We are certain that existing differences can be solved within this spirit which will be a great step for our two peoples.

I take this opportunity to express my thanks to the Turkish Government and to Erkmen for the hospitality accorded to us. Both I personally and my colleagues felt very comfortable and at ease during the days we stayed here. I have had the opportunity to meet old friends and I hope to make new ones. Personally I also have an obligation toward Turkey. During the dictatorship I escaped through Turkey and the Turkish authorities with the Turkish foreign minister of that time, Caglayanil, offered me every possible assistance. I am glad that now I have the opportunity to acknowledge this obligation. I am certain that we have entered into a good course and I hope that the result will be the one which both countries wish for. [end videorecording]

The Turkish foreign minister spoke after Mitsotakis and said:

[Begin Erkmen videorecording] We have had a fruitful and sincere discussion with my colleague Mitsotakis, whom I am pleased to call a friend. We discussed bipartite issues, as Mitsotakis stated and their examination was within the Ataturk-Venizelos spirit. I personally feel honored because I belong to the Ataturk generation. Mitsotakis, however, also belongs to the generation of Venizelos, with whose family he is related. The talks will be continued. The agreement we have reached is that we should solve issues between us in a peaceful way. This decision is final. There is no chance of us seeking different avenues for solving our differences and when I say other avenues, I mean the use of force. These words do not exist in our dictionary.

I further mean that there is no need for the intervention by third parties, either for mediation or for exerting pressure. Our views coincide in respect of continuation of talks in a positive way. This positive atmosphere will be achieved by avoiding all forms of propaganda by one side against the other. Mutual respect and avoiding mutual accusations are dictated by reasons of good will and neighborliness.

Within this spirit our talks will be continued after they are first prepared at the technical level. The secretaries general of our ministries will confer prior to the United Nations and they will submit their findings to us. Thus when we meet at the UN General Assembly we will have the opportunity to reexamine them. The NATO conference had positive results from many aspects. The primary one was that we met with Mitsotakis, that we became friends and that we discussed things. This friendship will help us solve our problems. [end videorecording]

The two ministers then answered questions from representatives of the press. [Begin videorecording] [Question to Erkmen] When you spoke about avoiding third parties as mediators or for exertion of pressure, were you referring to the United States of America?

[Answer] No, I simply expressed logical general principles. In other words it is preferable that we should discuss things sincerely and openly between us without third parties.

[Question to Erkmen] After assurances about the mutual respect of frontiers, do you continue to have the same views on the question of aid to Turkey and the balance of power in the Aegean?

[Answer] I do not understand what you mean exactly, but in any case all these issues will be raised and examined under a different light.

[Question to Mitsotakis] Do you insist on 10 and not 6 miles, as is the Turkish view, on airspace over territorial waters in the Aegean?

[Answer] There are differences. If there were none then we would have had no reason to sit down and discuss them.

[Question to Mitsotakis] Did you discuss the question of Greece's return to NATO?

[Answer] No, because both countries have agreed this is a question which affects Greece and NATO.

[Question to Erkmen] Will the secretaries general discuss specific issues prior to the UN session?

[Answer] No, they will have a general discussion of bipartite issues. Today we also touched upon certain issues which are totally unrelated to bipartite issues, such as the Cyprus issue, and we expressed the wish that dialogue should be resumed.

[Question to Erkmen] If there is disagreement on a serious issue do you exclude an appeal to an international organization as for example, The Hague [international court]?

[Answer] Certainly not. I do believe however, there will be no need for such an appeal.

[Question to Erkmen] Is today's meeting a preliminary step toward some higher summit conference which will confirm what has been agreed?

[Answer] Provided that the talks we started reach desirable levels then such a summit meeting could be held for the gala announcement of what was agreed upon.

[Question to Erkmen] Would Turkey accept a Greek return to NATO's military wing under the status which existed prior to its withdrawal?

[Answer] Every issue will be discussed within the framework for discussion. [end video recording]

HURRIYET Interviews Mitsotakis

N0270852 Istanbul HURRIYET in Turkish 26 Jun 80 pp 1, 13

[Exclusive interview granted by Greek Foreign Minister Mitsotakis in Ankara to HURRIYET correspondent Gulsun Tokeri date not given]

[Text] Question: New foreign ministers are now in office in Ankara and Athens. Don't you think this situation can lead to a new era in Turkish-Greek relations?

Answer: I cannot say it can this would be unfair to the former foreign ministers. I am fully inspired by good will in the preparations for my first meeting with the Honorable Erkmen in the hope that it will be auspcious for both countries. I do not maintain that we will be able to resolve in one day all the issues that have accumulated over the years, but I hope that we will take a step forward toward establishing a good Turkish-Greek dialogue.

Question: There have been meetings at the prime ministerial level in Montreux and Washington, while the secretaries general have been holding abortive talks for years. To what do doyou attribute these failures? Do you think that a new high level meeting could yield positive results?

Answer: We have certain views that explain the reasons for such failures. I am certain that the Turkish side, too, has its own views. What is important now is not to apportion blame for the past but to cooperate for better days in the future. If we decide during our talks that a meeting of the prime ministers would be useful, then we, as the Greek side, can make the necessary move. However, we must not forget that meetings of this type should be meticulously prepared for.

Question: You have recently stated that the Cyprus issue concerns only the Turkish and Greek Cypriots. In fact, however, this issue has been affecting Turkish-Greek relations for the past 20 years. The Turkish and Greek foreign ministers produced the London and Zurich agreements in 1959-1960. Could similar efforts now take us nearer to a settlement?

Answer: I did not mean that the Cyprus issue concerns only the two communities. Cyprus is everybody's problem; it is the problem of the United Nations as well as of its neighbors...however, it should not be forgotten that Turkey and Greece cannot hold talks or make decisions about Cyprus, which is an independent state. The situation was totally different in 1959, for the Republic of Cyprus had not yet been established. As a matter of fact, Greece is not at all prepared to pressure the government of the Republic of Cyprus accept a settlement it does not approve of.

Question: There is obvious distrust between both countries. What do you think can be done to remove it?

Answer: There is no "magical solution" that would serve to create a new feeling of confidence in both countries. This feeling can be regained only through mutual efforts to understand each other better.

Question: Can a positive result be obtained at the current NATO ministerial council in connection with Greece's return to NATO's military flank?

Answer: This subject is not on the agenda of the NATO meeting in Ankara. This issue has not yet been resolved by the military flanks. Nevertheless, in view of its importance, it will be taken up at bilateral talks and meetings.

Question: Don't you believe that internal political skirmishes in both countries hinder the pursuit of more realistic policies?

Answer: The opposition parties in both countries have a right to express their views on the foreign policy which is being followed by the party in power. Though the views of the opposition sometimes disturbs the political atmosphere, we have to accept them as the ironies of political world. As far as the press is concerned, it is true that on several occasions it exaggerates misunderstandings and chooses to publish sensational news instead of dwelling more on points of compromise. That is why we have for some time been gratified to see efforts by the Turkish and Greek press to establish a dialogue. We hope that these efforts will continue. As the Greek Government, we have respect for the freedom of the press and are determined to support the dialogue between both sides. These efforts will help to create an atmosphere of understanding between both countries and eliminate endless disputes. Despite these difficulties and pressures from the press and politicians, we must not forget that foreign policies are formulated by governments.

[Text] Foreign Minister Hayrettin Erkmen left Istanbul for Brussels by air at 1415 today to attend the Turkish-EEC Association Council meeting to be held there tomorrow. In a statement at Yesilkoy Airport before his departure, Erkmen said that the revival of Turkey's relations with the community will be discussed in accordance with an earlier appeal. Noting that this year's first meeting of the association council was held on 5 February, Erkmen said that Turkey then called for the revival of Turkey's relations with the community, which were frozen at the time. He added that Turkey's decision to join the community was also disclosed at that meeting.

Noting that a new application is out of the question at tomorrow's meeting, Erkmen said that the meeting will constitute the second phase of the activities aimed at reviving the relations between Turkey and the community. Erkmen added that conditions concerning the increase of Turkey's agricultural exports will also be discussed. Noting that negotiations concerning the free movement of Turkish workers employed in Europe and in the community's member countries will be continued. DEMIREL COMMENTS ON NATO MEETING, FRG VISA REQUIREMENT

[Text] Prime Minister Suleyman Demirel has said that the NATO ministerial council meeting which ended in Ankara yesterday showed that Turkey is not alone and that it has a place within a big alliance. He was speaking to reporters after his weekly meeting with Acting President Ihsan Sabri Caglayangil. Pointing out that the last week witnessed intensive foreign policy talks, Demirel said that the foreign minister and himself had held important talks, separately, in connection with the joint defense system and bilateral relations. The prime minister said that the FRG decision to impose a visa requirement on Turkish citizens was not fair. Stressing that Turkey had extremely good relations with that country, Demirel said: I would like to hope that a situation that could damage these good relations does not emerge.

NSP CRITICIZES GOVERNMENT'S STANCE AT NATO MEETING

TA271928 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1600 GMT 27 Jun 80

[Text] National Salvation Party [NSP] deputy leader Sevket Kazan has said that the government did not sufficiently stress the problems of the country and the Middle East at the NATO ministerial council meetings. Kazan said: Unfortunately, the opportunities created by these meetings in Turkey have been lost.

In a written statement in Ankara, Kazan said that the meetings did not bring solutions to imbalances within NATO and that problems outside NATO were not given serious consideration. Noting that the communique issued after the NATO meetings called for the solution of the Turkish-Greek conflicts through peaceful means, Kazan added that, despite this, it was apparent that Turkey was being kept under pressure backstage.

Kazan said: Furthermore, in the article which stated that Turkey's economic efforts would be supported, describing the economic decisions made by the Turkish government concerning the Turkish Nation--decisions whose validity is being debated by the Turkish public--as appropriate was very wrong, because the issue is outside the scope of an international military organization such as NATO and such a move can only upset the balance between the government and the opposition.

DEMIREL CALLS FOR RESTRICTIONS ON PRICE HIKES

TA281106 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1000 GMT 28 Jun 80

WIENER ZEITUNG REPORTS ON 26 JUNE MBFR SESSION

[Unattributed report: "New Figures on Troop Strength Exchanges"]

[Text] At yesterday's plenary session of the Vienna negotiations on a reduction of troops in central Europe the Hungarian chief delegate, Ambassador Zoltan Fodor, declared that with their proposal of December 1979 the NATO member-states departed from their original ideas regarding the removal of nuclear warheads and delivery vehicles from central Europe. Fodor, the only speaker at the session, said that with the so-called "accompanying measures" the West wants to obtain a one-sided advantage for itself. In addition, there is a danger of a new round in the arms race.

In objecting to these arguments a NATO spokesman declared that the Western proposals of December 1979, on the contrary, should be regarded as a compromise because the earlier NATO proposals had not been accepted by the East. Following an Eastern proposal, the two sides have meanwhile exchanged new figures on the state of troop strength as of 1 January 1980. As has been learned, the new figures show increases of armed forces on both sides by an equal percentage. As the Western side has pointed out, there is still an imbalance in favor of the Warsaw Pact by about 150,000 men. The Eastern side claimed that the new figures indicated an essential increase to compare with Western ground and air forces.

The next plenary session of the 19 state delegations will be held next Thursday.

WEST EUROPEAN OLYMPIC COMMITTEES MEET IN PARIS

LD282226 Paris Domestic Service in French 1700 GMT 28 Jun 80

[Text] There was a meeting in Paris this afternoon of the national Olympic committees of West European countries. Twenty days before the opening of the Moscow games, 19 European countries have reached agreement on a joint position regarding the formalities of participation.

Jean-Claude Collard, president of the French Olympic Committee gave an explanation to (Antoine Mercier): [Begin recording]

[Collard] The principle of Rome was confirmed by the national Olympic committees: no use of national flags, no use of national anthems and no participation of atheletes and officials at the opening ceremony.

[Question] How then, will this opening ceremony take place at the games?

[Answer] The delegations will be preceded by signs bearing the name of the national committee of the country concerned and not the indication of the country, and then it will be for most, for nearly all, the Olympic flag and in general with a standard-bearer who will be requested from the organizing committee.

[Question] No delegations--none?

[Answer] No delegations.

[Question] Do you not fear reactions after Moscow, in particular after the Baden-Baden congress meeting?

[Answer] Now listen, we have examined this problem and we have passed a motion of support. The final decision belongs to the IOC, but we have passed a motion of support for the Olympic Committee of Federal Germany and for the maintenance of the Olympic congress in Baden-Baden in 1981. [end recording]

DANISH PREMIER DISCUSSES EC'S EFFORTS TOWARD MIDEAST SETTLEMENT

LD010931 Paris AN-NAHAR AL-'ARABI WA AD-DUWALI in Arabic 23-29 Jun 80 p 7

[Interview given to AN-NAHAR AL-'ARABI WA AD-DUWALI by Danish Prime Minister Anker Jorgensen in Venice--date not given]

[Excerpts] [Question] How will the principles contained in the European Council's statement be implemented in practice?

[Answer] There are no immediate practical steps to be taken during this present phase. What we will do is to try to step up contacts and exploratory efforts during the next phase.

[Question] What will be the task of the exploratory mission which is to visit the states in the area?

[Answer] What I can tell you is the prevailing view that the next council chairman (Luxembourg), which takes office on 1 July, will define the mission's task which includes visits, contacts and exploratory talks.

[Question] Does Denmark favor a new Security Council resolution to complement Resolution 242?

[Answer] No. Not in that form, and not so quickly.

[Question] Then what practical form does Denmark envisage for the implementation of the declaration of principles?

[Answer] The mere initiative of making a clear declaration of these principles is, in itself, a practical step. The adoption by the nine European states of a clear and defined stand against Israel's settlements policy constitutes a step in this direction and an important phase.

[Question] If Israel continues with its policy of settlements and terrorism against the inhabitants of the occupied territories, especially in the West Bank, what will be the attitude of Denmark in particular and the European Community in general?

[Answer] So far, there is no decision regarding this. But the previous step which the nine European states took at the United Nations on this subject can be repeated. Beside these contacts and steps, Denmakr is not considering others for the time being.

[Question] In Denmark's view, what is the best way to achieve a just and comprehensive settlement in the Middle East?

[Answer] I would like to say that the urgent and necessary thing is to get the negotiations started. When the principles are defined--principles that received the approval of the international community and which are as consistent as they should be--and when all the parties agree to start the negotiating process, then there will be hope of moving closer to a solution.

As for the practical steps which you have mentioned to pave the way for a solution, these must not be understood as steps directed against a certain side but as moves to achieve practical results that will benefit everybody.

[Question] What are Denmark's conditions for recognizing the PLO officially as the only legitimate representative of the Palestinian people?

[Answer] I cannot answer this question at the present time.

EXPELLED WEST BANK MAYORS SEEK SUPPORT FOR RETURN

AU301435 [Editorial Report] Several Vienna papers on 29 June carry reports of the 28 June Vienna press conference given by the expelled West Bank Mayors Fad al-Qawasimi of Hebron and Muhammad Milhim of Halhul, and by Islamic Judge Shayka at-Tamini of Hebron. According to WIENER ZEITUNG, they declared at the press conference that their expulsion was proof that "Israel does not want peace" and that it "fears peace more than war." The paper says among other things: "The Palestinians hope to obtain through their visit the support of Chancellor Kreisky and of the entire Austrian people for their demand to let them return to their homeland."

According to ARBEITER-ZEITUNG, Mayor al-Qawasimi told the newsmen how the three of them were picked up from their houses at 1 am on 3 May and were put into a helicopter on the pretext that Defense Minister Weizmann wanted to see them in Tel Aviv, whereas they were actually taken to southern Lebanon. There they were told about their expulsion. As for the Israeli Labor Party, Al-Qawasimi is reported as saying that it did not recognize the Palestinians as a people, and differed from the Likud government only in its methods, not in its aims. The paper notes that the three deportees will fly from Vienna to Beirut and from there to Amman to await the decision of the Israeli Supreme Court expected on 6 July. Should this court annul their expulsion, they will return home. Otherwise, they will begin a trip through the Arab countries, the paper says.

On the same page, ARBEITER-ZEITUNG carries a report on a lecture given by Palestinian journalist Raymonda at-Tawil at the Vienna Karl Renner Institute on 26 June in the presence of Chancellor Kreisky. Speaking about the current situation in the Israeli-occupied Arab territories, Mrs at-Tawil "directed a passionate appeal to the Austrians to support the peace movements of the Palestinians and of the Israelis," the paper says. It quotes Mrs at-Tawil as saying "we have no arms, we are civilians who want to live in peace. We respect Judaism and the Bible and are not waging a religious war. We only fight racism, expansionism through which they are trying to force us to emigrate." According to the paper, At-Tawil thanked Chancellor Kreisky for his endeavors to find the truth in this most involved aspect of the Middle East problem. She expressed the hope that Kreisky would not be disappointed by the Palestinians and Israelis and the extremists on both sides, because "the people in this region need help in a most difficult and dangerous situation."

KREISKY COMMENTS ON AS-SADAT STATEMENT ABOUT POSSIBLE VISIT

AU301145 Vienna DIE PRESSE in German 30 Jun 80 pp 1, 2

[Philipp E. Gudenus report: "Uncertainty Regarding As-Sadat Trip to Salzburg in August"]

[Excerpt] Vienna--Uncertainty prevailed in Vienna on Sunday after Egyptian President as-Sadat's statement that he hoped to be able to visit Bavaria and Salzburg after the Ramadan fasting month. The date for Salzburg will depend, however, on the date of Austrian Chancellor Kreisky's long-planned visit to Egypt, As-Sadat declared before journalists after a talk with Bavarian Premier Franz Josef Strauss in Cairo on Sunday [29 June]. This year Ramadan ends in mid-August.

In this context Kreisky told DIE PRESSE on Sunday: "At present, I have no plans regarding a visit to Egypt. I still have a lot to do in Austria." He added, however, that As-Sadat was of course cordially invited to come to Austria. Kreisky: "I have already let him know that, through friends." The chancellor declared, however, that he has not had any direct contact with the Egyptian president for quite some time.

ARGENTINE FOREIGN MINISTER PASTOR CONCLUDES VISIT

Stresses North-South Dialogue

AU301359 Vienna DIE PRESSE in German 28-29 Jun 80 p 2

[Excerpts] Vienna (GUD)--Today, Saturday [28 June], Argentina's Foreign Minister Carlos W. Pastor concludes his official visit to Austria. While the Argentine repeatedly stressed that his country advocated the "values of the Western world," Foreign Minister Pahr declared in a toast that the relations between the two countries "despite different political systems" were developing positively. Pastor's current trip to Austria is the first one by an Argentine foreign minister to West Europe since the military came to power.

At the talks between the two ministers primarily international questions were discussed: On this occasion, Pastor paid tribute to Pahr's trip to Nicaragua a few weeks ago, terming it particularly important since that Central American country in its present position needs the demonstrated confidence of the West.

In the Argentine's view the North-South dialogue is the central question of the future. The rich states of the North should not merely establish lucrative business relations with the South but should also open their own markets so as to give the South opportunities for exports to the North.

Ends Visit 28 Jun

[Unattrib. a report: "Argentine Foreign Minister Departed]

[Text] Argentinian Foreign Minister Maj Gen Carlos W. Pastor concluded his 3-day official visit to Austria at midday Saturday. He was seen off at Schwechat Airport by his host, Foreign Minister Willibald Pahr, and proceeded to Paris.

During his visit the Argentinian foreign minister was also received by President Rudolf Kirchschlaeger and Chancellor Bruno Kreisky.

In view of the international situation, the endeavors for detente were discussed at the Vienna talks. Regarding the bilateral relations between Austria and Argentina it was noted that they continue to develop favorably. The sides thoroughly discussed the opportunities arising from the agreement, signed 6 months ago, on economic and industrial cooperation.

OCCUPATION OF NORTH CAROLINA TRADE MISSION ENDS

LD301512 Hamburg DPA in German 1433 GMT 30 Jun 80

[Excerpts] Duesseldorf--The occupation today of the trade mission of the U.S. State of North Carolina in Duesseldorf ended without incident after almost 4 hours. The approximately 10 young occupiers, whose action was aimed at bringing about the release of the 13 persons arrested on 18 May during an occupation of the America house in Berlin, left the building after the police had promised them they could depart freely without having their identities checked.

The youngsters had declared their occupation of the office on the third floor of a seven-story office building at about 1140. They allowed the employees to leave immediately, it was learned later. In a telephone conversation with DPA, they said that "this is a peaceful occupation without hostage-taking" intended to draw attention to their action.

After West German radio had broadcast an announcement about their occupation at noon, the occupiers, the number of whom was still not known at that time, conceded that their demand for "unfalsified reportage of our action in Westduetsche Rundfunk II's magazine" had been met and got in direct contact with the police by telephone to negotiate their withdrawal. The police said they had the impression that the people wanted to "end the affair" as quickly as possible and therefore agreed to negotiations. The authorities did not respond to the demand for the release of the Berlin detainees.

ARMED MAN TAKES HOSTAGES AT BANK ON U.S. AIRFIELD

LD301648 Hamburg DPA in German 1547 GMT 30 Jun 80

[Summary] Wuerzburg--An armed man today took two Americans as hostages in an American bank at the U.S. military airfield in Wuerzburg. Late this afternoon, hours after the taking of the hostages, the situation became more tense without an end in sight.

In the early hours of this morning an unidentified man masked with a black scarf, according to U.S. Gen Robert L. Wetzel, seized a U.S. sergeant and an American civilian. The armed man demanded roughly DM2 million, which he said was to pay for an operation on his friend, an Indian, in his hometown. He also demanded a car to take him out of the American area. Armed U.S. patrols surrounded the building. The U.S. barracks were also under surveillance of the German police armed with machineguns.

The armed man had entered the bank at 0800, 5 minutes after opening time. It is believed that he was aware of the large sums of money on the premises since Monday is the military pay day. A German cashier assistant managed to creep out of the building and alert police. Members of the German police and antiterrorist specialists started telephone negotiations with the hostage-taker who has so far set two deadlines, 1000 and 1130, which have both passed.

Soldier Killed by Special Unit

LD010346 Hamburg DPA in German 0250 GMT 1 Jul 80

[Summary] Wuerzburg--A U.S. soldier who took two hostages at an American Express bank at the U.S. military airfield in Wuerzburg yesterday was shot dead tonight by members of a special German unit.

Nearly $600,000 out of a ransom of $1.4 million demanded by the soldier had been handed over to him last night and the remaining $800,000 had been placed in a getaway car he had also demanded. It was when he was approaching the getaway car with one of his hostages that the marksmen opened fire. The other hostage had been released minutes earlier.

SPD'S BAHR INTERVIEWED ON MOSCOW SUMMIT

DW010823 Cologne Deutschlandfunk Network in German to East and West Germany 0518 GMT 30 Jun 80

[Reporter Lenz interview with Egon Bahr, SPD Federal manager, place and date not given--recorded]

[Text] [Question] Expectations in connection with the Federal chancellor's visit to Moscow are kept very low by the Federal Government and the coalition supporting it. They say that talking to each other is in itself a success if not the success of the visit. The opposition, however, expects the Soviet Union to scrap its generations of medium-range missiles and withdraw its troops from Afghanistan following the Federal Chancellor's talks with Brezhnev. Deputy CDU Chairman Alfred Dregger has just said that if real progress is not achieved, the Moscow talks would not merely be a failure, they would have weakened the alliance with the United States even more. The opposition has very high expectations. Does it have more confidence in the chancellor's skill to negotiate than the coalition?

[Answer] I have some doubts in this respect. One could say in viewing the opposition's commentaries on the Moscow visit that it is celebrating April Fool's Day on a continuous basis. Even Mr Dregger was in favor of the visit; now he is against it. Strauss was once against it, then for it and now he is against it again. We shouldn't take this too seriously. It is absolutely clear that the opposition is trying to burden the visit with so much baggage that nobody would be able to carry. The chancellor knows what he can do and what he cannot do, and he is well prepared for this visit.

[Question] Much history is being cited to explain things that are happening in the world. The Federal chancellor recalled 1941 when the nations slid into World War I without actually wanting to. The CDU/CSU union's defense expert Woerner sees a parallel to 1938 in connections with the chancellor's Moscow visit, comparing it to Chamberlain's meeting with Hitler.

[Answer] I must tell you that it does not pay to discuss this comparison by Woerner. We had a debate in the Bundestag about 10 days ago, and if one were to summarize all the problems the opposition brought up in connection with the chancellor's visit and the fear that he might give in and that our relations with America might collapse, well we will know all about it tomorrow night. We will know tomorrow night that the fears of the opposition were wrong and that confidence in the chancellor was right.

[Question] What is your opinion on present relations between Bonn and Washington? The union believes that the announced backing for the chancellor is pure declamation. Carter's recent letter to Helmut Schmidt indicated the concern that existed in the United States prior to the chancellor's visit. It was said that this was ironed out in Venice. Is that the right term for the feeling in the alliance with regard to the solidarity which is critical at present?

[Answer] I would not say critical solidarity. I much rather believe that there are no doubts concerning alliance partners as a whole and the identity of their security interests. One can sometimes have different opinions on individual paths in this respect. This just indicates that the United States naturally has worldwide, global interests, and that the Federal Republic of Germany, together with other partners, is more strongly linked to Europe and the pursuance of its interests in Europe. But both know that about each other.

[Question] Federal Foreign Minister Genscher announced he would make a Washington visit right after the Moscow visit to give a voluntary report. Does that not indicate that the union's thesis, namely, that Washington mistrusts the chancellor, is not all that unrealistic?

[Answer] No, I do not see it that way for the following reason: You must not forget that immediately after Giscard d'Estaing's talk with Brezhnev, the French foreign minister came here to inform us. It was not said that he came to report. Mr Genscher will be going to Paris and Washington because we are interested in having quick, good and direct information passed to our main ally in order to rule out misunderstandings.

[Question] Let me return to the small expectations the Federal Government has with regard to the Moscow visit. Expectations are kept so low that success for the visit is almost programed. Is that not too modest? Many people have the impression that the Federal chancellor knows how to get along with the Russians.

[Answer] The point is that we have a somewhat frozen situation, a situation that is not without danger. Going to Moscow at such a time is certainly important, and the talks to be held there will certainly not be simple. One cannot predict the outcome. Even the draft of a communique is not far enough along that one could say or know anything about the result. Moreover, when two men of their temperament meet, one can never be certain about the outcome.

Regarding the matter itself, aside from the fact that one must talk--and we have always maintained, together with the Federal chancellor, that more and not less talks should take place when matters become dangerous--there are a number of factual points to be negotiated and discussed, without a result being predictable. First, I believe that it will be important to find out whether the Soviet Union wants to continue its policy on the basis of the 1970 treaties and the joint statement of May 1978. It would mean continuity, predictability and stability with regard to relations between the two countries and other countries as well. It would be very important for Europe, and the Americans would like it too, for there to be a desire to avoid a new crisis in Europe.

Second, there is the problem of economic cooperation. We have made plans in this respect going beyond the year 2000. It remains to be seen whether they can be fulfilled.

And third, there is the missile problem. This is the problem of arms control; and disarmament will become the key problem in East-West relations for the years to come. Making some progress here, not in the sense of negotiations or agreements but with regard to an opening toward negotiations, is for me the key problem of the visit as a whole.

[Question] This is exactly the point where the quarrel begins. If one interprets the matter correctly, the United States fears economic egotism on the part of the Federal Republic together with the unreliability of the alliance, which means exchanging medium-range missiles for natural gas. The CDU/CSU union fears, as Alfred Dregger has said, that strategic goods will be delivered in exchange for gas from the Soviet Union.

[Answer] Well, we in Europe obtain gas from the Soviet Union, but so do a number of countries. Whether medium-range missiles will be stationed or not will depend on negotiations to take place between the United States and the Soviet Union. We do not have these missiles and therefore we cannot negotiate on them. What Mr Dregger has said is very obvious nonsense.

[Question] You doubt that this statement was made out of real and honest concern?

[Answer] Well, people will see within a very short time--with half a year or 1 year--that this was absolute nonsense.

PRESS COMMENTS ON SCHMIDT'S MOSCOW VISIT

DIE WELT Commentary

DW301126 Bonn DIE WELT in German 30 Jun 80 p 6

[Commentary signed Kem.: "A Matter of Nerves"]

[Text] A heavy day has begun in the political lives of Helmut Schmidt and Hans-Dietrich Genscher. The pressure to produce a success can hardly be avoided in connection with this Moscow visit. But it is also enormously precarious to define what would be considered a "success" tomorrow night in Bonn and in the capitals of the allies. Accord on economic cooperation or the pipe deal or gas can hardly be considered a political asset. It could much rather be compromising to the enterprise, depending on what else Schmidt and Genscher bring home.

A government has rarely before been so tightly committed in public about what it has to say in the talks with the masters of the Kremlin. Not even with regard to the beginning of Ostpolitik did the Federal Government have to take such verbose precautions against misinterpretations--unfortunately! And in the seventies the danger of missing the boat politically was nevertheless very great. NATO backing for the German chancellor and his foreign minister is not an unlimited authorization at all. The alliance confidence contains clearly defined limits which must not be overstepped. Schmidt and Genscher do not have a mandate from the alliance, but they will report to the alliance on every politically relevant word that will be said in the Kremlin that belongs to the underlying foundation of this business.

The difficulty in climbing this German-Soviet summit actually demonstrates how narrow the foreign policy leeway of the Federal Republic as a partner of the Western alliance is vis-a-vis Moscow. If it was the intention of Carter's letter, as must be assumed, to point out this consequence to the Federal chancellor, it has had an excellent result with regard to the several commitments on the part of the addressee. Since the positions in Moscow--with the exception of business, as had been said before--appear to be firmly antagonistic, and since surprising "gifts" from Brezhnev to Schmidt in matters of Afghanistan and arms control must be ruled out, the rest is a matter of nerves. The accurate scales are ready, and the losses or gains from this visit will be checked not merely in Bonn and Moscow.

FRANKFURTER ALLGEMEINE on Reasons for Trip

DW301127 Frankfurt FRANKFURTER ALLGEMEINE in German 30 Jun 80 p 1

[Article signed R.H.: "Sense of a Trip"]

[Text] We hardly dare to set forth out loud one of the motives for Schmidt's Moscow trip because it is so simple and banal: The Federal chancellor wants to see on the spot what is going on. What contributes considerably to his concern and that of the Western world is the fact that in the evening dusk of the Brezhnev epoch nobody outside the Kremlin can see exactly how decisions are made there. Nobody can say with certainty, for instance, how the more recent "geopolitical" expansion of the Soviet Union came about; who influenced whom, who convinced whom. Are the military men tempted by their technical means, and do they then exert the pressure of opinion on others? Who is eligible anyway to succeed Brezhnev: People who know the world better or less well than their predecessors, or even people who only act in the awareness of their own greatness and underestimate the outside world?

The answer will not be manifest in the brief moments in the Kremlin. But still, despite all other new means of conveying what is perceived, a curious person will gather additional impressions on the spot. The most typical trip of this kind was perhaps Kosygin's visit to Canada in 1972 where the Kremlin's number two man gathered so many impressions that they also determined future policy. On the one hand, Kosygin felt something of the spirit of North American technology, and on the other, he was strongly confronted with the Western understanding of freedom.

Thus, with a view to the Moscow trip, the value of which has been disputed up to the last moment, an argument justifying the visit could be seen in the effort to track down that which is imponderable in the circumstances surrounding the conflict. However, the visitor runs the risk of simply being confronted with the reason of state of an imperium--that wall of huge granite rock on which he knocks without even getting an audible echo. Will this perhaps be the true impression, apart from set scenes and pantomimes and the noncommittal content of the already negotiated communique? But which statesman would want to admit with regard to such a fateful expedition that he was guided by the adage: When somebody has been on a journey he can tell you a lot....

DIE WELT ON GDR CRITICISM OF NATO COMMUNIQUE

DW011031 Bonn DIE WELT in German 1 Jul 80 p 8

[Commentary signed Kem.: "Mixed"]

[Text] The Federal Republic is getting poor marks from East Berlin. Regardless of how polite the Kremlin masters may be to the visitors from the Rhine, the second German state bluntly criticizes Foreign Minister Genscher for having caused NATO to interfere grossly in the internal affairs of the "GDR." All papers are full of fury. But the fact that caused all the excitement was not mentioned--namely, the reference to German reunification contained in the Ankara NATO communique. The excitement is understandable because something was mentioned there after many years have passed which the SED would like to have one forget, doggedly but in vain, and because they fear that this kind of unseemly action might be noted most plainly by some people if Schmidt were to discuss internal German matters with Honecker on the German Baltic coast. Apropos NATO: Moscow certainly does not consider it "interference" when it warns Spain against upsetting detente by entering the alliance.

PORTUGUESE PRIME MINISTER ARRIVES TO DISCUSS EEC ACCESSION

LE MONDE WEIGHS GISCARD REMARKS ON AFGHANISTAN, MIDEAST

LD301421 Paris LE MONDE in FRENCH 28 Jun 80

[Editorial: "Taking Risks"]

[Text] Mr Giscard d'Estaing has made some points which deserve to be highlighted, with regard to both the Middle East and the Afghan crisis.

It was when discussing Afghanistan that the president of the republic took the greatest risks. In a way he put himself forward as the guarantor of Soviet good will. Rejecting the hypothesis of a mere diversionary maneuver, he backed the withdrawal of some Red Army units announced last Sunday. This withdrawal, which however should in no way weaken the USSR's military capabilities in Afghanistan, he said, constitutes "a gesture in the right direction responding to the demands made of the Soviet Union." According to the head of state, it indicates Moscow's intention to "halt the deterioration in international relations which started with Afghanistan."

Mr Giscard d'Estaing took the same opportunity to rule out any military aid for the Afghan resistance. This is good news for the Kremlin, because this decision contradicts the analyses made hitherto in high places including the Quai d'Orsay, where it was agreed that the essential factor in the evolution of the Afghan crisis was the degree of combativeness shown by the resistance.

Mr Giscard d'Estaing, who portrayed the withdrawal of an "already significant" number of Soviet soldiers as a personal success, also rejected the proposals for a "transitional" solution outlined by President Carter in Belgrade on Tuesday. He prefers a "definitive solution" of a political nature involving the complete withdrawal of Soviet forces, the Afghan people's right to self-determination and the country's return to its traditional nonalignment. The aim is particularly ambitious. With all due respect to the head of state, it is difficult to see how it could all be achieved at once. And how long would it take?

With regard to the Middle East, Mr Giscard d'Estaing took particular care to illustrate and defend a policy which is now well known. Denying that he has any ulterior motives connected with oil--that was not, however, the most spontaneous part of his performance --the head of state expounded the idea of two rights with great conviction: Israel's right to security and the Palestinian people's right to existence. Warning against the present "disaster course," Mr Giscard d'Estaing stressed the need for Israel to withdraw from the territories occupied in 1967, because, he stressed, "secure and internationally recognized borders cannot and never could include occupied territories."

In Paris, in the presidential suite, the bluntness of these remarks was by no means shocking. The Israeli Government's blind inflexibility must, if possible, be bent. However, it would have been better if the president of the republic had not dodged the first question asked on the Middle East, which concerned the "major reasons" which "prevent" him "from making an official and historic visit to Israel," since any realistic approach to the Middle East tragedy requires sympathy and understanding toward all the protogonists.

LE MATIN EXAMINES MOTIVES BEHIND SOVIET TROOP WITHDRAWAL

LD261437 Paris LE MATIN in French 23 Jun 80 p 2

[Editorial: "From Warsaw to Venice"]

[Text] A message from Leonid Brezhnev handed to Valery Giscard d'Estaing Friday night and four lines from TASS announcing the withdrawal of certain Soviet units have been sufficient to completely upset the atmosphere--if not the agenda--of the summit of seven Western countries in Venice. And yet, as soon as he arrived, Jimmy Carter firmly expressed the hope that Western industrialized countries would stand together in the face of Soviet expansionism. Does this mean that Moscow's two initiatives have changed the aspects of the problem and are signs of good will?

The Kremlin had at least three valid reasons for making a "detente" gesture toward the West. It is obvious that less than 1 month before the opening of Olympic games in Moscow, seduction diplomacy can encourage the last undecided to participate. Second, between now and the end of the month, some important meetings concerning defense problems are to take place. On the one hand, at a NATO meeting which opens in Ankara next Wednesday, Belgium and the Netherlands are expected to state their views on the installation of Pershing missiles on their soil. The Kremlin's initiative could now encourage them to postpone their decision. And on the other hand, Chancellor Helmut Schmidt is to meet Leonid Brezhnev on 30 June and what they are to discuss as a matter of priority is disarmament, not Afghanistan. And, finally, the Venice summit offered the Soviets an exceptional sounding board for their "gesture."

However, none of these reasons provides a key to Moscow's real intentions. Either it is a "piece of bluff" or the USSR is really preparing to withdraw its troops from Afghanistan in the medium term. If the former hypothesis proved right, the French head of state, who has clearly become the Soviet leader's chosen interlocutor, would appear as both the Western front's divider and Leonid Brezhnev's messenger. On 19 May, in Warsaw, Valery Giscard d'Estaing took a risk which could be fraught with disastrous consequences. Conversely, a withdrawal of the occupation troops would crown the French president's determination to keep at an equal distance from Washington and Moscow and be the two superpowers' "busybody." In view of the communique issued at the recent Franco-German summit, only a complete withdrawal of the Red Army would indicate a diplomatic victory by Valery Giscard d'Estaing. In fact, it is obvious that there can be no half measures in this sphere.

However, nothing in the Soviet Union's recent behavior indicates that things have been moving in this direction. By playing on their legitimate fear of war, feigning moderation and talking peace, Leonid Brezhnev may have put the Western leaders "in his pocket." His objective? As we have often pointed out in these columns, it is breaking the Yalta status quo and imposing a redistribution of influence zones in the world. A redistribution which would give an advantage to the most aggressive camp at the moment--the Soviet socialist camp.

L'HUMANITE ASSAILS MEDIA COVERAGE OF AFGHAN EVENTS

[Rene Andrieu editorial: "Rumors and Facts"]

[Text] Judging from the reactions it has sparked off in every chancellery, the announcement of a partial withdrawal of Soviet forces from Afghanistan is regarded as a very significant event.

However, the special envoys and commentators of French radio and television initially made every effort to present the news as a maneuver without any real significance, aimed essentially at upsetting the harmony of the Western heads of state holding a summit meeting in Venice.

In doing so they were in complete agreement with U.S. Secretary of State Muskie who had immediately shown his skepticism and irritation at such an incongruous initiative at a time when all Washington's efforts--which began, let us point out, well before the Afghanistan affair started--are aimed at rallying all its Western allies under its banner in a new arms race.

The French foreign minister was more circumspect and described the news as "important," while his Spanish counterpart saw it as "a positive step toward solving the Afghan conflict" and the Indian secretary of state as "a step in the right direction."

What seems certain is that the Soviet Government would not carry out a withdrawal of its troops, even a partial withdrawal, if the situation in Afghanistan was as apocalyptic as reporters were asserting by using the term "alleged" as a method of giving information, piously reporting any old gossip and presenting the stupidest rumors as "reliable."

What are their sources? A "traveler" arriving in New Delhi, a "teacher" from Kabul, an "Afghan rebel," all fierce opponents of the regime although courageously remaining anonymous. Who now dares report the incredible news of the imminent taking of the capital by the rebels or the suicide of President Karmal, saved at in the nick of time by his Soviet cook? Nobody. And yet a few days ago these reports were the delight of most "reporters."

Union for French Democracy Deputy Madelin, who has just returned from Afghanistan, let slip an unguarded admission on television. Speaking of the situation in Kabul, he said: "This calm hides a deep revolt." So, when we were told that the city had been put to fire and the sword and that hundreds of people were dead, it was all lies. Yes! Even this expert in anticommunism--he was a member of the "New Order" fascist organization--has been forced to admit it rather pathetically.

Our special envoy Jacques Coubard relates how he witnessed the departure of a Soviet armored regiment from Kabul yesterday morning. This would tend to prove--if proof were needed--not only that the Afghan capital runs no risk of being invaded by rebels but also that the "reports," widely published by the press, radio and television, on a strengthening of Soviet military forces were untrue. This is one more sign showing the level reached by the "deception" about the situation in Afghanistan.

Atlantic circles in Brussels yesterday expressed the view that the partial withdrawal of Soviet troops is "in complete contradiction with the military situation in the country." It is difficult to know whether to be surprised at this concern or amused at this disappointment. Indeed, it is simply that the campaign orchestrated by Atlantic circles on the military situation in Afghanistan which is largely in contradiction to the facts. On Saturday I expressed the hope that other evidence would help to restore the truth. Rene Mauries, in LA DEPECHE DU MIDI, reports the condemnatation by a leading figure in the French colony in Kabul of the "sensationalist reports" of some special envoys and in this connection he deplores what he calls "a dramatic degredation of professional conscience."

This proves that it is not necessary to share a viewpoint on Afghanistan to exercise the journalist's profession honestly.

JUDGE RULES U.S. AIRBASE WORKERS ENTITLED TO MORE PAY

AU281603 Rome ANSA in English 1555 GMT 28 Jun 80

[Text] Martina Franca (south Italy), June 28 (ANSA)--The lower court judge in this southern Italian port city today ordered American President Jimmy Carter, cited as the legal representatives of the United States, to shell out five million lire (nearly five thousand dollars) in court costs and recognize fifteen Italian workers as employees of the American Air Force base here. The lady judge, Carmila Santoro, found in favor of the maintenance workers, originally hired by a local firm, who filed suit in 1976 seeking job standing and pay benefits equal to those accorded the positions in the United States. The workers argued that they dealt exclusively with materials and equipment provided directly by the United States Air Force and that, therefore, "their production schedules and the real situation of the Italian subcontractor were a part of the American military administration". The attorney for the plaintiffs declared today that, "the Martina Franca sentence has immense implications for all the other American air bases in Italy".

PCI'S COSSUTTA CITES 'CONTRADICTIONS' IN PCI-PSI RELATIONS

LD271351 Rome L'ESPRESSO in Italian 22 Jun 80 p 7

["F.D.V." Interview with PCI Directorate member Armando Cossutta: "Cossiga: There Is a Stumbling Block Between Us and the Italian Socialist Party (PSI)"]

[Text] Question: Senator Cossutta, in its election campaign the PCI did not spare the socialists harsh criticism. Now it wants to resume the dialogue....

Answer: The dialogue with the PSI was never interrupted, apart from electioneering polemic which might have been particularly vigorous on occasions. Now it is objectively necessary to intensify relations in order to make it possible to rebuild unitary councils or to build them from scratch.

Question: Be that as it may, the impression is that the PCI attacks the socialists when they are in difficulty and proffers them its hand when they gain strength.

Answer: We have criticized the government and we remain convinced that it would do well to make way for a new political leadership. The polemic with the socialists must be viewed in this context. In any case the PSI's undoubtedly important electoral success stems from various elements, which are to an extent contradictory. The PSI asked for votes to guarantee governability with the DC and certainly it did gain some for this. It asked for and gained votes to consolidate the leftwing councils with the communists and other leftwing forces. It asked for and gained votes from part of the radical electorate, which is certainly not concerned with governability.

Question: You regard it as a contradiction on the PSI's part to be allied with thePCI in local government and with the DC in the national government. Is there not also a contradiction on the part of the PCI, the socialists' ally in the councils and its opposition with respect to the government?

Answer: I do not regard the PSI's contradiction to be an irremediable one. It is an objective contradiction, whereby it is important, despite the two parties' different positions in parliament, to guarantee unitary relations for as advanced a policy as possible. Specifically, the need for governability must be reflected also in a more specific choice of policies. As for the contradiction which you see in the PCI, I believe it is resolved by the fact that in any case we believe we must have unitary relations with the socialists for a specific policy of regeneration and progress.

Question: Greater unity between communists and socialists could be facilitated by increased PSI-DC conflict, albeit within the context of a government alliance. Should this not prompt the PCI to regard the possibility of a socialist premiership more favorably?

Answer: This is a hypothesis than can be discussed if the occasion arises. It should be quite clear that the PCI will remain in opposition with respect to any government without its direct participation. In any case we have already said that opposition is not always of the same kind and that it takes into account the government's composition and specific policy.

Question: Might not a socialist-led cabinet be the better kind of government which Berlinguer was talking about?

Answer: I repeat that we will take into account not only the government's composition and structure, but also its leadership and specific actions. But it is unthinkable that the PCI will abandon its opposition role until the prejudice against it lapses.

L'UNITA HITS PARTIES' ATTITUDES TOWARD PCI IN LOCAL GOVERNMENT

[Editorial: "No Favor to Us"]

[Text] The descriptions of us standing, if not kneeling, with bated breath waiting for this or that party to decide whether or not to form councils with us is stupid and it wrongs not only the PCI but people in general. Because it is people who are at stake--and what governments should be given to the people of Liguria, Latium, Piedmont, the Marches and so forth. [paragraph continues]

According to some papers and some politicasters (in this instance this is just the right word) it would seem that whether or not to form councils is something which exclusively concerns relations among the parties and their respective advantages. This is alarming. Is this how some people intend to play with people's interests and feelings?

If we have properly understood the inferences made by the press, there are two questions being discussed. First: Whether or not to generalize the three-party formula, perhaps extending it to other forces that are by chance in opposition on the national plane. Second: What extra price the communists should be made to pay in those places where councils are formed with them. Now we will certainly not take these inferences as a true representation of reality. We will keep to the parties' official stances and, if anything, we are concerned that these not be distorted by a certain political journalistic sector.

We would say this to the advocates of a generalized three-party formula: You are all entitled to form your councils (if you have a majority) but you must tell the people why, with what advantages and for what reasons. You will have to demonstrate the essential quality of this option. If, for instance, you opt for a centrist solution in the Marches you cannot simply say: What we need here is an alliance with the DC rather than with the PCI. You must clearly state that this implies preference for a particular bloc of interests, for a particular program, and you will have to explain it not to us (since in such an event we will be perfectly capable of doing our duty in opposition) but to the inhabitants of the Marches. The DC and the PCI are not interchangeable neutral factors: You support one to gain one thing and the other to gain another.

Furthermore, if--as yesterday's summit of the secretaries of the governing parties prompts us to fear--there is a return to a situation in which it is the seat of government which ends the "difficult councils," then it will have to be acknowledged, without any hypocrisy regarding respect for local self-government, that the road of homogenization from center to periphery has been embarked on. We do not believe that this extreme will be reached.

The same argument applies in situations where there is no alternative to an agreement with the communists. Some people say that such a tendency will be influenced by a "price hike" in terms of distributing posts (alleging that it all boils down to diminishing the number of communist mayors). We shall see. Meanwhile we will simply point out that just as in the "difficult councils" it is not a matter of doing the communists any favors, it is not a matter of punishing them in the "East councils." The essential point is quite different: the substance. Here there is a leftwing administration because the left has shown that it can govern better, because the left opts for certain interests and pursues certain objectives rather than others. This is the only kind of comparison that we are willing to undertake and that, let us remember, is in the interests of the workers and the people.

SA CARNEIRO ON EEC, ELECTION PROSPECTS

[Unattributed report: "Sa Carneiro Confirms Desire To Join Common Market in Santarem"]

[Text] Prime Minister Francisco de Sa Carneiro stated yesterday that Portugal's desire to join the EEC remains. This statement was made during the visit by a government team to the national agricultural show in Santarem.

The prime minister, who was thus present at the conclusion of the event which was held from 5-15 June, also maintained that "the delay is one country's opinion and not the L stance," in connection with the fact that the Venice summit made no pronouncement on the enlargement of the Common Market--something which Sa Carneiro deemed positive.

Sa Carneiro also stressed that "the government will continue to implement its program; in particular, by intensifying the agricultural measures and continuing the handing over of land in the agrarian reform area to independent farmers."

"Some 350 procedures have now been completed," he said, "and 1,200 which were envisaged should be completed by the end of our term of office."

The informal statements by the FRG minister of agriculture, who was also present at the show and who told the news media that his country has always advocated Portugal's entry into the EEC, are worth recording. Josef Ertl also said that German farmers regard their Portuguese counterparts by no means as competitors but from a viewpoint of cooperation.

In an interview with the Oporto morning newspaper O PRIMEIRO DE JANEIRO, Prime Minister Sa Carneiro maintained that "the only acceptable stance" for General Ramalho Eanes is not to run again for the presidency of the republic. He justified his opinion by asserting that the Communist Party "is leading the opposition to the government, and the Socialist Party [PS] is commanding the forces which are seeking General Eanes' reelection, with the PS' support."

In this interview, published yesterday, Sa Carneiro also expressed his conviction that "the Democratic Alliance will increase its parliamentary majority" in the coming legislative elctions, and, with respect to the presidential elections, he maintained that the candidates supported by the present majority coalition--General Soares Carneiro--will be elected, stressing that the "most likely outcome is that he will have an absolute majority in the first round."

The prime minister also acknowledged that "a systematic agreement between the Democratic Alliance and the PS which would enable the PS, while being in opposition and a possible alternative to the Democratic Alliance government from 1984 onward, to cooperate with the latter until then within the framework of the constitutional and presidential majority, would not be theoretically impossible."

"However," he commented, "the PS long ago rejected in statements any possibility of such a systematic agreement and confirmed this stance by the obstruction which, imitating and following the Portuguese Communist Party [PCP], it has sought from the outset to create for the Democratic Alliance government."

Sa Carneiro also believes that the PS "has ceased to have a blueprint of its own" in joining the front which it has set up with the pro-Eanes forces as a whole, whose basic aim is General Eanes' reelection. He asserts that these forces include the PCP, "as is increasingly clear," and that this is sufficient "to preclude any possibility of agreement."

The prime minister stated that "what the communist forces are seeking is to recover the blueprint of a PS minority government, concealing the reality of the power of the Communist Party and of a certain military sector, whose continuation in political life the communists are seeking--all this against a background of military presidentialism, which I have denounced since 1977." In the prime minister's opinion, the Democratic Alliance's election victory had one essential feature: "For the first time since 25 April, the Communist Party ceased to be in power."

The Democratic Alliance leader also told O PRIMEIRO DE JANEIRO that "the conduct of foreign policy rests with the government, and with the government alone," and he believes it justified for his opponents to persist in denying this. "This," he said, "would be aimed at maintaining the line of ambiguity which characterized previous governments." In Sa Carneiro's opinion, this line helps the strategy of the Communist Party and of the Soviet Union, for which "it is essential that Portugal be controlled and, as far as possible, neutralized."

With respect to relations with the former colonies, he said "there are some things which should be avoided," specifically: "We should not attempt to take part in other countries' cooperation plans.... We should not view Angola or Mozambique as countries of Portuguese emigration and we should not attempt to affect in Europe and in the world an African stance, specifically with trespect to those two states, which we do not actually have."

OFFICIAL DELEGATION LEAVES FOR PRC; TRADE AGREEMENT EXPECTED

LD282336 Lisbon in Portugese to Africa 2000 GMT 28 Jun 80

[Text] A delegation led by Minister of Commerce and Tourism Basilio Horta [as heard] left Lisbon today for an official 8-day visit to the People's Republic of China. Basilio Horta will also be paying a 2-day working visit to Macao. Speaking on his departure, Basilio Horta pointed out that this is the first official visit ever paid by a member of the Portuguese Government to the People's Republic of China. He added that he expected a trade agreement to be signed during his stay but gave no further details, stating that he would rather talk about the agreement upon his return home, after it has been signed. The government delegation is accompanied by a trade delegation led by the secretary general of the Portuguese-Chinese Chamber of Commerce and composed of representatives of nine enterprises from both the public and private sectors.

GOVERNMENTS TO CONTACT INDONESIA ON EAST TIMOR

BK271445 Hong Kong AFP in English 1138 GMT 27 Jun 80

[Text] Jakarta, 27 Jun (AFP)--The Portuguese Government will shortly contact directly Indonesia and put forward to the Indonesian Government a proposal on "the East-Timorese people's right to self-determination," the ANTARA NEWS AGENCY reported tonight. Quoting a report from Lisbon by a correspondent of the Dutch daily TROUW, ANTARA said the proposal would be forwarded to the Indonesian Government (with which Lisbon severed relations four years ago) by Portuguese Foreign Minister Freitas do Amaral within two weeks.

According to the ANTARA'S report from The Hague the Portuguese foreign minister would notably request the Indonesian Government to allow a supervisory commission of the United Nations to enter East Timor. ANTARA said the TROUW correspondent noted that preparedness on the part of Portugal to directly contact Indonesia on the subject did not necessarily imply Portugal's recognition of the fact that East Timor has become for Jakarta part of Indonesia.

Direct contact between Portugal and Indonesia might be sought through the Indonesian Embassy in The Hague, or in the United Nations headquarters in New York, or through the Netherlands Embassy in Jakarta, the agency added.The Dutch Government, which has been looking after Portugal's interests in Indonesia since relations between the two countries were severed in 1976 following the integration of the former Portuguese colony by Indonesia, may offer its good offices, ANTARA said. The TROUW correspondent also noted the role to be played by the Dutch Government in a possible resumption of relations between Indonesia and Portugal, the ANTARA NEWS AGENCY added.

SPANISH, IRANIAN TRADE ON UPSWING

LD010859 Barcelona LA VANGUARDIA in Spanish 19 Jun 80 p 26

[EFE dispatch: "Big Increase in Spanish Exports to Iran"]

[Excerpts] Tehran, 18 June--Negotiations on finalizing agreements for importing Spanish products have forged ahead considerably over the month since 17 May, when the EEC decreed economic sanctions against Iran. Generally well-informed sources have indicated that, if negotiations continue at the present rate, total Spanish exports this year could total $500 million, exceeding last year's figure by $130 million.

However, sources in the Iranian National Oil Company today declined to confirm the scale of increased oil sales to Spain via one of the three Spanish companies working with Iran in the oil field.

The same sources also declined to name the Spanish concern and the size of the possible increase in sales, though other sources reckon that the increase could be 30 percent of the total 32 barrels a day [as published] which Spain currently buys from Iran.

Despite the secrecy surrounding the new negotiations on both the Spanish and the Iranian sides, commercial activity in Tehran has been marked by the presence of an unusual number of Spanish businessmen over the past month. Spanish companies carrying out negotiations include some of the leaders in their fields, such as Ensidesa or Torres Hostench.

It seems that Iranian representatives have asked Ensidesa to supply 50,000 tons of steel "immediately." This quantity had to be reduced because of the Spanish company's inability to meet such a large order in the short time specified by Iran.

At least three Spanish companies have also been negotiating with Iranian customers on foodstuffs. There is no official information regarding agreements reached in this field.

But it is not only Spanish companies restricted to the peninsula that have increased their trading with Iran. The Iberia Airline is also experiencing a sharp rise in takings compared to the past 15 months, since the beginning of the Iranian revolution.

Spain is at present the only European country that does not demand entry visas from Iranian subjects, thanks to an agreement to this effect signed under the former shah's regime. Therefore, since all the EEC countries introduced major restrictions on granting visas to Iranian citizens, Iberia has seen a steady increase in the number of passengers traveling on its weekly Saturday morning flight from Tehran.

TA NEA: SAVAK AGENTS OPERATE IN CYPRUS FOR ISRAEL

NC010635 Nicosia TA NEA in Greek 1 Jul 80 P 1

[Text] Agents of the Iranian secret service SAVAK have been operating in Cyprus on behalf of Israel. They are teams of agents who left Iran after the fall of the shah and have settled in Israel where they have been engaged in various activities. They have been used for missions, mainly abroad, on behalf of the Israeli secret services. SAVAK agents who are in the pay and employment of Israeli secret services have been noticed repeatedly in Nicosia, while persistent reports say that the authorities of the republic are greatly concerned about this issue. Three Iranians have already been ordered by the Cyprus police to leave Cyprus after verified reports established that one evening one of them had parked his car for many hours outside the office of Dr Vasos Lissaridhis, chairman of the Socialist party EDEK, at Konstandinos Palaiologos Street in Nicosia.

The three deported Iranians are 30 years old. They live in Israel but they hold Iranian passports. They came to Cyprus by boat from Israel and brought an Audi with them. Two of these Iranians stayed at a small hotel in Nicosia while the third was noticed spending many hours in his car which was parked outside the EDEK office. He claimed that he was there because he did not have any more money. However, all three Iranians later said they were planning to tour Cyprus.

In the meantime, as soon as they were noticed in Nicosia, and following the police decision to investigate the case and look for them, the three Iranians left for Limassol where they were noticed 2 days later by the security authorities. In Limassol the police detained the three Iranians for a 24-hour interrogation and then ordered them to leave Cyprus immediately. According to reliable reports, the three Iranians have already left.

FOREIGN MINISTER MITSOTAKIS EXPLAINS POSITIONS ON NATO, TURKEY

AT271740 Athens Domestic Service in Greek 1700 GMT 27 Jun 80

[Interview granted by Greek Foreign Minister Konstandinos Mitsotakis to ERT (Greek Radio and Television) correspondent in Ankara Vangelis Papaevthimiou; date not given--recorded]

[Text] [Question] Mr Minister, now that the work of the NATO spring conference has ended and the cycle of your contacts has ended, with the exception of course of your meeting with Erkmen which will be tomorrow, we would like you to tell us, first of all, of your impressions from the conference.

[Answer] As you have correctly put it, the first cycle of my contacts here in Ankara has ended. In other words the NATO conference, which was also the purpose of my visit here, has ended. From now on we have the second cycle of contacts which I will have with Erkmen, but not only with him, with Demirel and probably with other personalities on bypartite Greek-Turkish relations. All this, however, will follow.

In reference to the first part of your question, I would like to tell you this: This year's spring conference of NATO, as it is called, took place at a time which is difficult for the world. It is a time of tension and dangers. I could make the general observation that NATO once again reaffirmed its dual approach to world problems in the sense that on the one hand it strengthens its defensive capabilities and on the other hand it clearly places itself in support of dialogue between the East and the West.

I would also like to tell you that the differences between NATO members, which are much-advertised and very often exaggerated in the press--both the Greek and the world press--proved during this conference to be not as great as they are presented. NATO once again reaffirmed its unity--its true unity. The problem of NATO's unity has a particularly Greek interest in whatever affects its southeast wing.

It is here, in fact, that the differences between Greece and Turkey create problems. It is a fact that the problem was dealt with, but not at the ministerial session--we did not discuss it publicly--but it was examined by all those present. There is also a reference in the communique which recommends the strengthening of this unity in the southeast wing. This was something which was and continues to be our own goal because the return of Greece, its reattachment rather in order to use a more exact term, with the military wing of NATO means strengthening of the defense potential of NATO in this area.

I would also like to tell you that NATO once again reaffirmed--and permit me to state this--its own unity. NATO is an acceptable reality on a worldwide scale by both those who are its members and by its opponents. It is not a coincidence that there are communist parties in West Europe which support NATO and that the other side--the socialist countries, the Warsaw Pact--accept it as a reality which is useful both in the world balance as well as in world dialogue. This is what I would like to say in answer to your first question.

[Question] The conference gave you the opportunity to contact and confer with your colleagues from the other NATO members, can you refer to us who you met and then what are your conclusions from these talks?

[Answer] I have had contacts with the most basic personalities of NATO, the most basic ministers or, if you like me to put it in a different way, with those who are of greater interest to us.

I had a long conference which lasted for more than an hour with U.S. Secretary of State Muskie. I also had an easy going conference with Lord Carrington and I also had a long conference with Genscher, the West German foreign minister.

Apart from this, however--on the sidelines and in the corridors--I can say that I met all the ministers who attended, from my old friend the Italian foreign minister to the French, the Portugese and all the others who attended the conference.

Naturally, during the discussions I had with Muskie, Genscher, Lord Carrington and the others, the basic topic of discussion was the problem of the reattachment of Greece to the military wing of NATO. I stressed to all that Greece submitted to request despite the fact that Cyprus still continues to be under a partial occupation and that the reason which led us to withdraw from NATO has not yet been eradicated. Despite this we requested to return because we believe that in this way we better serve, we serve our national defense needs but we also serve a more general expediency and that we consider it unacceptable at this moment that other considerations should intervene and which prevent the return; the reattachment of Greece to the military wing of NATO.

I stressed to everyone that it is not logical that on the one hand Turkey should be helped, and correctly helped, to stand on its feet and that on the other hand Turkey should be given the right, and that the alliance should accept, that it could possibly block our return or reattachment to NATO.

I must tell you without any hestiation and without any desire to exaggerate things and particularly since the issue has not yet been solved, that there is absolute understanding, that even the Turkish side expressed itself clearly on the question of principle--that it has no objections. All the other conversations I had recognized the basic right of the Greek positions. I am certain that discussions will proceed.

Particularly with Muskie, I also discussed the question of U.S. bases. We have agreed, and this time it is an agreement, not simply the position of Greece, that the question of the reattachment of Greece to NATO is connected with that of the U.S. bases which, in any case, could only become acceptable and thinkable within the framework of NATO both by the Greek Government and by the Greek nation.

This was also a useful clarification of facts. In conclusion I would like to state that the question of the reattachment of Greece to the military wing is understood by the Alliance. I hope that our arguments--and I have every reason to believe this--were presented with clarity, with absolute honor, with absolute sincerity and in a very convincing way.

I can tell you that I hope that I have justified hopes and that things will proceed well.

RALLIS REBUTS PAPANDREOU CHARGES OF CONCESSIONS TO TURKEY

AT301433 Athens Domestic Service in Greek 0400 GMT 30 Jun 80

[Text] All issues with Turkey on our relations with NATO were expounded in detail during the debate on the government's policy statement and consequently there is no reason to convene the chamber. This was stressed in a statement by Prime Minister Rallis who, in reply to everything PASOK Chairman Papandreou observed in a statement yesterday, specifically underlined that this is not the first time that a political dialogue is being held between Greece and Turkey. He said: Other dialogues have taken place but they failed to produce results in the past just as I fear that they will fail to produce them in the future if there is no response on Turkey's part. At this point Rallis noted that this is the first time that Turkish Foreign Minister Erkmen did not categorically rule out the possibility of submitting the Greek-Turkish difference to the International Court at The Hague.

The prime minister then referred to the application for return to NATO in the form of a special relationship, observing that this application had been submitted in 1977. Regarding the Cyprus problem, the prime minister noted that the government has not abandoned the right of Cyprus because Greece supports Cyprus whole heartedly. Rallis then refuted Papandreou's claim that the Greek foreign minister has acknowledged Turkey's demands as legal and just, stressing that this in untrue. Then referring to the Turkish violations, the prime minister said that these are unrelated to the fact that the Turkish foreign minister does not dispute our borders in the Aegean. Finally, referring to the aid to Turkey, the prime minister stressed that the United States has accepted the ratio of 7 to 10 and is adhering to it. Unfortunately, however, West Germany, which had a ratio of 5 to 3 [as heard], did not adhere to it and Greece protested very vehemently, the Greek Foreign Minister conveying Greece's displeasure to his West German counterpart during their recent talks in Ankara.

Rallis concluded that in the talks regarding Greece's accession to the EEC, no conditions were put to us and he affirmed, regarding NATO, that the return must be based on the Haig-Davos agreement.

In a statement yesterday, PASOK Chairman Papandreou accused Foreign Minister Mitsotakis of having made unacceptable concessions during his talk with Turkish Foreign Minister Erkmen. The PASOK chairman added that, should Prime Minister Rallis protect the foreign minister politically, he intended to ask for a special plenary session of the chamber.

RIZOSPASTIS DESCRIBES TURKISH DIALOGUE AS 'CAMP DAVID'

AT291352 Athens RIZOSPASTIS in Greek 29 Jun 80 p 1

[Editorial: "Camp David"]

[Text] What happened in Ankara?

Available evidence causes only uneasiness. The Western information media are revealing: Strong Western pressure on Greece and Turkey to give up "narrow national interests" and "agree" in the interest of Atlantic "common defense." "Indications of flexibility" and "positive" manifestations by both governments and suggestions, many suggestions, regarding what each side will pay and "receive" and, furthermore, what the Republic of Cyprus will pay. [sentence as published]

Everything indicates that the Greek-Turkish dialogue which began yesterday at the political level is not one that could lead to the just and peaceful solution of existent or nonexistent differences between the two countries. Essentially it is a tripartite negotiation with the United States in the role of arbitrator. It is the unconventional Greek-Turkish "Camp David."

This is where the government policy of Atlanticism had led with the "logic" that national interests can be guaranteed through "a balance of arms" in the Aegean that will hinge every time on U.S. needs and plans. The government's surrender even of its very few negotiations positions convincingly indicates how limited and without prospects its resistance was and how rotten its alleged intransigence.

The defense of the country's national independence, sovereign rights and pacific relations with the neighboring peoples cannot be reconciled with Atlanticism in any of its variations.

This is confirmed by the results of the talks in Ankara which, at the same time, necessitate the immediate and determined activation of democratic progressive forces, all patriots, for the immediate suspension of negotiations with NATO, for the country's complete disengagement from NATO and the implementation of a policy of national independence, peace and friendship with all peoples.

NATIONAL ASSEMBLY DEBATES RPP INTERPELLATION AGAINST GOVERNMENT

TA301651 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1600 GMT 30 Jun 80

[Text] The National Assembly is continuing to debate the interpellation against the government submitted by RPP leader Bulent Ecevit and his colleagues. Prime Minister Suleyman Demirel has submitted a motion to the National Assembly leadership requesting a vote of confidence.

There was no quorum at the joint National Assembly and Senate meeting today. The National Assembly met at 1515. The National Assembly is being chaired by Deputy President Ali Fuat Eyuboglu. Deputy from Izmir Coskun Karagozoglu was the first to address the assembly on behalf of the RPP group. Noting that anarchy and inflation has doubled during the current administration, that life has become hellish and that the country is drowning in blood and tears, Karagozoglu requested that the government be removed from office. Pointing out that the cost-of-living has reached an unprecedented level, that the rate of inflation has reached three figures and that the people have been offered nothing but poverty during the JP's administration, Karagozoglu said:

Now only one thing remains to be done, to put an end to this course. Karagozoglu noted that anarchy and terror have become mass movements during the current administration, that cities have become liberated areas and that even the sick and the dead can no longer feel secure. Pointing out that there will be no end to the blood and tears shed as long as the current government remains in power, Karagozoglu concluded by saying that the parliament will put an end to this disastrous course and that the RPP will submit a motion of no confidence in the government as stipulated by the Constitution.

Expressing the views of the NSP group, Konya Deputy Necmettin Erbakan said: Come and let us remove the government from power. Let us form a parliamentary government. Noting that as long as this government remains in power anarchy cannot be prevented and nothing can be achieved in the economic field except price hikes, high interest rates and devaluations, Erbakan said that all the accusations pointed out in the interpellations were justified. Pointing out that the conditions in 1980 June were much worse than those existing in 1979 November, Erbakan added: Let us do the government a favor, let us remove it from office. Let the government we are going to form have five factors, namely brotherhood, restoration, parliament and a national solution. [as heard] Let it be a bridge for the coming 4 years. We have been supporting the government for the past 7 months. Now you support us in forming such a government or let your group free the parliament to form such a government.

Expressing the views of the Nationalist Action Party [NAP] group, deputy from Erzurum Nevzat Kosoglu said that the government and the opposition agree that anarchy is the most important problem in Turkey today. Noting that governments that do not propose serious measures against increasing anarchy in Turkey and that those who do not have the right perspective to the issue cannot solve this problem, Kosoglu added that it was wrong to interpret anarchy within the framework of figures. Kosoglu said that the real aim of anarchy was to destroy the state and the regime. He said: The reason the RPP submitted the interpellation is that it is bothered by the points reached as a result of the necessary measures taken against anarchy. Another reason is that the RPP wishes to become even part of a government through pressure from the grassroots. No one has the right to criticize a political party which has been granted the right to form a government single-handed for not implementing the views of other parties. Kosoglu said that the NAP never criticized the JP government for not administering the country in accordance with the principles of the NAP and that the NAP will continue to support the government.

Later deputy from Ankara Oguz Aygun expressed the views of the JP group. The debate on the interpellation was continuing when this news bulletin was being prepared.

Conference Vote Scheduled 2 Jul

TA010614 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 2000 GMT 30 Jun 80

[Excerpts] The National Assembly has completed the debates on the interpellation submitted by RPP Deputy from Zonguldak Bulent Ecevit and his colleagues. In a motion he submitted to the Assembly chairmanship, Prime Minister Suleyman Demirel asked the National Assembly for its vote of confidence. Bulent Ecevit and his colleagues submitted a motion for a vote of no confidence against the government. Under the Constitution, the confidence vote will be held on Wednesday, 2 July.

The National Assembly session, which was held under the chairmanship of Acting Assembly President Ali Fuat Eyuboglu, began at 1515 and lasted 5 1/2 hours without any breaks.

Deputy from Ankara Oguz Aygun expressed the views of the JP. He said that the fact that inflation and anarchy were Turkey's most important problems was stated by the government while it was being established. He added that it was necessary to correctly diagnose the present anarchy in order to understand why it was still a disaster.

Aygun emphasized the timing of the interpellation motion. He said that there was a NATO ministerial council meeting in Ankara when the motion was submitted. He charged that the efforts to topple the government at such a time could be described as a plot of the Socialist International within Turkey.

Aygun said that the plans of a restoration government which were mentioned did not aim at repairing Turkey's problems, but at restoring [Ecevit's] authority within the RPP. He added that this clashed with the national needs of the government.

Aygun said that elections must be held in order to clarify to what extent the allegations in the interpellation were true. He added: We want early elections, not because of the power it will give the JP but because we see it as a solution to the political crisis. We also believe that unless they are held without further delay they will no longer offer a solution.

Speaking on behalf of the government, Suleyman Demirel noted that the interpellation was an important institution for toppling the government but that he was sad to see that Turkey's problems were not stressed sufficiently during the debates. Pointing out that a vote of confidence would be held on Wednesday, Demirel said: At the beginning of the session I submitted a motion to the assembly chairmanship asking for a vote of confidence in the government--in accordance with Article 89 of the Constitution. If the assembly gives a vote of confidence we remain in power. Otherwise we go. It is very natural for governments to come and go. We must accept that.

Demirel reiterated that the country had several problems in November 1979 and that his government tried to solve them. He said: Do not think that these problems will be eliminated if we leave the government. They will become even worse.

Demirel charged that the interpellation debates showed that the RPP leader only wanted to come to power, not to solve Turkey's problems. He added: If you come to power how will you improve the economy? How will you prevent anarchy? How will you lower the prices of goods? How will you stop inflation? With what will you import the raw materials? Do you want to come to power or to practice magic? After the hot-air balloon you are now talking about a restoration dream? What will you restore with what?

Demirel also said that the RPP wanted to create a new crisis, not to come to power. [as heard] He added that if it came to power the RPP could give the country nothing but shortages, problems and suffering..

After the debates, the government's motion for a vote of confidence and the opposition's motion for a vote of no confidence were read at the National Assembly. Demirel's motion is as follows:

In accordance with Article 89 of the Constitution, I request the lofty assembly give a vote of confidence in the government at the end of the interpellation debates, since it is impossible to solve the present difficult problems of the country with a government [whose merit] is the subject of daily arguments.

Ecevit's motion says: So long as the present government remains in power the state's foundations, the essence of democracy, the nation's values will continue to be destroyed, the moral crisis will continue to be exacerbated, Turkey's peaceful and stable development will be prevented and our independence is being damaged. The state forces are being replaced by other forces. Security of life is being totally eliminated. We request a vote of no confidence in this government since it is obvious that the Council of Ministers headed by Suleyman Demirel remaining in power runs counter to our national interests.

Under the Constitution, the vote of confidence will be held on Wednesday, 2 July.

PARTY LEADERS DISCUSS NEED FOR RESTORATION GOVERNMENT

Ecevit-Erbakan Discussion

TA281508 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1300 GMT 28 Jun 80

[Text] RPP leader Bulent Ecevit and leader Necmettin Erbakan held a meeting today. The meeting, which was held at Erbakan's office in parliament, began at 1300 and lasted for 2 hours. In a statement after the meeting, Ecevit said that the two parties share the view that a new government to be formed should be a restoration government that will not aim at implementing the program of any party and will not bear the stamp of any party. Ecevit said: The new government to be formed should aim at restoring, at insuring security of life in general and peace during elections and at ending economic destruction. It should have defined goals and should remain in power a definite period. Erbakan said that he exchanged views with Ecevit on the situation in the country and on what kind of a restoration government can beformed to solve the current problems.

Erbakan on 'National Solution Government'

TA281915 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1600 GMT 28 Jun 80

[Text] NSP leader Erbakan has called on the political parties represented in parliament and on deputies to form a national solution government that will insue impartiality in the administration, that will safeguard national goals in foreign policy, that will not govern the country in accordance with IMF demands and that will aim at restoration. At a news conference at parliament, Erbakan criticized the 7-month government saying that, despite the letter of warning submitted by the NSP, anarchy has increased, the Turkish lira has been devalued upon IMF orders and banks and bankers have been encouraged toward an interest rate race by the recent decision to lift interest rate controls. Noting that the government was continuing its destructive foreign policy, Erbakan recalled that the foreign minister has reiterated that Turkey will apply for full membership in the Common Market before the end of this year. He noted that this step will be tantamount to melting Turkey in the Western Christian pot.

Noting that the NATO ministerial council session held in Ankara had not taken any serious steps toward establishing a balance between the pros and the cons, Erbakan said that the Turkish foreign minister held a meeting with his Greek counterpart today because NATO wished so.

Erbakan said that the JP group has not attended parliament since the debates concerning the interpellation began. He added that the JP wanted a recess of parliament and that it was not serious about its proposal for early elections. Recalling that the vote on the interpellation will be held on Wednesday, Erbakan noted that next week was a very important one and added: We have 4 more days before the vote on the interpellation, before the vote of confidence. Every hour every minute of this week is precious. We call on the RPP and the JP, we call on the parliament: Come and let us put an end to this Western destruction. Together let us form a national solution government. Let this government be formed with the (?respect) of the parliament. Let this government, as a restoration government, put aside party disputes and try to end this destruction in Turkey.

Noting that if the NSP proposal to form a national solution government is adopted the government can be toppled in a short time, Erbakan said that the NSP will neither blindly support the government nor will it topple the government without taking into consideration the possible threats such a move might create.

In reply to a question on whether the term national solution government meant the broad-based government--to be formed through an RPP, JP and NSP coalition--proposed by the RPP, Erbakan said: Arithmetic is necessary but not sufficient in parliament. The important issue in Turkey at the moment is not appearances and arithmetic but rather the mentality in power. We attach importance to mentality.

Turkes on NAP Participation

TA291803 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1600 GMT 29 Jun 80

[Excerpt] Nationalist Action Party [NAP] leader Alpaslan Turkes said that a government formed without the participation of the NAP cannot be called a national solution government. At a news conference in Ankara, Turkes said that, although the current government has various shortcomings which can be a source of criticism, it has also taken serious economic measures. Expressing his views on proposals regarding the formation of a national solution government excluding the NAP to replace the current government, Turkes said: The NAP is one of the four political parties represented in the Turkish Grand National Assembly. How can a national solution government be formed without taking this fact into account? You talk about a national solution and you exclude a party that has received a million votes. Then this government cannot be called national.

Noting that the Justice Party government was formed in accordance with the national will, Turkes described efforts exerted by RPP leader Bulent Ecevit to topple the current government and to come to power as attempts to crush the national will! Turkes added that attempts to create a government crisis while the nation was trying to overcome a period of crises can only be made by those who are trying to satisfy personal ambitions. He noted that the most suitable measure patriotic politicians can currently take is early elections.

RPP Agreement With NSP 'Solution'

TA301733 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1600 GMT 30 Jun 80

[Excerpts] RPP leader Bulent Ecevit said that by a national solution the NSP means a national foreign policy, respect for human rights and economic development brought about by national resources.

Ecevit added: These are principles which we cherish and which we were careful to abide by when we were in the government. Addressing the RPP joint group [of senators and deputies], Ecevit said that following the developments of last Saturday the chances of toppling the government had increased and that the ideas about the government to replace it had become clearer. Ecevit said that during his meeting with Erbakan they had agreed on the necessity and reasons for saving the country from the present government as soon as possible. He added that they also agreed on the aims of the government to be established. The RPP leader pointed out that during the meeting no unacceptable demand had been put forward as a condition.

NATO, Economic Plans Denounced

TA261134 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1000 GMT 26 Jun 80

[Text] The Seventh Congress of the Confederation of Revolutionary Worker Unions [DISK], which began in Istanbul yesterday, continued today. Ankara Mayor Ali Dincer addressed today's session, attended by 468 delegates. Noting that the government was implementing a capitalist system through its 25 January decisions, Dincer said that this implementation is completely crushing small artisans and toilers. Pointing out that toilers' problems should be viewed as a whole and that the problems of municipal workers were part of this whole, Dincer added that the system chosen by the sovereign circles was a capitalist one and that many workers were being fired in accordance with this system. Dincer said that the aim of those who instigated terrorism in Turkey was to dismantle democratic organizations and to prevent the unity of the left.

The deputy secretaries general of the World Labor Union Federation, and the World Labor Confederation and other foreign unionists are attending the DISK congress headed by Ertal Andas, the secretary general of the Municipal Service Workers Union [Genel-Is], and being held at the state theater building.

The fact that the NATO ministerial council meetings were held in Ankara was denounced at the DISK congress today. A decision was also made to protest the NATO meetings and a telegram on the issue was sent to Prime Minister Suleyman Demirel. News concerning the DISK congress was debated and a decision was also made to protest the TRT at today's session.

Basturk Walks Out

TA291942 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1600 GMT 29 Jun 80

[Text] Addressing the Seventh Congress of the Confederation of Revolutionary Worker Unions [DISK], which is continuing in Istanbul, DISK leader Abdullah Basturk said that his duty as the confederation's leader has ended. The results of the vote held at this afternoon's session on an amendment to the confederation's rules and regulations were contrary to Basturk's views. In a statement after the vote, Basturk said that the result of the vote should be considered as a vote of no confidence in him and that at this point his duty as the leader has ended. He then walked out of the hall. The leadership council adjourned the meeting until tomorrow.

A decision was made to move DISK headquarters to Ankara at today's session. Replying to criticism of the working report at this morning's session, Basturk called on the RPP and the social democratic unions affiliated with the Turkish Confederation of Labor to establish unity of action with DISK against fascism. Basturk said that fascism is becoming more organized in the country.

Noting that those who do not heed the call for unity of action against fascism will be held responsible in the fact of history, Basturk said that the only deterrent force against fascism was the organized power of the working class. Basturk noted that Turkey and the working class are faced with great dangers and that is the reason why the congress was convened 6 months in advance. The confederation's working report was unanimously approved at the congress.

[Excerpts] Abdullah Basturk has been reelected leader of the Confederation of Revolutionary Worker. Unions [DISK]. A proposal submitted by the leaders of DISK unions to the congress this morning was unanimously approved and it was decided that the results of yesterday's voting did not indicate a lack of confidence in Basturk. It was also decided to refer the proposals for amending the rules and regulations to a committee. Meanwhile, the leaders of the DISK unions jointly nominated Basturk as candidate for DISK leader. After Basturk was informed of the situation he participated in the congress--from which he has been absent since yesterday--and announced that he accepted the nomination. Basturk received 416 votes of the 454 delegates who participated in the voting and was thus reelected as leader.

VIGDIS FINNBOGADOTTIR ELECTED PRESIDENT OF ICELAND

WA300845 London REUTER in English 0702 GMT 30 Jun 80 [By Thorsteinn Thorarensen]

[Text] Reykjavik, June 30, REUTER--A woman was today elected president of Iceland. She is 50-year-old Vigdis Finnbogadottir, who narrowly beat a former university rector in the island's presidential poll.

Her election as head of state was assured when she won 41,423 votes, or 33.5 percent of the poll, with 95 percent of the returns declared.

Mrs Finnbogadottir, a divorcee who lives with an adopted daughter, is a leftist who is known to oppose NATO's presence in Iceland.

Her closest rival in the election, former University Rector Gudlaugur Thorvaldsson, conceded defeat after winning 40,029 votes, or 32.3 percent of the poll.

Mr Thorvaldsson, a strong NATO supporter who drew his support from the right, said: "I congratulate her, and I congratulate the nation with her."

In the early stages of vote counting, Mr Thorvaldsson jumped into the lead. But most of his votes came from the heavily populated areas around Reykjavik while Mrs Finnbogadottir's support was in rural areas.

The other two candidates were left trailing far behind. Former soccer star-turned-politician Albert Gudmundsson had won 25,000 votes or 20 percent of the poll and Iceland's former roving ambassador Petur Thorsteinsson 17,000 or 14 percent.

THATCHER, CARRINGTON PLAN EAST EUROPE VISITS

LD301145 London THE DAILY TELEGRAPH in English 28 Jun 80 p 32

[John Miller report: "Yugoslav Trip for Thatcher"]

[Text] Britain is poised to develop closer relations with East European communist countries and Mrs Thatcher is to pay an official visit to Yugoslavia in September.

Like President Carter last week, one of the prime minister's first actions will be to place a wreath on Tito's tomb and also publicly assure the new Yugoslav leadership of the West's continued support for its independent stand.

The government's heightened interest in Eastern Europe will be emphasised further in October when Lord Carrington, foreign secretary, is to go to Poland and Hungary, the two more "liberal" Warsaw Pact countries.

Whitehall is not expecting to be able dramatically to loosen the Soviet grip on its East European neighbours. But it has swung round to the view that Poland and Hungary should be encouraged to relax their systems, and develop as many contacts as possible with the West.

Mrs Thatcher was believed to have expressed interest in visiting Poland next year and despite the vicious propaganda attacks on her by the Soviet press, she would relish the opportunity to indulge in some frank talking with the Russian leadership.

But because of the Afghanistan situation it was not seriously thought there would be any high-level Anglo-Soviet contacts for a year or two.

SA CARNEIRO ON PORTUGAL'S BID TO JOIN EEC IN 1983

LD010755 Lisbon DIARIO DE NOTICIAS in Portuguese 20 Jun 80 pp 1, 3

[Eduaro Tell dispatch on Portuguese Prime Minister Francisco Sa Carneiro 19 June Brussels press conference: "We Plan EEC Membership in First Half of 1983"]

[Text] Brussels--"We are planning to join in the first half of 1983," Sa Carneiro said yesterday in Brussels during a press conference at the end of his official visit to this city and to the European Commission.

During his stay in the Belgian capital the prime minister, accompanied by the deputy prime minister and the secretary of state for European integration, was received by King Baudouin, Prime Minister Martens and Foreign Minister Nothomb and later, within the EEC context, by President of the European Commission Roy Jenkins and Deputy President Lorenzo Natali; he also met with other EEC leaders.

Sa Carneiro told journalists that the EEC regards Portugal's membership as positive, wants to accelerate negotiations and is sticking to the timetable envisaged, and revealed that Roy Jenkins proposed "informally associating Portugal with the evolution of EEC regulations and maintaining exchanges of viewpoints in the political, energy and industrial fields--all of which we accept."

Referring to the French president's remarks on 3 June, the prime minister said that "reflection on EEC regulations was not a precondition for membership" and that therefore "It does not affect membership." Sa Carneiro recalled Roy Jenkins' remarks at the end of the European Council meeting in Venice, when he said that the revision of the EEC's objectives must not be a reason for postponing membership, since this revision must be carried out before 1982. This revision is necessary, Sa Carneiro said, and Portugal's membership is becoming increasingly necessary.

In a remark that surprised journalists, partly because of its significance and to an extent also because it coincides with a recent comment by the British magazine THE ECONOMIST that "Europe is not Portugal's only option," Sa Carneiro said that it is up to Portugal to define its position on the basis of the EEC's internal evolution and the modifications to EEC regulations and "to review its decision, if appropriate." "However," he added, "we will abide by our political decision in favor of membership."

The prime minister said that the EEC's internal difficulties were the result of the economic crisis and that the escalation of international tensions was prompting the EEC to feel the need for a "joint foreign policy," as shown by the decision on the Middle East adopted at the Venice meeting.

"World political problems demand a political response from Europe--it is impossible to resolve them solely by means of a Common Market; that is why the countries of southern Europe must be involved in this analysis."

During the question and answer session with journalists, Sa Carneiro said, explaining the scope and significance of his remark about "a possible reconsideration of the membership decision," that this was "a theoretical hypothesis" that might come about, for instance, in the event of modifications to EEC regulations leading to a monetary contribution unacceptable to Portugal, a country whose per capita income is about half Spain's and 60 percent of Greece's. But, he added, "following my visit to the Belgian and Dutch capitals and to the European Commission, I am sure that this will not be the case."

Answering a journalist, the prime minister said that, although Portugal is an underdeveloped country, it is not asking the EEC to adopt specific or exceptional regulations for its membership, "which would conflict with our need and desire for membership."

At another juncture, referring to the difficulties which could emerge with regard to agriculture, Sa Carneiro said that the prices granted to farmers were similar to the EEC's and that Portugal would present an "agricultural document" specifying Portugal's position with regard to integrating its agriculture into "green Europe" at the coming meeting of the negotiating teams.

Discussing Portugal's possible "alternative" in the event of the failure of the EEC membership negotiations, the prime minister replied, at the insistence of another journalist, that emphasis had been placed on relations with the Arab countries--"we have just established relations with Saudi Arabia"--and Latin America, explaining that the development of relations with countries in other areas of the world would have a beneficial effect on membership.

Sa Carneiro also said that there was no globalization or interdependence between the Portuguese and Spanish membership applications since they have been dealt with separately. Referring to recent remarks by the Spanish foreign minister relating Spain's NATO membership to its timetable for EEC membership, Sa Carneiro said that as an observer he was not "shocked" to see Spain associating its EEC membership with entry into NATO, which confirmed, he said his opinion that political and defense issues will become more and more interlinked. "We want to see Spain involved in both the EEC and NATO," he added.

NATO SECRETARY GENERAL LUNS LEAVES TURKEY

TA291643 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1600 GMT 29 Jun 80

[Excerpt] NATO Secretary General Joseph Luns, who attended the NATO ministerial council spring meetings in Ankara, left Turkey by air at 1415 today. In a statement at Istanbul's Yesilkoy Airport, Luns said that the NATO meeting in Ankara had been very successful. Luns noted that in Ankara the alliance once more stressed its determination to defend the democratic institutions of the Western world and its culture against any possible attack. Luns met with Foreign Minister Hayrettin Erkmen at Yesilkoy Airport and conferred with him for some time.

NETHERLANDS FOREIGN MINISTER CALLS FOR MORE CONSULTATIONS BY U.S.

LD011513 Amsterdam DE VOLKSKRANT in Dutch 25 Jun 80 p 7

[DE VOLKSRANT correspondent's report: "United States Must Consult Europe More"]

[Excerpts] The Hague--Foreign Minister van der Klaauw is dissatisfied with the way in which the United States involves the European NATO partners in its decisions. The United States plays a leading role in the alliance but that does not mean that Europe has to follow anything, the minister said yesterday during the Second Chamber debate on East-West relations.

Van der Klaauw stressed that consultations among allies must be intensive enough to enable them to reach a united policy. This consultation is not frequently lacking, he noted. However, Van der Klaauw said, the United States also sees the need for better consultation.

Regarding the Dutch stance on the deterioration in East-West relations, the minister said he considers it extremely important to keep lines of communication open. Aside from contacts with the Soviet Union the minister sees more to be gained in contacts with the East European countries. We can try to find possibilities for building bridges between us and these countries. I intend to do this during the forthcoming visits to The Hague by my Polish and Hungarian counterparts, Van der Klaauw said.

The minister also expressed Dutch support for West German Chancellor Schmidt's mission to Moscow. Schmidt is considering a freeze on the December NATO decision to produce and deploy new nuclear weapons. By so doing he wants to give as much chance as possible to starting talks on arms limitation in the period before the weapons are deployed, in other words by the end of 1981. According to Van der Klaauw, Schmidt's idea is in keeping with the December decision itself.

BELGIUM'S POSWICK FAVORS 'ACTIVE' DEFENSE

LD260927 Barcelona LA VANGUARDIA in Spanish 19 Jun p 23

[Andres Garrigo interview in Brussels with Belgian Defense Minister Charles Poswick: "Need for Spain To Join NATO"--date not given]

[Excerpt] Brussels, 18 Jun--Belgian Defense Minister Charles Poswick believes that Spain's future NATO membership "would not be a bad thing" since with a view to deterring a potential aggressor it would be useful to increase the number of allies contributing to the defense of shared objectives. Furthermore, membership of an alliance is cheaper than organizing independent national defense.

In exclusive remarks made to this writer, the defense minister of the country that hosts the NATO headquarters explained that in the alliance all decisions are collective and that the subject of Spain's membership has not yet been discussed by NATO bodies. [paragraph continues]

He assumes, however, that there will be no opposition from any of the 15 member-states since Spain is now considered "a bastion of Western civilization and democracy and its rapprochement to the defense area that embraces it would be very positive."

[Question] One of the arguments raised against Spain's membership of the alliance is its excessive cost. What is Belgium's experience in this regard?

[Answer] With regard to NATO membership? The policy of independence or neutrality is much more expensive. We experienced this in two world wars during which we tried--in vain but at very high cost--to maintain a neutral stance. Let the following fact suffice: When we were invaded by the Germans in May 1940 Belgium was spending 25-30 percent of its national budget on defense and maintained an army of 600,000 men. Our army now has only 95,000 men, including the auxiliary services, and defense accounts for only 6 percent of the overall budget. Even so, we feel more secure than in 1940 because we are members of an alliance. It seems to me, therefore, that the argument in favor of neutrality is now rather rash, to say the least.

[Question] Nevertheless, you have complained about the army's lack of resources and implied that you would even resign if the situation became untenable and your generals resigned, as has been stated.

[Answer] The situation is not yet that dramatic. Our military effort is not inconsiderable--over 80 billion francs a year for a country with a population of 9 million. The problem is that in view of the economic crisis every ministry is being asked to cut spending by 2.2 percent. The Defense Ministry is the one least able to make savings because it consumes more gasoline, which continues to rise in price, than any other. For the air force alone, fuel accounts for 60 percent of its budget. The justice, education and foreign ministries, and so forth, hardly have an energy problem.

[Question] Do you not think that one way of saving would be to abandon the army's professionalization (53 percent of its budget is spent on pay) and return to the draft, which would save thousands of young people from unemployment and enable its pilots to fly?

[Answer] The professionalization plan was adopted during my predecessors' time and it is now very difficult to turn back. Furthermore, the government agreement forbids exceeding the number of 95,000 men (and women) and extending the period of national service, which is 10 months in Belgium and 8 months with our troops in Germany. This agreement has the final objective, though without a fixed date, of just one soldier per family and 6 months' service. This could only be changed if the public's feelings change in view of the international tension.

[Question] Following the Afghan invasion there has been more and more talk about the threat of Soviet chemical and bacteriological weapons. The Assembly of the West European Union recommended a month ago that the NATO countries make an effort to achieve a balance in this field with the Warsaw Pact. There are also plans to build collective shelters for civilians, which would also serve as a deterrent against nuclear attack. How do you view the problem?

[Answer] It seems to me that active defense is always preferable to passive defense. There is one form of deterrence that is much cheaper than building expensive shelters which, I believe, will never be used. It is to deploy the new NATO missiles in response to the threat of the Soviet SS-20's.

[Question] But Belgium has not yet approved the deployment on its own territory of the 48 cruise missiles allocated to it. When will you make this decision?

[Answer] If it were up to me it would already have been made. My party (Liberal) is totally in favor of the "Euromissiles," which it considers essential to our security, but as you know the government is composed of six parties....

STRAUSS ATTACKS SCHMIDT ON MOSCOW VISIT

LD012038 Hamburg DPA in German 2019 GMT 1 Jul 80

[Text] Bonn--CDU/CSU chancellor candidate Franz Josef Strauss has accused Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt of having "over-reached" himself with his visit to Moscow. On the ARD television program "Report," he said tonight that if anyone could negotiate with the Soviets on a reduction of its medium-range rockets and on a Soviet withdrawal from Afghanistan, this could only be done by the great world power which is the United States. For the Federal Republic there was just the one interest: to go together with the allies, primarily with the Americans.

Strauss admitted that he himself would not have succeeded in coming back from Moscow with concrete results. But he had never tried for an invitation from the Soviets. Nor should Schmidt have gone to the Soviet Union. In polite terms, the whole visit looked like electoral support from Moscow.

FRANKFURTER RUNDSCHAU ON SCHMIDT'S TASK IN MOSCOW

DW011006 Frankfurt FRANKFURTER RUNDSCHAU in German 1 Jul 80 p 3

[Commentary by Moscow correspondent signed Yr.: "Like a State Visit"]

[Text] Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt's visit to Moscow has begun. The most varied expectations and sometimes fears, depending on the political position, go with him. This is the first time following the invasion by Soviet troops of Afghanistan that such a high-ranking Western statesman has come to the Soviet capital. This alone is a political event which has certain potential difficulties. The fact that French President Valery Giscard d'Estaing on the occasion of his Warsaw meeting with Soviet state and party chief Leonid Brezhnev established initial new East-West contacts does not alter the fact that Schmidt will be facing a difficult task in Moscow.

This results from the fact that Schmidt will have to represent Western solidarity with the alliance in Moscow as well as German interests. On the other hand, however, his Soviet hosts ought to be greatly interested in torpedoing the current American policy toward the Soviet Union. This may look occasionally as if Moscow is using all its leverage to weaken the leading role of the United States by making offers to Western Europe. Moscow certainly pursues more than mere tactics in its attempt to save the detente process on the old continent despite the Afghanistan events. The greatest danger for world peace still emanates from a direct collision in Europe, where the greatest and most perfect military potentials in the world face each other.

The fact that aging and ailing Leonid Brezhnev decided to meet the Federal chancellor, who is lower in rank, at the airport indicates both aspects of Soviet policy: campaign and concern, simultaneously. Some offers will certainly be made in the course of the talks with regard to intensified German-Soviet economic cooperation. It will only be seen at the end of this visit, however, whether Schmidt will be able to bring home something concrete in the political field as well.

PAPERS COMMENT ON SCHMIDT STATEMENTS IN MOSCOW

DW011030 Cologne Deutschlandfunk Network in German to East and West Germany 0505 GMT 1 Jul 80

[Press review on Federal Chancellor Schmidt and Foreign Minister Genscher's visit to Moscow]

[Excerpt] AUGSBURGER ALLGEMEINE writes: Helmut Schmidt does not lack firmness but much rather the favourable moment which might be considered by the masters in the Kremlin to be opportune for choosing the chancellor of the Federal Republic as the receiver of an offer to the West. This is because distrust within the Western camp, particularly by Moscow's real interlocutor, the United States, regarding Schmidt's self-imposed mission may have a tempering effect on any possible concessions by the Kremlin.

The expectations of a possible success of the chancellor's visit should not be exaggerated, says BREMER NACHRICHTEN, adding: Spectacular successes are hardly possible anyway. Therefore, the statements made by opposition politicians must be termed almost careless which demand that the result of the chancellor's visit be the withdrawal of the Russians from Afghanistan as well as the end of the Soviet missile armament. Schmidt strives for both. He is aware of the fact that such a success is possible only at the end of a lengthy road of negotiations. Realists have no doubt that at this point East and West are still at the beginning of this road.

MANNHEIMER MORGEN states: The chancellor's speech in the Kremlin yesterday did not reveal anything that might justify the distrust of the opposition. Schmidt demanded with sufficient clarity that talks be held without preconditions on the issue of medium-range missiles as well as the withdrawal of all Soviet troops from Afghanistan, as had been agreed with his alliance partners. This will now have to be discussed with the Kremlin leadership, and it would be advisable to wait with praise or criticism at least until the negotiations are ended. However, we will have to assume that the Bonn party camps are determined to stick to their respective prejudices.

The KASSEL HESSISCH/NIEDERSAECHSISCHE ALLGEMEINE writes: Although we are not doing justice to the great moment, the temptation is great to say it in the language of bowlers: Helmut Schmidt is knocking down all the pins. In direct and no uncertain terms he told his noble hosts why he had come to Moscow. He wants to have a double proof of their good will. The Soviet leadership is to agree, first, to a withdrawal from Afghanistan and, second, to negotiations without preconditions on medium-range missiles. This is precisely the line agreed upon by the Western allies at the Venice summit and at the Ankara NATO meeting.

KOELNER STADT-ANZEIGER comments: What had already become manifest prior to this 2-day working visit seems to have been confirmed in the first few hours: The Soviets would like to discuss economic cooperation only. On the one hand this is in accordance with their material interests, but on the other probably also with the calculation that if a state like the Federal Republic were to hold talks in Moscow as if nothing had happened this would not fail to impress the world public.

GENSCHER INTERVIEWED IN ANKARA ABOUT NATO MEETING

DW270933 Cologne Deutsche Welle in German to Europe 1730 GMT 26 Jun 80

[Reporter Dieter Jepsen-Foege interview with Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher in Ankara; date not given--recorded]

[Text] [Question] Foreign Minister Genscher, you said at the beginning of the conference that you expect a mood signaling determination and cohesion to emanate from Ankara. Was such signal given?

[Answer] Yes, absolutely. It was made obvious at Ankara that the Western alliance is determined to implement its decisions, and that the Western alliance is also determined to contribute toward stabilizing security and safeguarding peace in the world through a worldwide peace strategy.

[Question] What do you consider significant regarding Afghanistan? In particular, you have stressed that this is not merely a matter of East-West relations, but also a matter of East-South relations. Could you explain that as well as the reaction of your ministerial colleagues?

[Answer] The German approach, which we have put forward from the very beginning in many debates in the Bundestag, is that the Soviet intervention in Afghanistan is not merely a West-East problem, but also an East-South problem. In other words, it is a conflict between the Soviet Union and those states making up the Third World, particularly the nonaligned states. I believe that the reaction of the ASEAN states, the reaction of the Islamic conference in particular--states which were among the 104 countries that condemned the Soviet intervention in a UN General Assembly resolution--shows that they see this intervention as a challenge.

[Question] Do you believe, on the other hand, that the position of the West vis-a-vis the Third World has been strengthened?

[Answer] The West's relations with the Third World are in a new and positive developing stage. Relations between the nonaligned and the West have been furdened by the justified demand of the Third World for a fast decolonization process. This process has more or less come to an end. The main attention today is being given to cooperation as equal partners with the Third World, a policy that has been strongly pursued by the Federal Government. This cooperation is meant to contribute toward strengthening the independence and sovereignty of our partners in the Third World. Indeed, it results in a positive approach by the West. However, it does not mean that we expect these countries to take a pro-Western attitude, we respect their right to be independent.

[Question] Mr Minister, the result of the last NATO Council of Ministers conference in Brussels held in December was the so-called dual decision, meaning the decision on closing the arms gap and on the offer of negotiations to the Soviet Union. Has anything new developed in this respect in Ankara? Has this decision been confirmed or modified?

[Answer] This decision has been reaffirmed in all its parts. We are determined to do what is necessary for our security. We are determined to make every effort to achieve balance on as low as level as possible through negotiations. Now it is up to the soviet union to react at long last to this broad offer of negotiations dating back to December 1979.

[Question] You had talks with your Turkish and Greek counterparts which presumably also dealt with Greece's reintegration in NATO's military wing. Have you made any headway?

[Answer] These two ministers will be meeting Saturday. It is my impression that both ministers approach these talks with good will. They are aware of the great difficulties involved. This is why we must not overrate the potential results of such talks. Yet the fact that the two allies countries meet with great mutual respect and with the good will which I have mentioned should at least provide a ray of hope.

[Question] Your Greek counterpart was disappointed because Greece is supposed to receive from the Federal Republic only about one-tenth of the special military aid granted to Turkey.

[Answer] Well, I made it clear to my Greek colleague that strengthening Turkey's defence capability is in the interest of all alliance partners.

[Question] How did you, on the other hand, make it clear to you Turkish counterpart why--and this is an entirely different question--the Federal Republic will introduce visa requirements for Turkey, India and Bangladesh?

[Answer] We made a decision solely in the case of Turkey because this case, which involves a friendly ally and a country associated with the EC, requires a different approach than does that toward the two others. In this issue the Federal Government is guided by the objective of preventing our tested friendly relations for being burdened by a misuse of the right to asylum in our country.

[Question] Did you meet with understanding for this stance?

[Answer] The talks we had were quite friendly and much understanding was exhibited.

COMMENTARIES ON NATO MEETING HELD IN ANKARA

FRANKFURTER RUNDSCHAU on Arms Gap

OW261205 Frankfurt FRANKFURTER RUNDSCHAU in German 26 Jun 80 p 3

[Article signed HHG: "To Be Shelved?"]

[Text] If there had been any discord at all, everything is settled now between President Carter and Federal Chancellor Schmidt. This is the official approach.

As many other things in life, this is a matter of belief. But even in the best case the chancellor's very small leeway in the Moscow talks in medium-range arms has become even smaller.

At least the mistrust which the American President has shown to the German allies can be considered as having evaporated for lack of substance. But mistrust is not an American monopoly. NATO decided last year to counteract the Soviet superiority in the field of Medium-range arms with a new system; but the other part of the decisions, which is of equal value, mentioned negotiations of the United States with the Soviet Union on limiting the nuclear medium-range systems.

The former state minister in the chancellor's office, Wischnewski, said at that time together with many others that these negotiations must be handled by both sides in such a way that a "zero" solution should be possible; in other words: complete renunciation of these arms.

It was lucky for many people that the Soviets have refused until this day to enter these negotiations; nobody can say that the United States particularly will feel sorry about this Soviet refusal. The impression prevails much rather that the interest in the second part of the decision to close the arms gap is very small. Muskie had just said it again very clearly. The allies had decided to proceed smoothly with the agreed construction program. No special efforts of Washington can be seen to make the Soviets give up their resistance against the negotiations. Why else did Foreign Minister Genscher remind the people in Ankara of the two parts of the decision to close the arms gap?

The Federal chancellor has been suspected in past months to intend to water down the decision to close the arms gap. One must ask oneself how it should be called if an important part of a NATO decision is simply supposed to be shelved?

SUDDEUTSCHE ZEITUNG on Unity

DW271114 Munich SUEDDEUTSCHE ZEITUNG in German 27 Jun 80 p 4

[Commentary signed Schr.: "NATO Remains Hard"]

[Text] Following President Carter, the NATO foreign ministers have offered the Soviet Union negotiations. But they raised some conditions for these negotiations which the Soviets will hardly accept: withdrawal of their troops from Afghanistan and NATO's adherence to the decision on closing the arms gap. Apart from individual talks with the Soviet leaders, such as those of the chancellor in Moscow, it is unlikely that there will be any East-West negotiations. Furthermore, these negotiations hardly depend on whether it is possible to find a quick formula (and the proper man in Kabul) for a political solution in Afghanistan or an incentive for persuading the Soviets to rescind their nyet to NATO's offer of disarmament talks; pending the U.S. elections not only Carter but even international politics is condemned to immobility.

And yet, the offers and declarations of will on the part of the Western powers are more than just obligatory gestures. They serve, first of all, to close their own ranks again. During this process it has come to light that, similar to the Warsaw Pact, the predominant power in the Western alliance has put and end to the attempts of the small partners to stay aloof from the conflict of the great powers. It is intended to make the wedge-driving business hard for Moscow. This also tends to create a framework for the chancellor's talks with Brezhnev.

However, at the same time, the Afghanistan issue remains on the agenda. The attempt by the Soviets to make it fade into the background by means of its gesture of a partial troop pullout has thus been foiled. Moscow's willfull interpretation of detente policy is not accepted, nor are its alleged security requirements. What remains unanswered is the question as to what Moscow really plans to do in Afghanistan and to what extent it is interested in breaking out of the isolation it brought on itself and which it has admitted in the meantime. For finding this out, however, this summer has been lost.

Weinstein on Meeting

DW301214 Frankfurt FRANKFURTER ALLGEMEINE in German 30 Jun 80 p 3

[Adalbert Weinstein commentary: "Genscher's Appearance in Ankara Produced Approval for Schmidt's Moscow Visit"]

[Excerpt] Ankara, 29 June--German foreign policy at present looks like the Tour de France. After the first leg, Ankara, it will now be Moscow; prior to that it was Venice and a dozen other conferences. No doubt can exist that Genscher won the yellow shirt [leader of the Tour de France race] in the Turkish capital. He dominated the political scene, and his appearance achieved for Bonn what was planned: agreement of all allies to a meeting between Schmidt and Brezhnev.

The smiling foreign minister's thoughts were already in the Kremlin when he interpreted the result of the meeting--"far-reaching agreement with regard to political and military strategy." He had not merely the Moscow ticket in his pocket; the allies had agreed in addition that the ostpolitik of their partner, the Federal Republic, contributed to "safeguarding peace." Nothing characterizes the euphoric mood of the German delegation better than the quick departure from Ankara. The matador hurried away, inspired over the next event.

But a departing person in anticipation of forthcoming events tends to forget what he has left behind. U.S. Secretary of State Muskie left the Atlantic conference not quite as content as Genscher. Muskie is a dynamic man, the senator an experienced politician who is not prim when it comes to action. He who has prevailed in American domestic politics is not afraid of any partner in foreign policy. In numerous talks with his Atlantic colleagues he found out quickly what direction the Europeans were tending toward: in the hostage affair to lip service; in matters of sanctions against Iran to restraint; in matters of Middle East problems they took up a position of their own which calls into question Carter's only foreign policy success--Camp David.

Muskie was also forced to realize that the European allies do not share American ideas about refusing to supply high technology items to the Soviets because of Afghanistan. In addition, Washington and its friends on the old continent do not always have the same opinion about the Madrid CSCE followup conference. Since there is no other Western suggestion to meet a Soviet disarmament proposal, they agreed in Ankara on the French plan for a "European disarmament conference," which is supposed to be prepared in the fall in Madrid. What is called "the creation of confidence-building measures," is thereafter to become a kind of duty.

However, America is in a completely different strategic mood than the Europeans. Washington wants to increase its armament and catch up militarity with what it has neglected for a long time. Therefore, the American Muskie meant "business" when he talked of strategic parity. However, the Europeans wanted to negotiate as much and as often as possible. So Muskie did not at all find a sound Atlantic world in Ankara. It was therefore probably not a coincidence that he mentioned to a discussion partner that there had once been a Mansfield in America. Mansfield was the senator who always threatened to withdraw troops from Europe whenever American-European relations were not the best. Muskie said that he had heard something recently in Congress about such sentiments.

The political mood of the Turkish hosts ought not be forgotten in connection with the new event, the German-Soviet meeting in Moscow. The Turkish problems have been handled politically only together with others. The conference offered an opportunity for talks between Ankara and America. But the Atlantic meeting offered to those who wanted to see it a view of Turkish realities. Seen militarily, this country is certainly a far advanced bastion of the West. It belongs to Asia. It thinks and acts differently. Turkey has "burning borders." The Turks must protect themselves against two states of the Warsaw Pact--the Soviet Union and Bulgaria. They are neighbors of Iran, and their special economic situation demands that this border be "left open." Ankara can never join sanctions against Tehran. National interests almost call for good contacts. Arrangements must also be made with Iraq and Syria. Therefore, Turkey can never pursue a Mideastern policy adjusted solely to American interests. This does not mean, however, that Ankara cannot be a good NATO partner. But the Turks must be granted a special status in the alliance. Ankara cannot complement the American strategic concentration in the Indian Ocean by supplying land bases. The Turks can make NATO bases available, but not increase the number of them, otherwise, they would lose their political freedom of action in their own strategic zone.

LE MONDE EXAMINES U.S. 'TURNABOUT' ON AFGHANISTAN

LD011147 Paris LE MONDE in French 26 Jun 80 p 3

[Maurice Delarue dispatch: "The Attitude Newly Adopted by the President Has Caused Puzzlement in Washington]

[Text] Washington--Mr Carter's statement on Afghanistan in Belgrade has certainly caused some puzzlement here. Prior to the President's departure for Europe a firm tone was used in Washington: Mr Carter was going to call to order some Europeans who were excessively inclined to be either intimidated or captivated by the Soviets. Today he holds out--or almost holds out--his hand to the Kremlin. In any case, as soon as he made his statement his entourage started to issue many clarifications: What he said was not really anything new, he was making conciliatory statements back in February... and so forth. Clarifications have now become part of the American routine. Obliged to perform a tightrope act until the election, the President deems it necessary to correct daily the views which he expressed the previous day.... However, what is said is said.

In fact, the idea of a "transitional arrangement implemented along with a prompt withdrawal of all Soviet troops" and leading to the formation of a government acceptable to the Afghan people is not new, since Mr Giscard d'Estaing suggested it to Brezhnev in Warsaw. However, the U.S. President has never previously advocated any transitional arrangement in such precise terms.

Referring to this, the New York TIMES on 24 June published an editorial stating similar views which has attracted considerable attention. It emphasizes that a "genuine" Soviet withdrawal is bound to be "gradual" and expresses the hope that the Afghan "swamp" in which the USSR is getting bogged down will be conducive to negotiations rather than to "blind confrontation." While urging the Soviet Union to abide by rules of good behavior with respect to the West, the editorialist adds: "In return, the West in general and the White House in particular must let the Russians know three things: First, that the Americans will help to ensure Afghanistan's neutrality if Moscow forsakes the use of force; second, that the United States is willing to negotiate conditions for a mutual reduction in Soviet-American competition throughout the world; and, third, that negotiations on the control of nuclear arms and security in Europe could be resumed simultaneously with talks on the above-mentioned subjects."

Obviously--and Mr Carter is supported on this point by all his European allies--any "arrangement" can be "transitional" only if it forms an integral part of an overall solution including the total withdrawal of Soviet troops and not what a Washington POST cartoonist makes a huge bear terrorizing a tiny Afghan announce, namely a "total partial withdrawal." It would be up to any negotiators to agree on the various stages of a final solution.

What has prompted Mr Carter to make what, despite clarifications, has so far looked very much like yet another turnabout?

The unanimity which he found among the Europeans in Venice is undoubtedly partly responsible for this. As early as the beginning of the year the EEC Nine reached the conclusion at their meeting in Rome that it would be advisable to leave an honorable way out for the USSR in the form of a neutral Afghanistan. Furthermore, despite official denials, the Americans may have thought that the announcement of the withdrawal of some Soviet units revealed a state of mind in the Kremlin which was worth investigating.

From the military viewpoint, this withdrawal is not taken seriously. Both the State Department and the Pentagon estimate the number of troops withdrawn from Afghanistan in the course of the week at 5,000-6,000 men. There are an estimated 30,000 Soviet troops concentrated on its border with Afghanistan. Even if the Soviets withdrew 108 tanks, as they say they did, seven or eight times as many tanks remain in Afghanistan. The Americans seem to believe that the Soviets have at the very most been withdrawing some heavy units in order to replace them with light units more suitable for guerrilla warfare. Politically, however, the publicity given to the withdrawal could indicate that the Kremlin is trying to appear as a victor with a view to negotiating a satisfactory arrangement. After all, this is not the first time that an army has proclaimed the battle won in order to be able to pack up in an orderly fashion. At any rate, this hypothesis is worth checking.

As for the results of the Venice summit on energy, they have so far caused less stir. However, the policy pursued by the President, who has shown consistency in this sphere, has come up against serious resistance.

At the very moment when Mr Carter, together with his six partners, was deciding to reduce oil consumption by developing coal production and nuclear energy, his supporters on the committee responsible for drafting the Democratic Party's platform embarked on a path leading in the opposite direction. Until then Mr Carter's friends on the committee had carried the day easily. However, when on Monday Senator Kennedy's friends seemed at the point of having a nuclear moratorium and the principle of the demolition of nuclear powerplants adopted, Mr Carter's supporters deemed it more prudent to negotiate a compromise which reads: "As alternative fuel becomes available, we will do away with reactors in an orderly manner." This formula is not very binding, but it nonetheless indicates that the nuclear path agreed on in Venice is not deemed electorally advantageous.

As for doubling coal production in 6 years, this has aroused much skepticism. "This is an old chestnut," the New York TIMES remarked on Monday, recalling that it dates from Mr Nixon's "independence project" which has remained a dead letter for years. Nonetheless, this objective is believed to be perfectly feasible technically as far as the United States is concerned, but many obstacles will have to be overcome in the economic and political spheres. Electrical companies will be unable to convert oil-fired powerplants; coal companies will try to take advantage of the situation to have legislation relating to mines and the use of coal modified, ecologists are afraid of pollution and so forth. [paragraph continues]

But Mrs Holmes, vice chairman of the coal producers' association, has nonetheless stated that "if the demand is really there, we will be able to double the production."

At present, American mining capacity amounts to 900 million tons per year, and production in 1980 will amount only to 800 million tons at most.

L'HUMANITE REBUTS MEDIA 'CAMPAIGN' ON AFGHANISTAN

LD011207 Paris L'HUMANITE in French 20 Jun 80 p 9

[Max Zins article: "Afghanistan: Psychological Warfare and the Truth"]

[Text] The "operation Afghanistan" which has been organized by all the radio and television channels and continued by the printed press started precisely on 9 June.

Everything indicates that it has been a trumped-up operation without any verified or serious information on the actual situation in Afghanistan being obtained. In any case, this has been confirmed by the testimony provided by Jacques Coubard, L'HUMANITE's special correspondent in Kabul.

Most of the "news" has been announced in the conditional tense--a conditional tense which, after being repeated dozens of times without being contradicted, has consequently taken the place of assertions unsupported by evidence. Almost all sources quoted have been "travelers returning from Kabul," "information originating in New Delhi" and, mostly, seldom specified or authenticated and often "Western" "diplomatic sources."

The campaign itself has included some very wild contradictions. For instance, on 9 June (the first day of the operation) we were told that Kabul was on the point of falling into rebel hands. The situation, LE MATIN wrote on 9 June, appeared "catastrophic" for the Soviet Army and "fierce fighting" was apparently taking place "at Kabul's gates." "It seems," LE MONDE wrote on 10 June, that "something unthinkable is taking place and that Kabul is being threatened by a mass attack by the mojahedin." On the following day, the same press asserted exactly the opposite: "Some 20,000 Rebels Have Apparently Been Encircled by the Soviet Army" was the headline printed in LE MONDE on 11 June, for instance. Let us agree that history has seldom witnessed such spectacular military reversals....

Furthermore, the media as a whole have resorted to blatant lies. The American State Department itself later announced in Washington that the Soviet Army had not increased its manpower in Afghanistan in recent weeks. Therefore, on the strength of what sources was LE MATIN able to assert on 9 June that "the Soviet Union has summoned fresh troops which are daily arriving in Kabul..."? What entitled LE NOUVEAU JOURNAL to print the following headline on 11 June: "The Russians Are Sending 10,000 Men as Reinforcements to Kabul"? On the basis of what sources were the print and broadcast media--with the exception of L'HUMANITE and the communist press--able to assert that "20,000 rebels" threatened Kabul? Where did this figure come from? As early as 12 and 13 June it was confirmed--but this time on the basis of precisely stated evidence (a West German journalist referred to by name)--that this figure was completely false and even that no activity was taking place around Kabul which could justify such misleading information or the size of the figures quoted.

Why was "operation Afghanistan" started?

It is impossible not to compare the date when it was launched with the date of the renewal of the Afghan and Soviet governments' proposals for a negotiated political settlement.

At the beginning of June, these proposals were becoming increasingly widely known. For instance, on 5 June LE MONDE printed the following headline: "It Is Possible To Ensure a Settlement Through Negotiations," quoting statements by the Soviet foreign minister. On the previous day, France-Inter radio broadcast information on the subject in its morning news bulletin. Following the Indian foreign minister's visit to Moscow, the press had to report these proposals.

Furthermore, public opinion became increasingly aware of the diplomatic activities which were taking place. Countries which previously had some reservations with respect to the Government of the Afghan Republic readjusted their policy. On behalf of the nonaligned countries, Fidel Castro increased his efforts to achieve a political solution to the problem. Even the conference of ministers from Islamic countries adopted an attitude which marked a retreat from its attitude in January 1980--it agreed to meet representatives of the Afghan People's Democratic Party. If Kabul were on the point of "falling," as the pack of radio, television and print press (from LE MATIN to L'AURORE and including LE MONDE journalists) asserted without any proof, would Islamic countries hostile to Kabul have chosen that moment to engage in discussions with Kabul?

In fact, it seems that the warmongers are now facing an increasing number of difficulties, at a time when imperialism would like to hinder any move toward a political solution in Afghanistan. This is undoubtedly one of the reasons for a propaganda operation simultaneously carried out in France and other Western countries. "Lie, lie"--even with the grotesque aspect of the latest edition of PARIS-MATCH which saw in the Kabul bazaar soldiers from the Soviet contingent admiring..."products of the consumer society" (you had to think of it in one of the poorest countries in the world)--and some of your lies will always stick.... You know the proverb and realize its sinister implications.

True, once dismantled and analyzed, the "operation" is bound to lose its credibility. For the time being, however, it confuses and disturbs public opinion (because, among other things, of its contradictory aspects). This is what the public (radio and television) and the private media have recently been engaging in on a massive scale instead of performing their task of supplying information. And it is against this that we must remain vigilant, with a view to getting back to the root of the problem--seeking a political solution in Afghanistan based on a guaranteed halt to all external interference in the domestic affairs of the Afghan Democratic Republic, following which Soviet military aid to the Afghan Government could cease at that government's request.

LE MONDE WEIGHS PROSPECTS FOR UPCOMING EUROPEAN CONFERENCES

LD020819 Paris LE MONDE in French 27 Jun 80 p 6

[Michel Tatu dispatch: "The Western Countries Want Europe's Military Problems To Be Discussed as a Priority at the Madrid Meeting"]

[Excerpt] Ankara--Was the biannual NATO meeting which ended uneventfully in Ankara this Thursday, 26 June, not superfluous after the Venice meeting, which had already discussed major international policy questions? Why debate among 15 countries what has already been debated among 7 at a higher level? Although public interest was visibly blunted, these questions were scarcely raised by the diplomats at their 2-day meeting in the Turkish capital. Afghanistan has probably been at the center of many meetings in the past few weeks, but this was the first time that the Atlantic Council had met since the 27 December invasion. Furthermore, the Ankara meeting was the last before the start of the Madrid meeting, which is to continue the CSCE held in Helsinki 5 years ago. This East-West exercise falls within NATO's normal sphere of competence.

Although some countries, including France, raised the question a few months ago of whether there was any point in holding this Madrid meeting following the invasion of Afghanistan, everybody now seems agreed that it will take place. It will begin on 11 November, will take a break at Christmas and start again at the end of January 1981 after the possible inauguration of a new U.S. administration.

The Western countries also agree that the meeting should debate Europe's military problems as a priority. There can be no question, the French side is saying in particular, of giving the Soviets free reign to put forward proposals on disarmament which are as vague as they are ambitious. However, since the only plan existing in the West is the one put forward by Paris, this plan is being backed by Paris' partners "with renewed conviction," Mr Francois-Poncet was able to note.

Let us recall the broad outlines of this plan: The ultimate objective is to convene a conference on disarmament in Europe which would limit conventional weapons from the Atlantic to the Urals. Since this is bound to be a long-term goal--the Eastern camp in particular wants to include nuclear armaments--the conference on disarmament in Europe should initially be given a limited objective which will be the subject of a "mandate" to be discussed in Madrid. The 35 member countries would agree on "confidence-building measures" intended to prevent surprise attacks (according to the plan's promoters, this is particularly necessary after what we have witnessed in Afghanistan). Such measures were mentioned in the Helsinki final act and were partially implemented: Observers from one camp witnessed some military exercises by the other, troop movements above a certain threshold were previously notified and so forth.

This time the conference will apparently be asked to go further; the confidence-building measures will apparently be more ambitious, their application obligatory and no longer voluntary, and finally they would apply to the whole of Europe--in other words as far as the Urals--whereas the USSR territory covered by the previous agreements does not go beyond a 250-km strip along its border. Moscow is expected to put up strong resistance to this point, but there seems to be a consensus in the Alliance on adopting this program. Only the Americans are still showing some reservations about stressing all this at a time when their public opinion is being asked to support a vast rearmament program. Mr Muskie raised this aspect of U.S. internal--and electoral--policy with his colleagues.

The new U.S. secretary of state, who was making his first appearance before his Atlantic peers, demonstrated the oratorical skills of the senator he once was. Speaking without notes, he spoke ironically about the problems of being a "superpower" and indirectly criticized his European interlocutors on two points: their refusal to stop transfers of technology to the USSR and their attempts to settle by declaration in the Middle East what, in his view, can only be settled by difficult negotiations. A partly forgotten threat was brandished in passing: That of the Mansfield Amendment, under which Senator Mansfield asked some 10 years ago for a large reduction in U.S. troops in Europe. Mr Muskie revealed that he has heard this idea raised again in the corridors of Congress.

For their part, the French preferred to stress areas of agreement among the allies--not to say points on which their partners have come round to their way of thinking. For instance, several participants portrayed the Afghan problem not only as an East-West quarrel but an East-South quarrel (between the communist bloc and the Muslim countries--an idea for which France had been reproached at the beginning of the year. Similarly, according to Mr Francois-Poncet everybody is now agreed that dialogue and a firm line can go hand in hand.

Can these areas of agreement result in increased consultation? Some people are thinking of developing the system of four-power meetings between the United States, France, FRG and Britain which has sometimes given rise to abortive plans (the meeting proposed by Bonn in January but rejected by France) and sometimes to fortuitous meetings (in Vienna last month, for the anniversary of the Austrian State Treaty) but which, in any case, is reflected at the "four-power dinner" held before each biannual NATO session, in principle to discuss problems facing Berlin and Germany. Could such informal meetings be held more often? This question seems to have been raised by some members, but no decision has yet been made.

EXTREMIST GROUP CLAIMS RESPONSIBILITY FOR KIDNAPPING

[Summary] The kidnapping of Michel Maury-Laribiere, vice president of the French Employers' Federation, is reported to be a political kidnapping carried out by the French extremist group Direct Action. A member of his family was contacted on the telephone by the kidnappers this afternoon.

Michel Maury-Laribiere's son Manuel told the press that a member of the family had been contacted by a group called "27-28 March 80" which he believed was the same as Direct Action. The caller seemed to be claiming responsiblity for the kidnapping and cancelled the denial made to AGENCE FRANCE PRESSE yesterday evening. The caller then hung up immediately without making any ransom demand or ultimatum.

GOVERNMENT TO UNVEIL 'ANTI-CRISIS' MEASURES; LABOR OPPOSITION

AU010950 Rome ANSA in English 0830 GMT 1 Jul 80

[Text] Rome, July 1 (ANSA)--The Italian Government unveils its package of anti-crisis measures to business and labor leaders here today with the hope of gaining their crucial support for a tough and predictably unpopular drive to rescue a staggering economy from collapse. The measures, which have leaked out to the press, the most controversial of which would tone down the country's intricate inflation-compensation system for workers, have already stirred up a hornet's nest of reactions from organized labor. The country will find out just how effective labor's opposition to the reported moves was tomorrow when the government breaks the measures to the public.

The sliding cost-of-living index system, which adjusts wages to offset some of the effects of inflation, has been widely touted as one of the major conquests of Italy's powerful labor movement. Other items of the package, as reported by the press, would include:

--Cutting labor costs by letting the state take over a share of the expense of workers' benefit payments, a move that would take some five billion lire off the tax roll.

--Increasing or at least revising value added taxes to discourage some forms of consumption, cut back the foreign deficit and curb the lira's depreciation.

--Cracking down harder on tax evasion (tax authorities managed last year to get back about one thousand billion lire in unpaid taxes).

--Taking steps to promote exports and overhaul crisis-ridden industries, above all the automobile, [word indistinct] and home appliance fields.

Making a pitch for the measures, Republican Party (PRI) Secretary Giovanni Spadolini asserted last night in Turin that the government's new plan reflected "a serious and well-balanced effort" to cope with a mounting crisis. The crisis, the head of one of the three coalition parties said, was "undermining the lira's stability, affecting the competiveness of Italian exports and casting an ominous cloud over employment and prospects for developing the nation's backward south". Spadolini described the measures in store for the country as "a first step", indicating that there were more to come. This first step, he added, will indicate the direction that was to be taken and will not at all be "the utterance of a decalogue". A series of emergency measures will be taken to deal with the priorities laid down in the government's medium-term economic policy platform, the "PRI" leader explained. As for today's encounter with union leaders, Spadolini said that "it will be a crucial appointment for the labor movement".

As of last night, the unions were still going strong in their opposition to the measures as they have leaked out in the press in recent days. Agostino Marianetti, a leader of the pro-communist "CGIL" trade union central, issued a statement to reporters last night confirming plans to stage a nationwide general strike if the government pursued the measures that have emerged in the press. The "CGIL" official also voiced suspicions that the country's economic powers have engineered "an instrumental exaggeration" about the condition of the lira.

The economic measures were not the only subject for debate on the political scene this week as the deadline approaches for the formation of new regional provincial and municipal governments up and down the peninsula. Italian voters went to the polls June 8 and 9 for a round of local elections which did not upset, to any major degree, the balance of political power as it now stands.

The leaders of the ruling Christian Democrat Party (DC) have given assurances that they were not necessarily seeking to recreate the same DC-PRI-Socialist Party (PSI) combination they have in Rome on the local level. These assurances appeared to be addressed to the opposition Social Democrat (PSDI) and (right-of-center) Liberal (PLI) parties to allay any discriminatory fears. Observers were still waiting to see what the Socialist Party will do about the local governments in which they formerly ruled in coalition with the Communist Party (PCI). The PSI, the nation's third largest party after the DC and PCI and the one which made the biggest gains in the June elections, could conceivably opt for other political arrangements in some of these local areas. As observers have pointed out, delicate political implications are at stake which ever way the PSI turns, whether it be away from its traditional leftist ally (the PCI) or away from its new-found government partner (the DC).

FIAT PLANS WORKERS LAYOFF TO CUT PRODUCTION 30 PERCENT

AU020858 Rome ANSA in English 0800 GMT 2 Jul 80

[Excerpt] Turin, July 2 (ANSA)--Fiat President Gianni Agnelli has confirmed plans to fire an undisclosed number of autoworkers as part of a production squeeze that would slash the company's output by thirty percent during the next six months. Agnelli confirmed reports that dismissals were in store for a portion of the automotive giant's labor force at a meeting with the press here last night following Fiat's annual shareholders' assembly. A suggestion that crisis-assailed industries in Italy lighten their payrolls with mass dismissals was made last month by Agnelli's brother Umberto, Fiat's managing director, in a controversial interview printed in a leading Rome daily.

The Fiat president told reporters last night that his company would have to roll back thirty percent of its production in order to unload unsold cars on the market. A production cutback will necessarily affect what he called "the labor factory", although the payroll slash will be to a "lesser degree". "Most likely", he stated, "there will be some (state subsidized) lay-offs and some dismissals". "I'm not in a position to give any more details," he added, "....because it all has to be negotiated with the union". "The reduction will regard everyone, from executives to workers," Agnelli specified.

The automobile magnate said that what his company needed right now was "less production and more productivity". In an apparent message to "CGIL" Secretary-General Luciano Lama, Agnelli claimed that dismissals were neither "unreasonable" nor "anti-labor" when they came in the midst of a market squeeze. "The facts are the facts and both we and the unions have to face up to them," he commented.

Pumped by reporters for his views about the lira, the Fiat president assured them that he was not asking for a devaluation of the currency, a move his brother recommended in last month's interview. "I do not ask for a devaluation. I do ask, however, that (?authorities) take into account the penalties (?that) have been suffered by industry in terms of exchange rates since Italy joined the European Monetary System (EMS)." "A penalty", he added, "that was in the neighborhood of 11 percent."

In his speech to Fiat shareholders earlier in the day, Agnelli charged that the government's ineffective economic policies raised "dangerous" monetary problems and admonished Rome authorities to flank their policies with "rigorous" measures to align the nation's economic trends with the outside world. "We simply can't go on with wage, monetary and budget practices that are inconsistent with those of other countries and expect the currency to maintain a steady rate," he charged. The whole debate about the lira's devaluation was branded "sterile" by the Fiat president because, as he put it, juggling the currency's exchange rate "would merely boil down to an official ratification of the deterioration in the general economic situation".

L'UNITA REPORTS ON SOVIET ENERGY TALKS, PROSPECTS

[Unattributed report: "USSR Offers Italy Energy It Lacks"]

[Excerpts] Rome--Yesterday saw the opening at the Industrial Reconstruction Institute [IRI] of the second Italian-Soviet energy conference. Speakers at the opening session included Vincenzo Corghi, chairman of the Italy-USSR Association, which organized the event in collaboration with the principal industrial corporations; IRI President Pietro Sette; the mayor of Rome; the USSR's ambassador in Italy; Nuclear Energy Commission Chairman Colombo; National Electric Power Agency [ENEL] Chairman Corbellini; Deputy Chairman of the National Hydrocarbons Agency [ENI] Di Donna, and Rossi, manager of Fiat's energy branch. Reports were delivered by Under Secretary for Industry Maria Magnani-Noya and Soviet State Committee for Science and Technology First Deputy Chairman D.G. Zhimerin, who heads a substantial delegation of leaders and experts from his country's energy sector.

The dialogue began yesterday at the top level. The Soviet Union, Zhimerin said, is willing to cooperate with the West European countries in using its major energy resources "without establishing any prior or subsequent conditions, on the basis of mutual interest." In this connection he invoked the USSR's proposal of a European nuclear energy conference extended to the United States and Canada. On this basis the bilateral dialogue can progress: Two projects in particular--the new gas pipeline from Siberia to Western Europe and the linkup between Italy's and the USSR'S electricity grids have already been mentioned.

With regard to the gas pipeline, the USSR is dealing with a West European consortium including the Italian National Oil Company, and there is talk of 40 billion cubic meters a year in new supplies. The electrical link is even more interesting. The time difference between Italy and the eastern regions of the USSR would permit the transfer of energy from one country to the other at certain times of day when the producing country's industry is "resting". Zhimerin cited a power savings of tens of millions of kilowatts installed, equivalent to 10 very large powerplants (larger than the Caorso nuclear powerplant, which produces 860,000 kilowatts, equivalent in cost to 10-15 trillion lire in investments.

ENEL President Corbi confirmed the intention to examine the possibility of a link between the Italian and USSR grids. The time needed to achieve this could be less than the time needed to build the first nuclear plant and could decisively help ENEL to avoid the prospect, which some people now consider imminent, of rationing. Under Secretary Magnani-Noya restricted herself to describing prospects of cooperation as "very topical and important" but avoided entering into the merits of the matter. With regard to the major topics of scientific development and exchanges, however, the government is leaving the leaders of the major economic and scientific bodies to proceed on their own. Di Donna pointed out that the gas pipeline with the USSR and the contract for 5 million tons of oil opened up, almost 20 years ago, a new phase in Italy's foreign economic relations as a whole. One could go further: Those contracts were decisive in safeguarding against the multinationals' attack what little element of antimonopolism there is in the ENI.

Nevertheless, symptoms are emerging of a profound political divergence between the government and economic leaders. According to British financial sources the Bank of Italy has announced the availability of $1 billion to refinance trade with the USSR but that this was blocked by the foreign minister, causing panic in certain major industrial groups. In the energy field, in which Italy depends on other countries for 80 percent of its requirements, this means full exposure to the oil-producing countries' blackmail. By blocking cooperation we are furnishing not the USSR but the Italian workers, driving the country toward a recession.

PASOK'S PAPANDREOU 'WARNS' SPAIN ABOUT ENTRY INTO NATO

AT271355 Athens I AVYI in Greek 27 Jun 80 p 1

[Excerpt] The chairman of PASOK yesterday warned that Spain's entry into NATO is not likely to offer the country any guarantees of its security or its territorial integrity and its democratic institutions. Papandreou issued his warning during a press conference yesterday at the close of his 3-day visit to the Spanish capital.

Referring particularly to Greek experiences within NATO the chairman of PASOK revealed that at the time he was minister to the prsideency under the government of the Union of the Center, Greek secret services received funds directly from the United States within the limits of NATO without being accountable to the Greek Government.

Papandreou also stressed that:

--The establishment of the dictatorship in Greece was undertaken on the basis of the "Promitheus" plan which was prepared by NATO with the cooperation of U.S. and Greek secret services.

--The coup against Archbishop Makarios in Cyprus was prepared according to the "Aphrodite" plan which was prepared in Athens and the plan "Attila" which was prepared in Ankara. These two plans were directly coordinated from Washington.

According to an ATHENS NEWS AGENCY report Papandreou stated that PASOK's deputies at the European Parliament will fully support Spanish accession to the EEC within the framework of this parliament.

PSOE OFFICIAL REPORTS ON FEDERAL COMMITTEE SESSION

LD232225 Madrid in Spanish to Europe 1830 GMT 23 Jun 80

[Excerpt] PSOE leaders today held a press conference to publicize the results of the meeting of the party federal committee held over the weekend.

Guillermo Galeote, a member of the PSOE executive, said: We socialists will support the government in all measures it takes to counter terrorism. He repeated that his party is against negoating with the ETA terrorist organization.

On the question of decisions reached by the federal executive committee, Guillermo Galeote emphasized that there was agreement on the correctness of tabling the motion of censure against the government and that support was reaffirmed for the program of government offered by Felipe Gonzalez in the debate on the censure motion. The committee also deems it necessary to bring some sense to the political plan for the building of a state comprising autonomies, to reform public administration so as to democratize state structures, to promote democratic rights and freedoms, to fight against corruption and unemployment and to restore investment.

The committee assesses the results of the strategy followed by the UGT [General Workers' Union], criticizes the government's obstructionist policy in the field of municipal government and pledges itself to fight for the passing of the new law on local government.

On the subject of Spain's possible membership in NATO, Guillermo Galeote said that the federal committee reaffirms its stance of nonalignment with either of the two blocs, since it feels that any disturbance of this balance would provoke uncertainty and risks, and it therefore rejects the idea of Spain joining the Atlantic Alliance.

FOREIGN MINISTRY DECIDES TO SET UP EMBASSY IN ZIMBABWE

[Unattributed report: "Embassy in Salisbury"]

[Text] After much discussion the Foreign Ministry has decided to establish a Norwegian Embassy in Salisbury, capital of Zimbabwe. The discussions dealt with the problem of how Norway should strengthen its representation in East Africa, whether by setting up an embassy or by means of a roving ambassador. The decision to set up a permanent representation was probably influenced by requests from the four nonsocialist parties in the Storting.

AFTENPOSTEN ON REPORT ON SECURITY, FOREIGN POLICY IN 1980'S

[Editorial: "Norway, EEC and United States"]

[Text] Recently Foreign Minister Knut Frydenlund was presented with a report from the Norwegian European Movement on our security and European foreign policy in the 1980's. It is a though-provoking and useful study, obviously well suited for use as a foundation for an unprejudiced debate on Norway's relationship with the EEC, among other things.

It is as well to remember that the enlarged European Community is different from the one to which a popular majority said no in 1972, principally characterized by foreign policy coordination rather than by the supranational elements that so many people feared at that time.

This change in the community's development makes it more than necessary for Norway to seek to exploit ALL the possibilities of influencing and helping to create EEC foreign policy. On this point we are in agreement with the study group. For this reason we also support its recommendations on, for example, stable, formal and direct contacts between the Storting, the government and the EEC organs. They are completely in line with what we for our part thought important and essential for Norway even before the fateful referendum 8 years ago.

But the study group is of course right when it says that there are now new reasons for this view. To mention but two of them: our oil resources and our greatly enlarged territorial waters.

The group further points out that two main pillars in the Western world--one on each side of the Atlantic Ocean, the EEC and the United States--would on the whole increase the possibility of exercising control in international politics and at the same time improve Western nations' security. But the study group also emphasizes that a prerequisite for the success of such an arrangement is the maintenance of the sense of solidarity between North America and West Europe in major strategic questions where the nations of the Western world share common interests. The maintenance of the American nuclear umbrella is similarly, the group points out, a prerequisite of closer cooperation on security policy within the EEC.

We believe these judgements to be true, but we cannot refrain from drawing attention to the assumption on which they rest. For the foreseeable future Norwegian foreign aid and security policies will have to be built on our close contacts with the United States and on the defense gurantees that membership of NATO gives us. [paragraph continues]

The study group is obviously of the same opinion. Nevertheless its praiseworthy attempts at a rethinking could POSSIBLY mislead opponents of NATO and others into believing that what the group is advocating is a radical reorientation whereby the Atlantic perspective will be completely replaced by the European.

We do not read the report like that. There is no doubt that it is correct and necessary for Norway to attach greater importance than in the past to its relations with the EEC. However, our ties to the United States must not be weakened. They contain palpable realities whose practical political significance is comprehensible to our great eastern neighbor.

In the debate that ought in any event to be held on our future foreign and defense policies it would be advantageous to avoid obvious misunderstandings with reference to a Norwegian "choice" between the United States and the EEC. For there can be no either-or here. There will continue to be a both-and situation, to the extent that the EEC finds that we and it have common interests.

SWEDISH, SWISS FOREIGN MINISTERS MEET

LD010945 Stockholm SVENSKA DAGBLADET in Swedish 24 Jun 80 p 4

[Unattributed report: "Ullsten Met Swiss Counterpart"]

[Text] Swiss Foreign Minister Pierre Aubert had talks Monday with his Swedish counterpart, Ola Ullsten.

The two countries' foreign ministers have maintained regular contacts for some time. After a run through on the international situation the talks were principally devoted to preparations for the European security conference followup meeting in Madrid in the fall. SWEDEN OFFERED NATURAL GAS SUPPLY BY USSR

LD261805 Stockholm Domestic Service in Swedish 1600 GMT 26 Jun 80

[Text] The Soviet Union has offered Sweden the possibility of buying natural gas. The offer was made by the Soviet first deputy minister of foreign trade, Yuriy Brezhnev, who is on a visit to Sweden. The amount of natural gas offered corresponds to 7 percent of Swedish oil imports. Such offers have come before, but it is a long way from the promise to having the Russian gas here.

This offer mentions between 1.5 and 2 billion cubic meters of gas per year, and this corresponds to 1.5-2 million tons of oil. And it is oil that the gas can replace, not heavy heating oils, but lighter oil for heating homes, for example. The state-owned Swedegas has conducted market studies, and the result reached is that Sweden could use 5 billion cubic meters, over twice as much as offered by the Russians to us now, but that is according to today's prices. There have been signals from several gas-producing countries, such as Norway, Algeria and Libya, that prices are to be increased, and the Swedish market should perhaps not take so much. Regarding this Russian gas, the Ministry of Industry does not yet know what price will be charged nor how the gas is to be delivered. There are two main alternatives for delivery: either a pipeline across the Aaland Sea or an extension of the pipeline network from Eastern Europe. Sweden is no longer interested in the transportation of liquid gas, LNG, by ship. According to the Soviet Union the deliveries could begin in the mid-1980's. But at the beginning of the 1970's Sweden received a promise of three times as much gas as this time, but it was an offer which the Russians withdrew. It is not known why an offer is being made by the Soviet Union for the supply of natural gas just now. And before any Soviet gas really arrives in Sweden, many investigations will have been made and many rounds of negotiations conducted between Swedish and Soviet trade delegations.

STATEMENT ISSUED ON ROLANDHIS' EEC CONTACTS

NC261950 Nicosia Domestic Service in Greek 1900 GMT 26 Jun 80

[Text] Foreign Minister Rolandhis has returned from Brussels where he had contacts with European Economic Community officials on the question of the implementation of the second stage of Cyprus' association with the EEC. According to an official statement, during his meetings Mr Rolandhis stressed Cyprus' goal--that after the expiration of the first stage of the association agreement, which has been extended until 31 December 1980, we enter stage two of the agreement which will result in the customs union with the community. This important decision has been postponed since 1977 when the first 5-year period of the association agreement expired.

The statement points out that Mr Rolandhis' contacts have been found necessary in view of the forthcoming decision by the European Commission on the contents of its proposals to the ministerial council in connection with this question. Based on the committee's proposals, the ministerial council will later this year make final decisions on shaping Cyprus' relations with the community. Therefore, the statement stresses, the importance of the committee proposals at this stage is obvious.

It is also pointed out that the question of entering stage two of the association agreement is of particular interest with regard to the export of Cyprus agricultural products, especially in view of the expected broadening of the common market through the admission of more members.

AKEL LEADER CRITICIZES KIPRIANOU IN LONDON SPEECH

NC020651 Nicosia CYPRUS MAIL in English 2 Jul 80 p 1

[Text] "There is not the slightest possibility of an understanding with President Kiprianou", one of the AKEL leaders, Mr D. Konstandinou, declared in a speech before a gathering of Cypriots in London.

Mr Konstandinou in his speech sought to explain why AKEL considered Kiprianou as sharing responsibility for the non-pursuit of the intercommunal talks and hence the AKEL decision "to dissociate itself from responsibility".

The speaker reiterated AKEL charges that President Kiprianou was not following the Makarios policy because he had disagreed with the policy enunciated by the late president in a joint Cabinet and National Council session in March 1977.

President Kiprianou has acknowledged that he had disagreed at the meeting but after talks with President Makarios accepted his policy and has steadfastly pursued it ever since.

However Mr Konstandinou said that President Kiprianou had confessed to an AKEL party deputation that he believed Makarios was "deceived" by U.S. presidential envoy Mr Clifford into making the proposals he made and, that Kiprianou believed there could be a return to the situation prior to coup and invasion and to an improved version of the Zurich agreement.

These are utopian solutions and their pursuit could lead to adventures and double enosis, Mr Konstandinou said.

The AKEL speaker said Kiprianou's disagreement with the line of settlement naturally made the president wish to avoid the intercommunal talks.

Mr Konstandinou also claimed that the latest formula by Waldheim enunciated through Mr Perez de Cuellar for resumption of the talks was identical to earlier ones, although President Kiprianou said it differed substantially in that previous proposals demanded acceptance of advance conditions and commitments.

Reiterated

The speaker reiterated charges against President Kiprianou for alleged "inconsistency", and "indecision".

The AKEL party has nothing against President Kiprianou as a person and does not vie for power, but the party having regard to his policies for more than two years felt convinced that "there is not the slightest possibility of an understanding with the president", Mr Konstandinou said.

Among other things, the speaker mentioned the past attempts of President Kiprianou to reshuffle his cabinet "by chasing away democratic ministers," his delay in calling for municipal elections and democratisation of the political and social life in the country, his handling of the purge issue, and called for "radical qualitative change" and collaboration with "patriotic forces accepting the National Council line of 1977".

Mr Konstandinou also attacked the Rally Party of Mr Kliridhis and the socialist EDEK of Dr Lissaridhis for their approach, the former for allegedly supporting NATO solutions and the latter for following adventurist policies.

DEMOCRATIC PARTY ISSUES STATEMENT ON GOALS

NC012017 Nicosia Domestic Service in Greek 1900 GMT 1 Jul 80

[Text] A Democratic Party [DIKO] statement says that this year it will honor the victims of the coup and invasion and will give proof of its decision to carry out its duty to prevent new betrayals and coups, whether political or not. The statement also declares DIKO's decision to struggle hard for Cyprus' liberation and the creation of a completely independent, sovereign, united, territorially integral and nonaligned state in which Greeks, Turks, Armenians, Latins and Maronites would unlimitedly enjoy their basic freedoms and human rights.

DIKO adds that it will struggle for a state that is completely demilitarized, free of foreign interference and with a biregional federation as its internal structure.

On solving the Cyprus problem, the statement says DIKO believes that this should be achieved through honorable, sincere and substantive negotiations without any preconditions or terms and based on the 19 May 1979 agreement.

The announcement says that the DIKO Political Bureau and parliamentary group met today in a joint session presided over by Mr Kiprianou, chairman of the party, and assessed the outcome of the pan-Cypriot conference of DIKO cadres last Sunday.

ERKMEN ON RESULTS OF BRUSSELS EEC TALKS

TA011545 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1400 GMT 1 Jul 80

[Text] TRT correspondent Selma Berksoy talked to Foreign Minister Hayrettin Erkmen, who returned from the Turkish-EEC Association Council meeting in Brussels.

[Begin recording] [Question] Turkey had submitted certain proposals to the EEC on the revival of our relations with the community. What steps were taken during this recent association council meeting to realize these proposals?

[Answer] An investigation into the matter had started following our request in February this year to revive our relations with the community. During this meeting, we discussed the outcome of these investigations. The work conducted centered on the agricultural sector, on agricultural products, on the social rights and possibilities of our workers [employed in EEC countries] as well as on technical and economic cooperation and financial aid.

Our discussions on agricultural products were satisfactory. The proposals were satisfactory. We did have certain small doubts and concerns and we brought them up. It is possible to summarize the agreement reached as follows: The tariff on the Turkish agricultural products exported to EEC countries will be annually reduced until it is totally eliminated at the end of 6 years.

[Question] In other words, the customs tariffs on Turkish agricultural products will be gradually reduced between 1981 and 1986 until it reaches zero.

[Answer] Yes, there will be an annual reduction. Products which are subject to 2 percent customs duty this year will be exempt from customs duty as of the new year. That is to say, the 2 percent will be reduced to zero and gradual reductions will be applied to the other products. Thus, almost all our products will be exempt from tariffs before the end of the 6 years.

[Question] Turkey had requested that the fourth financial protocol go into effect immediately and aid be extended to Turkey within this framework. What was discussed on this subject?

[Answer] The amount of the fourth financial protocol was determined. More correctly, we were informed about the amount, because this is not a subject for discussion. This is a one-sided procedure. The EEC countries are extending three-part aid.

The first part comes from the budgets of the community countries, the second part is a bank loan and the third part is a gift. This amount was fixed at 600 million monetary units--some $850 million. We said that we did not view this amount sufficient due to inflation, which exists in Europe as well. We claimed that it would be correct to increase this amount by the rate of inflation. Following discussions among themselves, the community countries said that this amount cannot be increased for the time being. [end recording]

UAE PAPER REPORTS MILITARY CONCESSIONS TO U.S.

[Tamam al-Barazi dispatch from London]

[Excerpt] The United States has obtained new military concessions from Turkey allowing it to use its forces stationed in Turkey outside NATO's borders and in an area including the Gulf region.

In accordance with the military and economic cooperation agreement signed on 29 March 1980, Turkey has granted the United States the freedom to move its forces beyond NATO's borders so its aircraft can reach the Gulf and Arabian Sea areas. This follows the U.S. request to its NATO allies to strengthen NATO's military power in the Mediterranean so the United States can concentrate on its tasks in the Gulf region.

Informed sources say the Turkish Assembly, which ratified the treaty, saw only 9 out of 100 pages of the agreement. The assembly did not see the agreement's appendices that include details for transporting U.S. military power to areas beyond NATO's borders.

Informed military sources say the new U.S.-Turkish agreement will strengthen the U.S. ability to provide logistical support for any U.S. plans to intervene in the Gulf.

U.S. aircraft intended to deal with any crisis in the Gulf will fly over Iraq and Iran. However, there has been no official comment from Baghdad or Tehran. Iraq is currently supplying Turkey with 25 percent of its oil needs.

VOTCP SCORES NATO MEETING, JOINT COMMUNIQUE

TA280854 (Clandestine) Voice of Turkish Communist Party in Turkish to Europe and Turkey 0600 GMT 28 Jun 80

[Unattributed commentary: "The NATO Communique and its Aggressive Essence"]

[Text] NATO's Ankara meeting has ended. This meeting was another one of NATO's moves in line with its policy of undermining detente and of increasing tension and armament both in our region and in the world. The secret talks held during the meeting and the joint communique issued after it show NATO's aggressive essence.

The NATO leaders say that this meeting was held in the light of the Afghanistan developments. They are trying to conceal their warmongering policies, trying to portray as an invasion the Soviet Union's aid to Afghanistan--and aid extended in line with both the agreements between the two countries and international agreements.

However, on the days the NATO meeting was held, the Soviet Union took new [word indistinct] steps so that international problems could be resolved peacefully through negotiations in line with the desire of the Afghan Government. It withdrew a significant portion of its troops from there. However, as always, the NATOites tried to block the road for the political solution of the problems through negotiations.

With lies about a Soviet threat, the Demirel government and the reactionary circles are imposing the sovereignty of U.S. imperialism and of NATO on our country and people. There are large quantities of nuclear warheads, U.S. and NATO bases, U.S. troops in our country. If anything is an invasion, that is. Those who spread the lies of a Soviet invasion of Afghanistan or of a Soviet threat are really trying to cover up this imperialist invasion, the U.S. and NATO invasion of our country.

The NATO communique reveals once more that new nuclear missiles will be place in Western Europe. It is definitely known that NATO wants to place new nuclear weapons in Turkey as well. This issue was raised in the secret talks and agreements held during the NATO meeting. We cannot expect those who hide the slavery agreements they sign with U.S. imperialism from the people and from parliament to reveal their moves to drag Turkey into nuclear armament. They always commit their acts of treason against the people and the country behind closed doors.

All aspects of this policy of treason pursued by the Demirel government and the reactionary circles was revealed in the military attacks carried out by U.S. imperialism in the Middle East and in our region and in the use of Turkey as a tool in these military attacks. The plans of NATO's expansion over Turkey were reconfirmed during the NATO meetings in Ankara. This was overtly stated in the remarks to the effect that for NATO's eastern wing to discharge its duties better, first and foremost, Turkey must be armed.

Turkey's arament has nothing to do with national security. As several democratic and patriotic columnists point out, the United States, which is NATO's chief boss, has eyes for nothing but the Persian Gulf. With this armament, U.S. imperialists and natoites who have settled in our country will do more than they did until now.

Our country, the Incirlik Base, was used in the attack against Lebanon in 1958. U-2 spy planes were sent over the Soveit Union. Our country and our people wene used as tools in the American attack against Iran. Which one of these is related to the protection of our national security? On the contrary, the U.S. and NATO presence in our country threatens our national security, our people, the neighboring countries and brotherly people.

Why and under what conditions did the NATO leaders meet in Ankara? With the developments in Iran and Afghanistan the NATOites and U.S. imperialism lost important positions in the region. The national and social liberation struggles of the regional peoples have reached new levels. Our people's struggle for independence, peace, democracy and socialism is advancing with every passing day. The Demirel government is shaking at its roots. Consequently, the imperialists are afraid of losing their positions in Turkey which they consider an outpost.

The NATO leaders are talking about the possibility of a social explosion in Turkey. These are not mere words. Our people are struggling with great hatred against fascist terrorism, the laws of oppression, the bilateral slavery agreement, the U.S. bases, NATO, unemployment, inflation, the merciless exploitation and attacks by the monopolies and against the anti-people policies of the Demirel government.

The NATO leaders came to Turkey under these conditions, in order to keep the Demirel government in power, to insure the full support of the NATOites within the Turkish Army for this government and to consequently strengthen Turkey's dependence on imperialism.

They came to Ankara to ensure that the bilateral slavery agreement is ratified by the legislature. However, no matter what they do, NATO's imperialist bosses, the Demirel government and the fascist terrorists will not be able to save themselves from the anger and hatred our people feel against the present order of exploitation and oppression and against imperialist dependence. They will not be able to silence our people or frighten the patriots.

Today, all the patriots are shoulder throughout the country for national independence, against the U.S. bases, against Turkey's membership in NATO, against the bilateral slavery agreement, against this inauspicious and dishonorable dependence on imperialism.

The anti-imperialist unity of action of the communists, of the Turkish Labor Party, Turkish Socialist Workers Party, RPP members, of the Kurdish democrats, of all the progressive and revolutionary youth, of the non-party patriots will break the dependence on imperialism.

TWO DEPUTIES JOIN RPP; ECEVIT ON ASSUMING POWER

TA011229 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1000 GMT 1 Jul 80

[Text] Independent deputies from Afyon, Mete Tan and Gunes Ongut have joined the RPP. With these deputies joining the party the number of RPP seats at the National Assembly has increased to 203.

Speaking at a ceremony held on the occasion at the parliament, RPP leader Bulent Ecevit said that his party called for a political armistice in order to restore peace in Turkey. Ecevit said: We do not aspire to form a government single-handedly. We are not involved in a power struggle. We are not calculating to overthrow the government in order to assume power. We are calling for peace and unity desired by the entire Turkish nation.

Noting that Turkey was being dragged to dangers worse than those existing in the end of 1977, Ecevit added: If we lose time in safeguarding our country and our democracy by foiling theplots being designed, it may be too late. Now we are maybe going to shoulder an even greater burden. There might be those who will claim that it is not the right time and that the conditions are too grave.

However, democracy is faced with increasing dangers in Turkey. If we are involved in calculations concerning the right time to assume the responsibility of becoming the government, then it might be too late to save Turkey, the Turkish people and Turkish democracy.

Ecevit also said that his party will shoulder every difficulty in order to save the people and democracy. Ecevit concluded by expressing the belief that there are hearts and consciences within the Justice Party--despite the hostile and prejudiced barriers being built--into which goodwilled humanitarian appeals might penetrate.

RRP TO VOTE AGAINST INTERPELLATION

TA021139 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1000 GMT 2 Jul 80

[Text] The Republican Reliance Party [RRP] General Administrative Council has unanimously decided to reject the interpellation against the government. A statement issued by the council says that the only real national solution is Ataturkism. It says: The RPP has been cooperating with the extreme leftist and extreme rightist enemies of Ataturkism. We will reject the interpellation motion submitted following agreements with divisive militants and persons whose corruption has been proven.

The statement says that the RRP considers several of the present government's policies to be deficient. However, it adds, the RRP considers Ecevit and Erbakan to be irresponsible, provocative and destructive opposition and the government policies they are considering as dangerous.

TA021204 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1000 GMT 2 Jul 80

[Text] Three persons were killed and 12 were wounded in the incidents that occurred in Corum last night. In the light of the tense atmosphere in the city the governor imposed a curfew as of 0600 today. According to the information received from Corum Public Prosecutor Ertem Turker, there were armed clashes among certain groups in various parts of the city. Meanwhile, 10 houses were set on fire and 2 vehicles were destroyed. Abdullah Sucu, Mustafa Ozdemir and an unidentified person were killed in the incidents. The curfew imposed in Sivas yesterday morning is still in force. Sivas Governor Sukru Osan has said that the situation is now calm in the city. ROMANIAN PLANE LANDS WITH 20 SEEKING ASYLUM

AU031118 [Editorial Report] Vienna Domestic Service in German at 1000 GMT on 3 July reports that a Romanian plane with 20 passengers, including women, children, and a pilot on board has made an emergency landing in a field near the east Styrian district town of Feldbach. The Romanian citizens aboard the plane have applied for asylum. The aircraft, of the Antonov-2 type, allegedly started from Arad in eastern Romania. The refugees will now be taken to Traiskirchen Camp.

A Johannes Neumann dispatch in the same newscast from the scene adds that of the 10 children 8 are under 14 years of age, that the biplane was slightly damaged and that the pilot has also asked for asylum. The aircraft is of a type which is used in agriculture for the treatment of agricultural crops. The interrogation of the applicants for asylum is difficult because only one female passenger speaks some German.

PAHR OUTLINES FOREIGN POLICY IN PARLIAMENT

AU021116 Vienna WIENER ZEITUNG in German 2 Jul 80 pp 1, 2

[Report on 1 July Austrian National debate on the government's 1979 foreign policy report]

[Excerpt] Foreign Minister Pahr declared that in the interest of Austria's security it was necessary to make active endeavors for solving conflicts all over the world. The foreign minister condemned the taking of hostages in Iran but added that in looking for a solution it is necessary to take into consideration the possibilities that actually exist. It must be considered that there has been a revolution in Iran which, however, has not yet led to any consolidation. Any step conducive to a consolidation would be a contribution to the liberation of the hostages, he said, adding that one should leave doors open to prevent a worldwide isolation of Iran. In this context the minister paid tribute to the fact-finding mission of the Socialist International under Kreisky's leadership.

Regarding the situation in Afghanistan the foreign minister said that a pro-Moscow regime had come to power there as early as in 1978. The Soviet invasion has caused a decisive change in the political balance. The condemnation--although actually justified--of the invasion alone is no more a solution than are retributive measures and sanctions. Until 1978, Afghanistan belonged to the nonaligned camp, and it must be primarily the task of the nonaligned nations to deal with this problem.

As far as the Middle East question is concerned, Pahr said Austria's position has remained unchanged: It must be accepted that Israel has a right to recognition as a state, that the Palestinian people has the same right, and that the Palestinian people is solely represented by the PLO.

According to Pahr, the opening of direct negotiations between Israel and the Palestinians would be the prerequisite for a lasting peace in the Middle East. In this respect, Austria has recognized many aspects of the problem earlier than other countries. Now various countries have adopted the Austrian views, which is evident for example in the Venice declaration of the Western countries.

Pahr described Austria's relations with its neighbor countries as excellent. He stressed the endeavors for European integration, noting, however, that there are still some problems facing Austria in the agricultural sector. He appreciated the role of EFTA [European Free Trade Association] but stressed the need for bilateral efforts, even beyond the EC, for cooperation and integration within the framework of neutrality.

JOINT COMMUNIQUE ON SED DELEGATION'S VISIT TO KPOE

AU011353 Vienna VOLKSTIMME in German 1 Jul 80 p 3

[Joint communique of the delegations of the SED and the Austrain Communist Party"]

[Text] At the invitation of the Austrian Communist Party [KPOe] Central Committee an SED delegation visited Austria from 25 to 28 June. The delegation, which was headed by Hermann Axen, member of the SED Politburo and secretary of the Central Committee, included: Wolfgang Herger, member of the Central Committee; Alfred Marter and Helmut Mueller, deputy department chiefs at the Central Committee; and Walter Brunner, political staff worker at the Central Committee. The SED delegation had a comprehensive, comradely exchange of opinions with a KPOe delegation headed by party Chairman Franz Muhri. The delegation included: Karl Reiter, Politburo member and chief of the Central Committee Secretariat; Franz Karger, Politburo member and chairman of the Vienna party leadership; and Hans Steiner, member of the Central Committee Secretariat and chief of the Foreign Relations Department.

The SED representatives visited the Vienna and Styrian branches of the KPOe. They informed themselves about the KPOe policy to implement the decisions of the 23d party congress and the manifold activities of the Austrian communists to safeguard jobs, defend and expand the sociopolitical achievements and democratic rights of the working people, and safeguard the Austrian people's national interests. The delegation had numerous contacts with representatives of Austria's political, economic and cultural life. It visited the Donawitz plant of the nationalized Voest-Alpine Corporation. The talks focused on topical questions of safeguarding and strengthening peace and detente that are regarded by the SED and the KPOe as a joint priority task of their struggle. It is their foremost goal to make peace the normal form of the peoples' life.

The delegations declared that the policy recently pursued by the most reactionary circles of the United States and other NATO countries, the policy of turning from detente to confrontation, has led to a dangerous exacerbation of the international situation. The goal of the imperialist policy of threats and extortion, of strength and of hegemonism is to alter the existing military balance of power and obtain one-sided advantages. That purpose is especially served by intensified implementation of the NATO long-term armament program and the decision to produce and deply new American medium-range nuclear weapons delivery vehicles in some West European states.

The SED and the KPOe delegations emphatically condemn the attacks of the aggressive imperialist forces on detente and international cooperation. Both parties resolutely oppose the big power and hegemony policy of the Chinese leaders and their collusion with imperialism and with international reaction, which are directed against socialism, world peace and the peoples' struggle for national liberation and for social progress.

Both sides expressed their conviction that prerequisites exist for resolutely rebuffing the policy of confrontation and threats and for continuing the process of detente. In this context the representatives of both parties stressed the decisive role played by the Soviet Union and the states allied with it for peace, national independence and social progress of peoples. Their constant struggle for a peaceful world stems from the nature of socialism, whose main concern is the constant improvement of the working people's living conditions.

The Warsaw Pact countries' proposals of 15 May 1980 are supported by both parties as a constructive program, marked by realism and reason, a program for continuing the dialogue, for seeking agreement on progress in the interest of peace and thus in the interest of the peoples. Factors of growing importance in the struggle for peace and social progress are the people's movements for national and social liberation and the growing struggle of the working class in the capitalist countries.

Both delegations stressed that the successful struggle for halting the arms race and for disarmament requires an even stronger mobilization of peace-loving people. In this context they referred to the importance of the proposal contained in the appeal of the Paris meeting of European communist and workers parties for joint actions by communists, socialists, social democrats and Christians. Both sides will continue their endeavors to that end.

To banish the danger of a nuclear war and to continue the policy of peaceful coexistence in the interest of the peoples, it is very urgently necessary to reduce the military confrontation in Europe. Tangible progress in military detente primarily requires the annulment or at least the suspension of the NATO decision to produce and deploy new American missiles in some West European countries.

Both parties stress the need to convene a conference on questions of military detente and disarmament as early as possible. The Vienna negotiations on the reduction of armed forces and weapons in central Europe must lead to early constructive solutions. In the interest of the consistent and complete implementation of the Helsinki final act both sides call for positive, tangible results at the Madrid meeting.

The SED and the KPOe again reaffirm their solidarity with all peoples defending themselves against imperialist machinations, neocolonialism, racism and national oppression. Both parties support the measures to safeguard the independence, national sovereignty and territorial integrity of the Democratic Republic of Afghanistan. They pay tribute to the decision to withdraw some Soviet military units as an expression of the Soviet Union's and Afghanistan's desire to achieve a political settlement of the situation that has developed over Afghanistan. Now it is up to the United States and to the other countries that are supporting the counterrevolution to immediately end the undeclared war against Afghanistan and, in accordance with the Afghan Government's proposals, enter into negotiations so as to bring about reliable international guarantees for the security of the countries in that region.

The SED delegation reported on the successful implementation of the decisions of the ninth party congress and the manifold initiatives of the working people in preparing the 10th party congress. It paid tribute to the KPOe's struggle to rally all democratic forces against reactionary and neofascist machinations and stressed its untiring struggle on behalf of the interests of the workers class and all Austrian working people. On behalf of the SED Central Committee it thanked the KPOe for its constant endeavors to further develop relations between the Republic of Austria and the GDR in the economic, political, cultural, scientific-technical and sports fields, to the benefit of both peoples.

The KPOe delegation elucidated the activities and results achieved to date in implementing the decisions of the 23d party congress and reported on the preparations for the 24th party congress to be held in December 1980. It stressed the SED's successes in shaping the developed socialist society in the GDR, whose brilliance constitutes valuable support for the struggle of the Austrian workers movement. The KPOe representatives expressed their satisfaction with the forthcoming official visit to the Republic of Austria of Erich Honecker, SED Central Committee general secretary and GDR State Council chairman.

As a result of their discussions the SED and KPOe delegations noted with satisfaction that the relations between the two parties are expanding and deepening on the basis of proletarian internationalism.

The creative application of Marxism-Leninism to the concrete conditions of every country is regarded by both parties as reliable guidance in fulfilling the national tasks in the struggle for democracy and socialism and the joint internationalist goals of the working class. In this sense both parties will continue to work for the consolidation and strengthening of the international communist movement.

SECOND CHAMBER CALLS FOR OIL EMBARGO AGAINST S. AFRICA

LD021213 Rotterdam NRC HANDELSBLAD in Dutch 18 Jun 80 p 1

[Diplomatic correspondent report: "Chamber Behind Oil Boycott on South Africa"]

[Excerpt] The Hague, 18 Jun--A fairly large majority of the Second Chamber this afternoon adopted the motion submitted by J.N. Scholten (Christian Democratic Appeal) [CDA] which calls on the government to impose an oil boycott on South Africa. In addition to members of opposition party groups, enough members of the CDA voted for the motion to produce a majority. CDA Deputy Scholten gave Van der Klaauw a few more days to explain how the government is going to act on the motion. In this time Van der Klaauw must convince the chamber of the claim he made yesterday evening that black leaders in South Africa are against this boycott. Van der Klaauw promised to do so.

During yesterday evening's debate in the chamber Van der Klaauw had described an oil boycott against South Africa as "extremely unwise." He said he has the greatest difficulty with the part of the Scholten motion calling for the boycott. This is not true of the second part, he said, which calls for a definite date for general elections in Namibia and for coordinated help from EC countries for the so-called frontline states.

Cabinet Disavows Self From Embargo

LD021215 Amsterdam DE VOLKSKRANT in Dutch 26 Jun 80 p 1

[DE VOLKSKRANT correspondent report: "Government Defies CDA"]

[Excerpts] The Hague--Political circles in The Hague are expecting a strong confrontation between the government and the Second Chamber today. Parliament is extremely irritated at the way in which the government is treating it. The cabinet announced yesterday that it has nothing to say about the wish expressed by a majority of the chamber for an oil embargo against South Africa. The cabinet's abrupt line has aroused particular irritation in the Christian Democratic Appeal [CDA], the largest government party.

The CDA is meeting this morning to discuss the situation. The party is very divided, and this raised the question of whether it will declare war on the cabinet--if need be at the price of a political crisis. A majority of the CDA last week came out in favor of imposing an oil embargo on South Africa. According to inside information at least 10 CDA deputies will maintain that stance even if the cabinet decides it is "unacceptable" and hence puts its existence at stake.

The cabinet's attitude on this oil embargo question and other issues has thrown the CDA, even the rightwing, into confusion. "The cabinet is beginning to blunder," a CDA member who is considered to be a rightwinger said yesterday evening. Even CDA leader Lubbers said he is surprised at the cabinet's abrupt attitude.

Nobody within The Hague's political circles believe there will be a crisis. However, there is some uncertainty. An atmosphere has arisen in which CDA deputies might be ready to spark off a crisis. Even the cabinet is nervous. Political observers point out that Van Agt and Wiegel are intent on staying in government. However, the members of the government are wondering whether they can survive the coming budget talks, politically speaking.

ARD TV CORRESPONDENT SAYS SCHMIDT'S ATTITUDE 'IRRITATED' SOVIETS

DW30708 Hamburg ARD Television Network in German 1815 GMT 1 Jul 80

[Excerpt from commentary by Moscow correspondent Klaus Bednarz]

[Text] The Soviets were not merely impressed, but irritated by the toughness with which Schmidt touched on the Afghanistan problem. I was told today by a very prominent Soviet discussion partner, whose name I am not permitted to mention, that with his attitude vis-a-vis Afghanistan Schmidt had violated the diplomatic rules in Moscow, acting improperly as a guest. He could have shown that tough approach in confidential talks with Brezhnev, but not more or less publicly in a toast given in the Soviet capital.

REUTER CITES CONTENTS OF SCHMIDT, BREZHNEV LETTER EXCHANGE

WA030336 London REUTER in English 0242 GMT 3 Jul 80

[Text] Bonn, July 3 (Thursday), REUTER--Soviet leader Leonid Brezhnev blamed the United States for the present international tension in an exchange of letters with West German Chancellor Helmut Schmidt earlier this year, informed sources said today.

They said Mr Brezhnev made his accusation in a reply sent in March to a letter from Mr Schmidt, which expressed concern about the Soviet intervention in Afghanistan.

The sources disclosed the contents of the letters only one day after the chancellor's return from a two-day Moscow visit and only hours before a scheduled address to parliament on the results of his trip.

Mr Schmidt said in his letter to Mr Brezhnev that he could not disguise the worry with which West Germany viewed the situation facing the world in the 1980's.

He spoke of the U.S. Embassy personnel held hostage in Tehran and said, "the consequences that could arise if this illegal and inhuman situation continues, cannot be taken lightly by anyone."

But the chancellor reserved his greatest concern for the Soviet action in Afghanistan, which he said had created an international crisis. He pleaded with Mr Brezhnev not to close his mind to his anxiety, saying the insecurity that the military move was inflicting on the world was a high price that Moscow also had to pay.

In his reply, Mr Brezhnev said the chancellor's concern was understandable, but he added that the international situation took a turn for the worse long before the Afghanistan affair. The cause was the United States and NATO policy of forcing an arms race and safeguarding U.S. military supremacy, together with Washington's efforts to solve international problems from a position of strength, the Soviet leader said. He added that this had become abundantly clear with NATO's decision last year to modernize its European-based nuclear missile force.

Mr Brezhnev did not mention that the move was prompted by NATO fears about the new Soviet SS-20 multi-warhead missiles.

As for Afghanistan, Mr Brezhnev said he had repeatedly made clear that Moscow had merely responded to the Kabul government's appeal for help in fending off foreign attacks on the country's freedom and sovereignty. Moscow had also sent its troops into Afghanistan "after the Americans began to concentrate their naval forces near the southern borders of our country," he said.

He claimed the real reason for "slandering" the Soviet Union and whipping up anti-Soviet hysteria in the United States was to enable Washington to gain a firmer economic and military foothold in the Middle East. He added that the United States obviously had decided to include China in carrying out its plans and intentions. "The dangerous tendency to military adventures of the present leadership of China and the generally aggressive alignment of its policy are extensively known," Mr Brezhnev said.

Mr Brezhnev said NATO's missile decision in December, in which Bonn played a significant role, had disturbed the situation in Europe as well as Soviet-West German relations. He said if Bonn decided to join in U.S.-sponsored sanctions and boycotts against the Soviet Union, the European situation would be made even more difficult. According to the sources, Mr Brezhnev added, "we would not like to assume that you will take this slippery path."

He said he assumed the West realized the consequences of heeding boycott calls since West Germany itself had gained significant advantages from the establishment of normal relations with communist Eastern Europe. "It is more logical to think of all this now, instead of regretting the loss later," the Soviet leader added.

He went on to warn the West against any interference in Afghanistan. Moscow did not withdraw them until their reason for being there was removed. "And that must be clear," he said.

SUEDDEUTSCHE ZEITUNG REPORTS ON SOVIET MISSILE PROPOSAL

LD021914 Hamburg DPA in German 1827 GMT 2 Jul 80

[Text] Hamburg--According to a report in SUEDDEUTSCHE ZEITUNG (Thursday edition), the Soviet Union is prepared to talk about a reduction of its SS-20 medium-range missiles and strategic Backfire bomber if the United States is prepared to negotiate on a reduction of its submarine-based Poseidon medium-range missiles. According to "reliable information," the Munich paper says, the Soviet leaders suggested to Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt and Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher that talks on medium-range nuclear missiles in Europe should be conducted by resuming the SALT II negotiations and annexing an agreement, if achieved, to the SALT II agreement.

Given such an arms limitation, the paper says, NATO arms modernization as a counterweight to the Soviet SS-20 missiles would be redundant. At the same time such an annex to SALT II could revive the debate in the United States on the ratification of this agreement. Such negotiations would anticipate SALT III, which is to limit nuclear weapons in Europe. According to the paper, the Soviet proposal is that only Moscow and Washington should negotiate on this issue. "It was the purpose of Genscher's trip to Washington to convey this proposal to the U.S. Government," the paper added.

SCHMIDT BRIEFS CABINET ON MOSCOW TALKS

LD021442 Hamburg DPA in German 1349 GMT 2 Jul 80

[Text] Bonn--The expectations placed on the visit to Moscow by Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt and Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher have been fulfilled.

This assurance was given by the Federal chancellor in Bonn today while briefing the cabinet in detail on his talks with the Soviet leadership. Schmidt said that he and Genscher were thoroughly satisfied with the exchange of views which had been characterized by great clarity and a businesslike manner, according to government spokesman Klaus Boelling.

The chancellor will report to the Bundestag tomorrow on the results of the discussions in a half-hour government statement. The Federal cabinet will meet for 1 hour prior to this to hear a report of the part of the exchange of views with the Soviets which dealt with the subject of nuclear medium-range missiles. According to Boelling, Schmidt expressed himself to the cabinet today as "cautiously optimistic" about the possibilities of talks on these missiles. The German side had indications that possibly "something might be set in motion."

According to Boelling, the chancellor and foreign minister assess their exchange of views with the Soviet leadership as "very useful" because it had "concrete substance," lasting altogether over 8 hours on all important bilateral and international topics and crisis situations. According to Schmidt, it had not been just "flowery talk". The chancellor also stressed to the cabinet that he had presented in Moscow the German and at the same time the joint positions of the EEC and Atlantic Alliance, from which the Federal Republic was not to be separated.

Schmidt also reported on how he had argued with regard to the upset in the military balance in Europe through the Soviet arms drive in medium-range equipment and given his assurance that Bonn would continue in future to make an active contribution to Western defense. According to the government spokesman, the chancellor described as an important political result the fact that the Supreme Soviet leadership had an opportunity to hear authentically what the West's views were.

According to Boelling, there are no plans to brief the opposition before the government statement. State Secretary Guenther van Well of the Foreign Ministry, who is accompanying Genscher to Washington, will brief the NATO council in Brussels tomorrow. All EEC partners would also be informed. Genscher would also certainly bring additional valuable information from the United States on the U.S. assessment of the visit.

SCHMIDT REPORTS TO BUNDESTAG ON VENICE, MOSCOW MEETINGS

DW030841 Cologne WESTDEUTSCHER RUNDFUNK Network in German 0700 GMT 3 Jul 80

[Government statement by Chancellor Helmut Schmidt to the Bundestag in Bonn--live]

[Text] Mr President, ladies and gentlemen: I have already reported to the Bundestag on the meeting of the heads of state and government of the European Community in Venice. What I will do today is to report on the meeting of the heads of government and state of the seven leading democratic, industrial states of the entire world in Venice and on the talks which Mr Genscher and I conducted in Moscow on Monday and Tuesday of this week.

The talks in Venice and in Moscow which took place at the juncture of an extremely difficult situation with regard to political and economic conditions in the world, proved to be useful for peace and useful for our security. At the Venice conference on 22 and 23 June political topics of world significance were of greater weight this time than they had at earlier meetings of the seven heads of state and government. But the world economic topics were not pushed into the background as a result. Rather we confirmed our stance against protectionism in world trade and against the inflation of currencies. We emphasized the significane of insuring domestic bases for development so that developing countries can feed their populations. We appealed to the OPEC states as well as to the communist states to participate responsibly in development assistance. And for our own national economies we set a clear tone above all, with respect to what is not too precisely yet colloquially called disentanglement of energy consumption and economic growth. To put it more precisely: The consumption of energy per Dm1 of additional national product must be reduced. Or in other words, the proportion of the increase in energy consumption to the growth of the gross national product is to be decreased to 0.6 by 1990. We are convinced that we can manage to do that in our country.

I underscore what President Carter said in this context in the United States directly after his return from Venice, namely, what we need is more economic growth with less energy; we must exercise energy austerity; we must reduce oil imports to strengthen our independence. What this means for us, for the Federal Republic of Germany, is that we will consistently continue our policy of moving away from oil.

The meeting of the seven industrial states, in which the president of the EC Commission participates, has turned out in the course of the past 5 years to be an indispensable world political clearinghouse, even if it does not perhaps become directly evident to everybody how necessary and useful this confidential exchanges of opinion is. At this point I would like to emphasize especially the role of Japan in this circle.

Viewed from the angle of world politics, the result of Venice was a harmonious assessment of the situation following the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan and a reaffirmation of the determination of the United States and its European allies to cooperate closely on all topically important international issues. In my dialogue with President Carter in Venice as well as in the circle of the seven heads of state and government I explained in great detail our intentions with regard to our talks in Moscow, and Mr Genscher did so a few days later in the NATO council in Ankara.

We received the full support of our friends and partners. We did not ask anyone for a mandate because we intended to go to Moscow on behalf of the Federal Republic of Germany, in the interest of our country, in the interest of us Germans, meaning in the interest of peace. I repeat: Before we flew to Moscow our friends and partners were informed in detail; they knew that in Moscow we would be talking within the framework of the joint position of the West clearly defined in Venice. This was exactly what happened. Perhaps I should add here that on the eve of the Venice meeting a detailed exchange of ideas took place between President Carter, Secretary of State Muskie, Mr Genscher and myself. Continuing the close and constant German-American consultative process, President Carter and I found complete conformity of views on the matters at issue during this conference.

Immediately prior to departing for Moscow I had, in addition, an opportunity for a lenghty personal talk with the prime minister of the Netherlands, Mr van Agt, who visted me in Hamburg last Sunday. Aside from the discussion of bilateral and European issues, on which I will not touch today, an exchange of opinion naturally took place on the forthcoming visit to the Soviet Union. Agreement between our two governments in assessing the international situation was confirmed again on this occasion.

Ladies and gentlemen, let me deal now with the Moscow talks. In my government statement on 17 January this year I pointed out the urgent international task of avoiding an extension of the crises and of defusing them. I added at that time, and quote: We know in this connection that the Federal Republic of Germany is not a big power, but we are involved within the framework of our possibilities, and they are not small.

I also stated my preparedness on 17 January from this podium to meet the Soviet general secretary.

Since then the Federal Government has represented its clear political line in numerous international meetings. It has contributed significantly to the fact that the international dialogue has gotten going again as of about 2 months ago and that the phase of absence of talking with one another has been overcome. [applause]

In discussions, particularly with France--I have in mind here most of all my meeting with President Giscard d'Estaing and the German-French statement of 5 February--and with the Americans--I have particularly in mind my talks with President Carter and the German-American statement of 5 March--we have outlined our ideas with regard to a Western answer to Afghanistan and to defusing international crises as a whole. We have worked actively and insistently on the resumption of international talks.

We have especially taken part in East-West meetings, meetings which have slowly gotten going again, thank God, since the funeral for President Tito in Belgrade and since the meetings on the occasion of the festivities surrounding the 25th anniversary of the Austrian state treaty in Vienna.

I myself talked in early May in Belgrade with Mr Gierek as well as Mr Honecker. Mr Genscher talked to Mr Gromyko in mid-May in Vienna. Mr Gromyko on his part talked there with his American colleague, Muskie. The talks of the French president on 19 May in Warsaw with General Secretary Brezhnev and First Secretary Gierek, talk whose significance became very clear in our Moscow talks the day before yesterday, were an important additional step toward the resumption of contacts between the leading statesmen of the West and of the East. These were talks and contacts which are absolutely necessary in difficult times in order to keep crises under control. [applause]

Our visit to Moscow followed a clear common line. The Federal Government has demanded a resumption of international talks since the beginning of this year. This has been implemented with our assistance. This is why Minister Genscher and I accepted the invitation to go to Moscow, an invitation which was issued again last spring by the Soviet leadership.

The aim of this visit has been achieved. It has turned out that direct talks in a world situation which, as before, is characterized by a number of grave crises are not merely necessary but also useful. [applause]

The most important aim of our visit was to point out directly to the Soviet leadership our view of the present world situation and of the reasons for it. We wanted to give the Soviet leadership a direct impression of our grave concern and to learn in detail about the Soviet approaches. It was clear from the very beginning that these would not be negotiations in the technical sense aimed at concrete decisions.

We had to very intense meetings with General Secretary Brezhnev, with Premier Kosygin and Foreign Minister Gromyko. At my request there was also a discussion with Defense Minister Ustinov and his chief of General Staff, Marshal Ogarkov. In our exchange of opinion on international problems I again outlined to the Soviet leadership the principles of our foreign policy--the inclusion of our policy in the European Community and the Western alliance. In doing this I was able to make a positive reference to a statement made by Mr Gromyko to minister Genscher in Vienna, saying that the Soviet Union does not intend to drive a wedge between the Federal Republic and its European and Atlantic Alliance partners. [shouts]

I considered this expressly as a confirmation of the fact that the Soviet leadership knows that we cannot be separated from our Western partners. [applause]

Our Soviet discussion partners touched in the course of the meetings on their known criticism of the policy of the United States. We firmly contradicted this approach.

The origins of the Afghanistan crisis and the conclusion to be drawn from it were outlined by both sides very factually and without diplomatic niceties. This discussion was not simple. I have expressly referred to the contents of the German-French statement of February, the statements of the Nine, the statements of th Venice summit of seven and the communique of the Ankara foreign ministers conference last week.

The Soviet leadership knows that we believe that the intervention in Afghanistan must be ended and that the balance must be reestablished in that region. [applause] In order to achieve that, full withdrawal of Soviet troops is necessary and the granting of the right to self-determination. [applause]

We recommended to the Soviet leadership that they accept the exploratory initiative of the Islamic states, as initiated after the second Islamabad conference, because it is in line with the will of the vast majority of the states of the Third World who feel directly involved as a result of the Soviet action in Afghanistan.

The Soviet side has pointed out that it has withdrawn some troops from Afghanistan.

We termed this a step which would be in the proper direction when such a pullout is the beginning of a continuous movement maintained until complete withdrawal. [loud applause] We advocated the view that it is necessary to contemplate a timetable for a political solution. [commotion] The differences of opinion between the Federal Government and the Soviet leadership on the Afghanistan issue were not bridged the day before yesterday.

However, we are convinced that the people in Moscow clearly realize that the Afghanistan problem must be brought to a political solution. [commotion] In the communique we jointly advocated a political settlement; both sides said that such a settlement must not be procrastinated but must be achieved as quickly as possible. I consider this a small step forward along a road we all know will be extremely difficult. Afghanistan is a world problem. The Federal Republic of Germany can merely contribute to the solution of the problem. The solution must be found by the parties directly involved. [applause]

We also exchanged our views in great seriousness on the taking of hostages in Tehran. General Secretary Brezhnev and Foreign Minister Gromyko expressly referred to earlier remarks by the Soviet Government in which the taking of hostages was termed at odds with international law, and condemned as such. We stated that this act at odds with international law must be ended. [applause]

We discussed in detail the questions concerning security and cooperation between East and West. I underscored that military balance is an inalienable precondition for cooperation and for peace in Europe and in the world. The Federal Government time and again advocates the view that this balance must be attained on as low a level as possible. This is why we want concrete results in arms control and arms limitation. Yet, and this I also emphasized expressly, as in the past the Federal Republic of Germany within the framework of the Western alliance, will muster its defense contribution toward the military balance in Europe. [applause]

At this point I would like to insert a remark concerning the military balance in Europe which is not connected with my report on Moscow.

President Giscard d'Estaing in his press conference on 26 June, last Thursday, announced a decision which in my opinion serves the preservation of the balance just as the NATO decision of 12 December 1979, the so-called dual decision. And I share the view of President Giscard d'Estaing that military balance is an inalienable condition for cooperation and security in Europe. [applause]

Our Soviet interlocutors underscored the fundamental significance of the SALT II treaty for limiting strategic potentials, as well as its significance for the relationship between Moscow and Washington. The Soviet interlocutors know, just as our American friends do, that we expressly advocate the ratification and enactment of SALT II. [applause]

I also pointed out in Moscow that President Carter quite clearly adheres to SALT II. The U.S. President had asked me in this connection to convey two questions to the Soviet leadership. This was done. Mr Genscher in the meantime has delivered the answers to Mr Carter.

A detailed, very intensive exchange of ideas was carried out on nuclear medium-range weapons, on Eurostrategic weapons at large. Once again I expounded our profound concern about the growth of the Soviet medium-range potential. I said that it is especially the rapid increase in SS-20 missiles and Backfire bombers which affects the balance in a field which, as far as we in Europe are concerned, is a strategic field. From our talks with Mr Brezhnev 2 years ago, in May 1978, here in Bonn and later on with other Politburo members, the Soviet leadership knew that the Federal Republic and the other partners in the Atlantic Alliance just could not remain idle in the face of this development. It was in keeping with this state of affairs that the balance dual decision of NATO was made on 12 December 1979, a decision to which we made a basic contribution.

I further explained that all alliance partners are determined to support the arms gap closing measures for a limited number of U.S. medium-range weapons as well as to systematically pursue the arms limitation proposal. We advocate the view that negotiations without preconditions be opened now at long last without any preconditions. [applause]

The Soviet side, General Secretary Brezhnev as well as Defense Minister Ustinov, advocated the view that there is no such thing as a change in the balance. They argued that the addition of the SS-20 missile increases neither the number of missiles nor the overall explosive force of this arms category. I drew attention to the extreme military improvement of the Soviet capacity through the SS-20 missile, saying that we are particularly threatened by the large increase in the number of warheads of this arsenal, which more than doubled between 1970 and 1980.

The general secretary defined in detail his stand on the option of the contractual limitation of this arms category. He stated that the Soviet Union cannot be prepared to open negotiations on SALT III before it has gained clarity about the destiny of SALT II. The Soviet Union, he said, continues to insist that its negotiating offer of 6 October 1979--that was the speech which the general secretary gave in East Berlin--stands only if the implementation of NATO's December decision is suspended. And, furthermore, in third place, he said that the Soviet Union is not prepared to accept unilateral limitations of its potentials, not even for a limited period of time.

The Soviet leadership rejected the corresponding idea on my part, which I advanced in public this spring, as being--I quote--in their view and for them unjust--end of quotation. Yet, in fourth place, the general secretary at this point advanced a new, constructive proposal.

The Soviet leadership declared its preparedness to enter bilateral talks with the United States prior to the ratification of SALT II on the limitation of nuclear arms. In these talks bilateral medium-range arms should be discussed and all factors bringing influence to bear on the strategic situation in this field considered. He pointed out that in this connection the so-called "forward-based systems" ought to be included. Please excuse me for using this international term of experts. I will translate it: It means those American nuclear arms which have already been stationed in Europe and which can reach the Soviet Union. He added that the agreements resulting from such talks, however, could be implemented only--that is what he, the general secretary said--after the ratification and implementation of SALT II.

I pointed out in this connection that the Federal Republic of Germany as a nonnuclear power will not take part in such talks and negotiatons, but that it is naturally greatly interested in such talks and negotiations. Due to this interest I ventured the remark that in such a case corresponding Soviet arms should also be included in the talks. I simultaneously stressed the significance of this new Soviet proposal and said that it would be passed immediately to President Carter. I said that I was certain that the proposal would be carefully examined. Mr Genscher personally informed the American President 1 day later, that was yesterday.

After the talk with the President and Secretary of State Muskie, the latter said last night to the U.S. press that the Soviet negotiating proposals will have to be carefully examined by the alliance in a constructive spirit. I will add that this is also in line with the approach of the Federal Government. [applause]

It seems important to me that a new situation has thus been created. The demand to suspend the NATO decision no longer hinders these talks on the mutual limitation of medium-range weapons from beginning. [loud applause]

The normal process preceding negotiations has now been initiated. A suggestion by the United States and its allies to the Soviet Union has received an answer which contains a qualification.

I do not yet consider this a breakthrough, because the success of such talks, which will last a long time, is not yet in the offing. But it seems to me that an opportunity to avoid an uncontrolled arms race in this field has been opened up. In this connection I want to expressly agree with my Moscow host. General Secretary Brezhnev said that even the beginning of such talks can serve the stabilization of the world situation.

Also I want to add that I was particularly impressed on this point by the great seriousness, objectivity and matter-of-factness of the Soviet discussion partners. [applause]

I feel that the Soviet suggestion supports my opinion that talks on the limitation of nuclear medium-range arms are not merely necessary but also possible. Naturally the talks and negotiations will be difficult and long. It was therefore correct to give equal weight to both parts of NATO's December decision: closing the arms gap and limiting armament. We will stick to both parts. [applause]

We also discussed explicitly the continuation of the CSCE process with the Soviet leadership. The communique says in this context that all participants ought to try to contribute to the success of the followup conference planned for Madrid this fall. We made it clear that in order to achieve success, confidence is necessary in the policies of all participants in the conference. So there is a connection between the further development of the international situation and the success of the Madrid meeting.

Both sides expressed their great interest in the fact that the Vienna MBFR negotiations, after 7 years of negotiating, ought to lead to initial concrete results. [applause] Mr Genscher and I stressed the importance of the data issue, pointing out the December suggestion by NATO with regard to an interim result.

The Soviet side indicated that it plans in the near future to make new suggestions in Vienna concentrating on the armed forces of the United States and the Soviet Union, suggestions which are supposed to be an improvement on earlier ones. We will carefully examine these suggestions together with our allies in due time.

Ladies and gentlemen, in addition to this detailed exchange of ideas on international problems, we naturally talked with the Soviet side about the development of bilateral relations. There was agreement that the bilateral treaties and agreements, particularly the treaty of 12 August 1970 and the joint statement of 6 May 1978 will continue to form the basis of our bilateral relations. Both sides again supported strict adherance and full adaptation to the quadripartite agreement of September 1971, which has contributed to calming down the situation in and around Berlin. [applause]

I stressed our interest in further developing relations with the German Democratic Republic. In doing this I pointed out that simplification and extension of visits from the GDR to the Federal Republic of Germany would serve detente between West and East. [applause]

Moreover I supported the cause of those Germans who want to leave the Soviet Union for the Federal Republic of Germany. I particularly stressed the many wishes with regard to family reunification. The Soviet side will benevolently examine this matter. [applause]

In the course of our stay in Moscow and during our talks in Moscow our ambassadors signed the implementation agreement on the long-term economic agreement of 6 May 1978. In doing this we continue our policy of implementing existing treaties. We believe that economic cooperation with the Soviet Union, which serves the mutual interests of our countries, is also of particular political significance. [applause]

We reminded the Soviet leadership, by the way, that we will continue to abide by the agreements in the OECD and COCOM. We also discussed with the Soviet leadership our views concerning the pressing questions raised by the 15-fold increase in the oil price, especially for those developing countries which do not have any domestic oil resources. We drew attention to the role which the industrialized countries of Eastern Europe, too, must play in coping with these problems. The Soviet side recognized this, and this is expressed in the joint communique.

In the view of both sides our cooperation, the German-Soviet cooperation, in the energy sector deserves special significance. We agreed that advance negotiations would take place in the near future between a European consortium, a West European consortium, with the pertinent Soviet authorities on a large scale natural gas project.

May I be allowed to say something in the way of an assessment, ladies and gentlemen. We conducted difficult talks in a difficult international situation. In some important issues the positions were incompatible. You will also find this in the communique. Yet I have no doubt that the Soviet side has now better understood the positions of the Federal Government, which on all essential issues are common positions with our friends and partners. The general secretary expressly said at the conclusion of the talks that in the fields in which we differ, he and his Politburo colleagues intend to consider what we advanced. We, too, will carefully take the views of the other side into consideration also in the future.

All this was part of the objective of our visit. In the opinion of Mr Genscher and in my opinion this objective has been fully met. [applause]

Beyond that in several issues, especially in the difficult problem of the nuclear medium-range weapons, we obtained findings and received hints which might form some beginnings for new solutions. In other fields, too, we listened quite attentively to the Soviet explanations. [commotion] We will carefully and in detain consider the Soviet explanations jointly with our friends and allies. [applause]

The international situation, and especially East-West relations, remains difficult, ladies and gentlemen. The contribution toward solving the existing crises which the Federal Government could and had to make has in fact been made. [applause]

The attitude of the Federal Government in the consultations with our allies and during the talks in Moscow was precisely in keeping with the basic lines of our foreign policy which I have expounded time and again. Our policy is realistic, it is unequivocal, and therefore it is also predictable for others. [loud applause]

Our policy is aimed at peace and security and at the preservation of the interests of all Germans. [applause] May I be allowed to repeat verbatim what I told our Soviet hosts in Moscow on Monday--the three pillars of our policy are as follows:

First, the solid inclusion of the Federal Republic of Germany in the Atlantic Alliance and the European Community, realizing the common basic values and interests with the United States and our other allies; [applause]

Second, the policy of cooperation and detente vis-a-vis our Eastern neighbors; [applause]

Third, the policy of equal partnership with the states of the Third World. [applause]

I also want to repeat what I stated at the United Nations in May 1978 on international crisis management, namely, that it requires the political will for, first, avoiding provocations; second, unmistakably expounding to others our own options; third, defusing dangerous situations through a readiness to compromise; and fourth, making it possible for the parties involved to save face. [applause]

These explanations at the time--it was 2 years ago, long before Afghanistan--generally met with approval in the UN General Assembly as a theoretical concept. What matters is to convert such a concept into the actual practice of states. [applause]

This, ladies and gentlemen, is what the Federal Government is doing, not with big words but with circumspect action. [applause]

Our security, peace are not preserved by means of big speeches but solely by means of persistent hard work. [loud applause]

'AUTHORITIES' SEE SCHMIDT MOSCOW VISIT AS 'POSITIVE'

LD031154 Paris Domestic Service in French 1100 GMT 3 Jul 80

[Text] The first official reaction recorded in France since Chancellor Schmidt's trip to Moscow: The French authorities call this trip positive and stress that it has contributed to maintaining and extending possibilities of communication between East and West--something which France has always considered to be essential, particularly in times of international tension.

FRANCOIS-PONCET SUPPORTS UN GUARANTEES FOR AFGHAN SOVEREIGNTY

LD030739 Paris LE FIGARO in French 28-29 Jun 80 p 3

[Olivier Pognon report: "Our Policy Will be Strong and Active"]

[Excerpt] [French Foreign Minister] Jean Francois-Poncet mentioned the various "crises" now facing the world in a speech to the Senate yesterday. In face of the Afghanistan crisis, which is "the most serious," French policy "can neither be one of complacency or tone of alignment; it will be strong and active," he stated.

He stressed that it is important to make the Soviet Union understand this language by giving it "its full weight via a direct meeting between the highest officials." "That is why everybody now recognizes, as the U.S. President did in Venice, that the Warsaw meeting was necessary and useful."

The foreign minister expressed the view that "it is not up to Afghanistan to remove outside obstacles because Afghanistan is the victim of them." "It is up to the states which, because they are neighbors or because of their power, are in a position to influence that country's future, to impose the necessary constraints." "They must promise to respect Afghanistan's sovereignty, give up trying to draw it into some form of military association and hence, more importantly, stop sending their own forces into that country."

"The United Nations would probably be useful in giving these pledges the required solemnity and guarantees," Mr Francois-Poncet continued. Furthermore he added that the withdrawal of a number of "Soviet military units represents a new element which will only have a really positive meaning if other withdrawals follow until all the troops have been pulled out." Mr Francois-Poncet also welcomed the "balanced" nature of the declaration on the Middle East adopted by the European Council on 13 June which is "very largely inspired by French ideas."

Regarding the Middle East, Afghanistan and the U.S. hostages in Iran, "Europe is emerging and asserting itself," he said. "This emergence is sparking off impatience and criticism from those it annoys but it is welcomed with hope by the vast majority of countries which see Europe's voice as a voice of peace, progress and disinterest."

MARCHAIS CLAIMS COLLAPSE OF MEDIA'S AFGHANISTAN CAMPAIGN

LD021453 Paris L'HUMANITE in French 21 Jun 80 p 7

[Unattributed report on speech delivered by PCF Secretary General Georges Marchais at a rally in Denain on 20 June: "12,000 People Assembled in Denain"]

[Excerpt] Georges Marchais discussed the political situation and notably the press campaign about events in Afghanistan.

For some 10 days, he stated, all the television channels, radio stations and most newspapers--from LE MATIN DE PARIS to L'AURORE and including Jacques Fauvet's LE MONDE--have acted in collusion in spreading the most alarming rumors about the situation in the Afghan capital.

"The situation is disastrous for the Soviet Army," according to one headline. "Kabul Is Falling to the Rebels," another announced. "The city's outskirts have been put to fire and the sword," according to a third.

Some of these unscrupulous heralds of doom have not hesitated--in order to make their imaginings credible--to follow through on their lies. Indeed, according to them they were actually in the Kabul inferno; they were eyewitnesses to the city's encirclement; they saw everything with their own eyes. All the French people could do was to believe what they said.

We communists however said: Take care! Those people have lied shamefully to our people too often in the recent past for their word to be believed now. These are the people who claimed that Giscard and Barre would end unemployment, raise purchasing power, promote liberalism and ensure France's independence.

What do we now see? Unemployment has trebled in 6 years; the purchasing power of working class families has declined; brutal repression has been used against struggling workers; our regions' heritage has been destroyed and the government is aligning with Germany and showing allegiance to the United States.

Remember that it was the same sections of the media which just a few months ago waged bitter campaigns against the Cuban people and against Vietnam and Kampuchea, those heroic martyrs of imperialism

Today evidence is pouring in from all sides to confirm that in this case too they are waging a malicious and totally untrue propaganda campaign.

So, as you see, friends and comrades, there are people who stop at nothing to try to deceive you. Whether it be related to the specific facts of your daily life or to the international situation, the only thing which matters in their eyes is to harm the forces of socialism, harm the peoples who are fighting for liberation and harm the struggling workers. In a word, their aim is to destroy anything which is moving in the right direction in France and in the world.

That is why our newspaper, L'HUMANITE, decided to find out the truth about events in Afghanistan. Rather than take the class enemy's so-called "reports" at face value we sent to Kabul (as we did a few months ago with Martine Monod), Jacques Coubard, one of our best journalists whose honesty and ability have long been established and cannot be questioned.

What has Jacques Coubard told us in the past 48 hours?

--First, that Kabul is not encircled either by the Soviet Army or the rebels.

--Second, that he has seen nothing in the Afghan capital to suggest that it is a city under siege.

Of course, L'HUMANITE's journalist writes, that does not mean that the activity of reactionary groups is not posing any problem and that everything is going as well as it might be. However, Coubard concludes, everything that is being published in Paris is light years from the truth.

This is the situation in the Afghan capital at the moment as experienced personally by an eyewitness.

Since the publication of these reports by L'HUMANITE'S journalist, the solid wall of lies has started to crack. This is why the prophets of doom who were beginning to take their wishes for facts are now losing their cool. Their cool and their dignity.

Of these prophets of doom Radio Luxembourg commentator Jean Ferniot takes the prize for shame. He pours insults on our newspaper L'HUMANITE which are reminiscent of another age--insults which destroy any respect for their author and dishonor his position.

After having mutilated, distorted and caricatured our Comrade Jacques Coubard's statements, Jean Ferniot dares to assert that our newspaper is not really French in some way but is above all intended to be read in Moscow!

He gets carried away and adds that a journalist now has to have a Communist Party card in his pocket to be able to go to Kabul.

Unfortunately for Mr Ferniot and for all those who for the past 10 days have merely stormed against Afghanistan, witnesses who could not be suspected of nurturing pro-PCF sympathies have just confirmed the observations made by L'HUMANITE's journalists. For instance, German journalist Reiner Wolfgramm has just stated, on his return from Kabul, that he is--and I quote--"skeptical about the existence of violent fighting near the Afghan capital."

At the same time THE FINANCIAL TIMES, citing a journalist from the French magazine L'EXPRESS, published this important admission which I give you as it stands: First with regard to an Afghan region where the bourgeois press believed there was violent fighting--I quote THE FINANCIAL TIMES--"the Western reports on a major battle seem to be unfounded."

Regarding the situation in Kabul itself--still quoting THE FINANCIAL TIMES--"Diplomats describe as whimsical rumors that the rebels had planned an attack on Kabul."

As you see, friends and comrades, their face has collapsed once again. Once again the truth is gradually coming to the fore. Basically there is an initial lesson which can be learned from this experience: After making every effort to prevent the Afghan people from successfully carrying out the progressive changes in which they have been involved for more than 2 years, imperialism is using the development of the situation in Afghanistan in a shameful way to restrospectively justify the revival of the arms race already decided on an to retrospectively try to ensure the success of the previously launched Olympic boycott campaign. Finally, in a more general way imperialism's aim is to discredit socialism and preserve its system of exploitation and oppression.

L'HUMANITE Editorial

[Yves Moreau editorial: "An Initial Withdrawal"]

[Text] A "surprise," a "political maneuver," a "piece of bluff"--this is all the commentators can say, embarrassed as they are by the withdrawal of Soviet units from Afghanistan. This withdrawal in effect does not fit in well with the campaign which has been waged in recent weeks according to which everything was going from bad to worse in Kabul.

In the light of this,it could in fact be a matter of no more than an "alleged withdrawal," according to both FRANCE-SOIR and the West German newspaper DIE WELT. The same is being said at NATO headquarters in Brussels, too. "According to the information we have," they said there yesterday, "the Soviet troops are being confronted with increased pressure from the Afghan resistance fighters, and under these circumstances it is difficult to imagine how troops can be withdrawn in any significant manner."

The fact is that Western propaganda is prey to its own imagination.

But Giscard d'Estaing himself acknowledged yesterday in Venice that, contrary to all the rumors in circulation, there had been no reinforcement of the Soviet military presence in Afghanistan recently. And the French head of state regards the planned withdrawal as "significant."

How can one deny that it is significant, when a whole division and 100 tanks are involved?

So light is beginning to be shed on the reality of the situation in Afghanistan. The reality is just as Jacques Coubard has described it in his reports, which have aroused so much righteous indignation because they told the truth.

Today the "bluffers"--the real ones--have no other recourse than to admit themselves "surprised."

But they are not abandoning their undertaking and are shouting about a "political maneuver" in connection with the withdrawal.

How many such maneuvers do they have to carry out on their side?

Why will Carter not give the order to repatriate some of the considerable number of personnel which the United States maintains at foreign bases? Why for example will he not evacuate Guantanamo, as the Cuban Government requests? Why will he not keep his own promises to end the U.S. occupation in South Korea? Why will he not withdraw the formidable armada concentrated in the Indian Ocean?

The U.S. general staff permanently maintains about 500,000 men outside the United States, sometimes against the wishes of the government concerned, often to perpetuate dictatorial regimes. Often, too, to maintain tensions which are a danger to peace.

This must be remembered in order to assess properly the declaration on Afghanistan for which Carter obtained approval at the Venice summit and which regrettably Giscard d'Estaing signed.

At the time when the withdrawal of a division from Afghanistan affirms the temporary nature of the mission assigned to the Soviet contingent in the country, all efforts should be directed not to poisoning the international situation but on the contrary to promoting a political settlement in Afghanistan.

The foundations for such a settlement exist. They can be found in the Afghan Government's proposals. Essentially it would be a matter of providing that country with the assurances it needs against all external interference. Commitments in this sphere undertaken by its neighbors, Pakistan and Iran, would be guaranteed by the United States and the USSR. France could also probably be involved in this. Thus Afghanistan would be allowed to be a nonaligned state as it wishes.

This settlement would obviously remove the causes which made the Soviet Union send troops into Afghanistan.

It is obvious that such a solution is desired in Moscow. This is why Brezhnev in his recent message to Giscard d'Estaing says that the USSR Government's decision involves an "initial withdrawal."

LE MONDE SEES 'ENCOURAGEMENT' FOR CARTER FROM EUROPE TRIP

[Editorial: "Mr Carter in Southern Europe"]

[Text] President Carter's European tour which ends this Thursday, 26 June, will have taken him after the Venice summit to Belgrade, Madrid and Lisbon successively. Its full importance can be seen in the light of the Afghan crisis and the ideas this has inspired in the U.S. Government chief. The Soviet Union's brutal intervention in Afghanistan found U.S. democracy disarmed, both literally and figuratively. In any case it proved powerless to "deter" Moscow from extending its zone of direct domination. Therefore Washington had to react by consolidating its positions in southern Europe.

The Belgrade visit enabled Mr Carter to sign a joint statement with the Yugoslav leaders on the international situation, showing their agreement on current problems. In addition he reaffirmed U.S. attachment to a "strong and independent" Yugoslavia--a statement which, without involving an official guarantee of its territorial integrity, is close enough to this to be clearly understood by the Kremlin. How these assurances would be expressed in case of foreign pressure or internal subversion could naturally not be included in an official document. These eventualities are possibly no more clearly defined in Washington's own "policy planning," since the collapse of Iran had not been foreseen.

In Madrid Mr Carter was bound to welcome Spain's return to democracy, promise to support its candidacy for membership of the Atlantic pact and hope that it enters the Common Market. NATO membership--which, according to Mr Suarez' government, will not be on the agenda before 1983--poses a tricky problem. The socialists have come out against it, maintaining that it is enough for their country to remain linked to the United States by the existing treaty of friendship and cooperation which gives four military bases in exchange for military and economic aid.

This treaty is due to be renegotiated next year. Madrid intends to take this opportunity to raise the question of Spain's becoming a full partner in the Western defense system. President Carter, who had talks with Socialist Party leader Felipe Gonzalez, will probably have assessed that party's objections to Mr Suarez' "Atlantic" intentions. In any case Mr Carter's visit to Madrid completes the new Spain's reintegration into the U.S. partners of the first rank. In Portugal, a founder member of the Atlantic Alliance, Mr Carter found interlocutors prepared to make another step in solidarity. Mr Sa Carneiro's government is apparently prepared to grant even more advantageous conditions than now exist for the location of the U.S. Beja and Lagues bases in the Azores. The government is apparently also contemplating the provision of permanent anchorage facilities for a U.S. Navy aircraft carrier in Portuguese waters which would considerably increase the U.S. strike power in the European and even the Middle East theaters.

Although the visits made by Mr Carter on his way back to Washington cannot be described as a "success" any more than a failure, it has to be admitted that each stop has given him encouragement. While the United States, both in the White House and among the public, is passing through a phase of disenchantment with regard to the European Nine, regarded as both recalcitrant and too impulsive, he discovered on his journey a different Europe more "colored," more lively perhaps and more constant, from his viewpoint, than the Europe of great capitals pitying the American decline.

SOCIAL-DEMOCRAT'S LONGO REPORTS CEAUSESCU'S VIEWS ON AFGHANISTAN

LD021904 Rome Domestic Service in Italian 1700 GMT 2 Jul 80

[Text] Pietro Longo, the secretary of the Italian Social-Democratic Party, returned to Rome today from Bucharest where he paid an official 2-day visit to Romania. Speaking of his meeting with President Ceausescu, Longo recalled the worries of the Romanian representatives over Afghanistan. Though showing great anxiety for the state of international relations, Ceausescu believes that the worst part of the crisis is now over. The conviction of the Romanian leader, Longo said, stems from a series of talks Ceausescu had in Warsaw recently with representatives of the USSR and other Eastern countries.

GOVERNMENT UNVEILS ANTI-INFLATION PLAN INCLUDING TAX CLAMP DOWN

Cossiga Statement

AU030840 Rome ANSA in English 0815 GMT 3 Jul 80

[Text] Rome, July 3 (ANSA)--Premier Francesco Cossiga went on Italian television last night to outline the thrust of economic and tax policies approved by the government in a lengthy cabinet meeting that went on into the wee hours of the night. Cossiga recalled that at the time the government was formed it pledged to draw up a medium-term economic package to be debated with business leaders, organized labor and the regional governments. He said that the cabinet attached special political importance to the packet which was seen as a way to cope with the country's economic ills in a reasonable, concrete and decisive manner.

The premier noted that prices in Italy were rising at a rate of around 20 percent a year. Inflation lowered the competitiveness of Italian products and threatened job levels, he said. Italy's foreign accounts were also in trouble. On the basis of data over the first half of this year it looked like the country's balance of payments would chalk up a deficit of around 8,000 billion lire by December. Oil hikes have also taken their toll and energy policies being implemented to combat this problem will take some time before their effects are felt, he said. Added to this picture were increases in the cost of raw material which Italy, as primarily a transformation economy, is obliged to import.

Cossiga also spoke of the excessive consumption of certain sectors of the population compared to the country's production capacities. All of these factors, plus the grave economic crisis effecting all of the industrialized nations made it imperative that the government stepped in with the effective measures before problems began to arise with regard to the Italian currency, which could force the cabinet to take steps which would leave unaltered and possibly worsen the causes of inflation, he said. In this spirit, Cossiga continued, the government met with business and labor leaders yesterday. He made an appeal to these forces to negotiate direct measures to contain the cost of labor per product unit, to foster worker mobility and to review the January 25, 1975, accord regarding the mechanism linking wage hikes to the cost of living. Cossiga lauded the government's get-tough attitude to tax evasion and said that steps would be taken to equitably share out the financial burden of pension and health benefits.

Details of Plan

AU030858 Rome ANSA in English 0800 GMT 3 Jul 80

[Text] Rome, July 3 (ANSA)--The government last night unveiled its economic packet to combat inflation and defend the purchasing power of the lira.

The measures include an extention of the system of tax receipts to additional categories of self-employed workers, modifications of the value-added tax, control over cash register receipts, innovations in warehouse accounting, full deduction from income tax of medical expenses and tax exemption for a company's expenditures for research and study. The packet aims at clamping down hard on tax evasion, control over internal demand, support for exports and research, and guidelines and incentives for investments.

On the basis of measures approved by the cabinet last night the state is expected to recover 1,000 billion lire from tax evaders; 650 billion more in revenue from the value-added tax; 120 billion from changes in the gasoline manufacturing tax; 800 billion more for the register tax; 350 billion more for pension and health benefit payments paid by self-employed workers; and 330 billion more for the alcohol manufacturing tax. Altogether the state coffers should receive an additional 3250 billion lire.

The government also sought to distribute fairly the financial burden of pension and health benefits. The value-added-tax and alcohol and gasoline taxes have also been shifted to all consumers, including foreigners in Italy. In fact, the interministerial price committee last night, in accordance with a government proposal, upped the price of a liter of gasoline by 50 lire. The Finance Ministry said that the hike was determined by the increase in the value-added-tax (38 lire) and the manufacturing tax (12 lire). The sale price of super is now 750 lire a liter (88 cents). The modifications made in the value-added-tax are expected to have only a limited effect on the general price level as the recovery of the basic annual yield corresponds to less than 0.5 percent of internal consumption. The measures also aimed at bolstering exports.

The entire packet is to be seen in the context of budget policies aimed at cutting public spending (by 2,800 billion lire) and swelling revenues (by 3,200 billion). To this must be added interventions for specific spending (3300 billion) such as contributions for pension and health benefits, investments in southern Italy, and aid to crisis-ridden industries. The overall needs of the public sector will drop from 40,750 billion to 38,000 billion.

The cabinet last night also set up a special investment fund to be created by dipping 0.5 percent into workers' pay packets annually. This fund will be run by a special section of "IMI" (the Italian Institute for Financing Personal and Real Property) and workers' representatives. The contribution will be made by workers effective July 1 of this year. This innovation is expected to bring in 400 billion lire over the first six months. Labor Minister Franco Foschi told newsmen that the fund would be used in its first year of life for interventions to support employment levels in southern Italy. Upon leaving Chigi Palace where the cabinet meeting was held, Budget Minister Giorgio La Malfa last night voiced his satisfaction over the economic packet adopted by the government. He said that the cabinet stood solidly and unitedly behind the measures. He also announced that at noon today Italy's three financial ministers (La Malfa, Filippo Pandolfi and Franco Reviglio) would hold a press conference at the Treasury on the medium-term program and measures adopted.

PCI'S COSSUTTA COMMENTS ON DC, LEFTWING LOCAL ADMINISTRATIONS

LD021511 Milan L'UNITA in Italian 25 Jun 80 pp 8-9

[PCI Directorate member Armando Cossutta 24 June report to PCI Central Committee: "Unitary PCI Proposal for Leftwing Democratic Majorities in the Regional and Local Administrations"]

[Excerpts] I believe that the proposal that we have made cannot be faulted. We have said: The need for a political leadership in which both parties of the workers movement are represented remains unchanged; the evolution of Italian and international affairs could provide no more convincing confirmation of this government solution which we have proposed.

But, if a solution were still to prove unfeasible either through the stupidity, blindness and arrogance of the DC as it now is, encouraged by the socialist comrades' lack of resolution, or because we communists judged the structural and program conditions to be inadequate to persuade us to enter the government, it is not true that the only remaining alternative would be another early dissolution of parliament and another general election. Such an eventuality, to which we are opposed, must be and can be averted. It must therefore not be used as blackmail against us or as a sword of Damocles weakening any influence over the DC.

It is by no means to be taken for granted that a vigorous democratic recovery and especially the resumption of a strong unity of conduct between the PSI and the PCI could not lead to a different kind of government which, although the PCI would still be in opposition, could have a less negative political quality and could at last introduce a responsible economic and social policy, a morally cleaner and administratively more efficient state policy and above all a foreign policy which, having--at least as much as the other European countries belonging to the Atlantic pact--a greater margin of autonomy, could act more decisively in support of the detente and peace policy.

We have said this. But we would like to add another idea concerning political methods.

Those who object that we should not have demanded another government because there was not yet one ready or because a solution involving a more advanced, more leftwing, fork of regeneration was impractical probably believe--falling into a typical intellectualist and elitist error--that such a new solution can be prepared at the negotiating table, essentially or solely by means of meetings, exchange of proposals, negotiations and accords or perhaps roundtable discussions among the party "chiefs of staff" rather than principally through the conscious and enthusiastic mobilization of the masses, by altering the balance of forces in society and winning over people's minds. But none of this would ever be possible--and indeed instead of achieving an encouragement of the masses' intervention, they would be frustrated--if our opposition battle revealed reservations or restraints, hesitations or apprehensions in asserting, whenever appropriate, the need to change the government.

Let us come to another decisive political point: Relations with the DC. I do not believe there are any doubts among us that we must address our clearest and most determined opposition to the present majority of that party, which determines its policy and its conduct, and that we must wage a consistent and steadfast struggle against it.

The people who now steer the DC advocate a policy of splitting the workers and peoples masses, of exclusively defending all the positions of domination and power that the DC occupies in society and within the state and therefore of basically preserving the status quo in all fields. Therefore, although not all the DC is unanimously aligned with this stubborn and negative policy, the fact remains that in view of the currently prevalent attitude within it it is impossible to believe that there can be any cooperation with the DC at the local or national levels. Therefore, we are in clear conflict with the DC. Any form of cooperation with it is ruled out. As a result questions have emerged and are still emerging concerning the political outlook and our very strategy. Let us discuss this by all means.

It seems to me that it is not a matter of altering our general line. Our general--strategic--line derives from our analysis of the forces and this historical, political and social progresses that have emerged since the birth of the unitary state and of the workers movement and has led us to identify the bloc and social and political forces by organizing which the working class--the new ruling class--can lead and progressively realize the revolution in Italy (and Western Europe). [paragraph continues]

To change this strategy would imply not keeping abreast of the times but turning back.

This strategy--which is based on the meeting of the three major political and ideological components of the Italian workers and peoples movement--socialist, communist and Christian--has been conceived and pursued to make it possible--in the conditions in which Italian capitalist society historically finds itself now--to carry out, within a democratic framework and with respect for freedom, all the thorough transformations which have become essential to prevent the country from declining inexorably; to further develop democracy, salvaging it from the corporative disintegration to which capitalism is leading it; and to open the road to socialist building in Italy.

Nor must it be forgotten (as has in fact been done) that it is a strategy for transforming and regenerating not only the economic, social and state reality, but also to transform and regenerate the political reality, the political world and political relations. It is therefore clear that, contrary to what people have commonly been told and led to believe, our strategy is not something designed for "getting along with the DC."

What I would like to stress is that we have failed, both in theory and in practice, to draw a very important--indeed, decisive--distinction so as to clarify our conduct, certain errors and how to correct them--a distinction that has already been drawn on more than one occasion but which has not been sufficiently borne in mind in our own and other people's assessments and particularly in our specific conduct.

Our general line is not reflected solely, does not boil down to, is not restricted to and above all cannot be identified with (or, as the current saying goes, "lumped together with") the policy of democratic solidarity or even--if and when it is formed--the government of national unity including the PCI. These are aspects and tools for satisfactorily tackling the emergency situation, for extricating the country from the vise of the very grave crisis that is squeezing it; of course they belong to and are embraced within this strategy, but they do not themselves contain it in its entirety and, therefore, must not be confused with it.

In short, the strategic sphere and the tactical sphere are quite separate; while it is true that the former must not boil down to the latter, neither must the tactical sphere conflict with the strategic sphere. Our experiences in 1976-78 (our abstention and participation in the democratic solidarity majority) belonged to the tactical sphere, that is, they were ways of gradually implementing our strategy in the successive situations that came about.

They had to remain separate from our strategy, although in harmony with it and maintaining a relationship and consistency with it. And indeed this is how they were initially conceived: Their objective was not--I repeat--unity for unity's sake nor to reach agreement with the DC, come what may. The objective was to insure that both parties of the workers movement, with our own party in the forefront, could act in the representative assemblies, in society and throughout the country to bring forth the popular forces which are present within the DC but encapsulated within its moderate policy and at the same time to advance a program of reform and regeneration, starting with the things for which there is now a pressing need, so as to extricate the country from the mire, from corruption, from inefficiency, from terrorism, from the depletion of its resources and assets, from mistrust and from fear of the future.

This objective was correct and remains correct. It is therefore right that the united workers movement--the PCI and PSI--within respect for mutual autonomy, close ranks with its own program, among other things, to better develop its own initiative with respect to the DC. The PCI and the PSI, in short, can and must perform a political action, without abandoning their revolutionary outlook, that will create one of the preconditions for the political transition--or leap forward--that will guarantee the building of a new kind of society.

If this fails to happen, however, and if instead there is merely a form of cooperation sought and accepted by the workers movement, by one or both of its parties, without the desire and awareness of the need to shift, to change and to regenerate the DC's government conduct--of course this would also imply who knows what kinds of conflicts, crises and splits in that party--then this cooperation would inevitably become subordinate and could not fail to prove damaging to both the country and the workers movement--the PCI and the PSI--whose goals, attitudes and very image it would in fact obscure.

Coming to the present, the experience of the PSI's cooperation with the DC has revealed a weak point which also constitutes the source of our concern and criticism in respect to the PSI, although we do intend to keep alive and as strong as possible our relations with the socialist comrades, despite the fact that the PSI is in government and the PCI is in opposition.

The weak point is that to guarantee so-called "governability," I would say, the PSI is in fact neglecting not all class awareness, but more simply the necessary substance for a form of government action that is in the least dignified. Therefore, in the long-term, the country's governability is not being guaranteed but in fact its crisis and therefore its real governability are being aggravated. This stance can objectively lead to a split in the worker masses and to even greater power arrogance from the DC.

The self-criticism which we communists have performed and must continue to perform is that during the experiences of the 1976-78 period the PCI's action with respect to the DC did not achieve its predetermined objective and indeed that it helped create a number of doubts and disappointments with respect to our own party--even doubts concerning our strategic line--on the part of its fundamental masses. This was an error. It is an error that we will never repeat.

But, while those experiences have been subjected to a necessary and constructive criticism so they will not be repeated, this must not lead to the criticism being extended or, worse, to a summary sentence being pronounced against the party's strategy, to demands for the abolition of its long-term unitary policy for revolutionary objectives.

In other words, when all the wealth, the innovative potential, the aspects of transformation and the scope for the future inherent in our general line are completely subordinated and leveled out in our ordinary (though necessary) everyday activities, we inevitably make the error of limiting ourselves to and lapsing into the shortsighted and short-winded game of a pragmatism without fundamental principles and objectives and remain constantly undecided and hesitant; then the major goal of transformation and regeneration fades into the mists of the future--as it did for the Social Democrats.

But if, on the other hand, we relied solely on a formalistic loyalty to a reiterated proclamation of our strategic line, of its revolutionary lynchpins and its final goals, without adjusting it and correlating it to consistent political action which will, step by step, advance things toward the general outlook we are aiming at, it would mean reducing ourselves to drum beating but disarmed prophets and therefore--as was the case with the old Bordiguism--to waiting passively for a future which would also fade into the mists.

Following the recent election results leftwing democratic administration were returned in almost all the places where they already existed and others can be built on the basis of the results of the vote. Of course this does not depend solely on ourselves. It depends also on the attitude of the socialist comrades and of the other democratic and leftwing parties. We urge these parties to permit their prompt formation on the basis of clear agreements on methods and policy. Such agreements can only be local, since they must reflect the real balance of forces, the specific attitudes of the various political groups and the contents of the program. There must be no attempts to hegemonize local government formulas from above; government intervention and interference is absolutely unacceptable.

At present, of course, attention is centering on options concerning the formation of local administrations. Our option is clear. We hope the same applies to the other parties. The striking thing about the polemics in the press over the past few days is that some people maintain that they can form administrations with or without the communists, without distinction.

Leftwing democratic administrations are not the same as center-left, three-party or the so-called secular ones. It is another matter if there are insufficient votes and seats to form government agreements with the PCI. But, in fact there are very few cases of this kind, compared to the existing leftwing democratic administrations. So, if the votes and seats are there, why should they not be formed? In other words we should be told the political, program and methodological reasons which make center-left agreements, for instance, preferable to leftwing ones. That is to say, it should be explained why votes were sought and gained to consolidate the leftwing administrations only to leave them unconsolidated.

Problems of governability? No, at least not in any of the cases we are talking about, because if the PSI really does want to form leftwing democratic administrations there would be no possibility of governability anywhere without such administrations. We are not talking about administrations limited to unitary relations between the PCI and PSI, but ones open to participation on an equal footing with other democratic parties. It must be made clear that our proposal to the PSDI and PRI is not in the least restricted to cooperation in the so-called "difficult administrations." Problems of content? Perhaps. But in that case this must be discussed and it must be shown specifically that a policy of regeneration can be better implemented with the DC than with the PCI. It must also be clear--with no possible misunderstandings--that if the PCI is not in the council it will obviously be in opposition.

It is a fact that the election campaign has highlighted the existence of a combination of problems--some not new, others that have become more acute--such as the problems concerning party structure, the role of the sections as centers of democratic life and initiative and what kind of relationship the federations can establish with them, the cadres policy and the training and development of the leadership groups.

There is also some cause for concern with certain instances. Though not major, of personalistic behavior and, on the other hand, a kind of depersonalization of the party. We absolutely must not lose any of our ideas or customs, but we must also react against any tendency to make the party a rather anonymous and mechnical entity. The party must be a living and human reality. More than ever we need leaders with the characteristics of popular leaders, whose personalities are outstanding for their competence, political skill and cultural qualities but also for their relations with the broad masses of workers and citizens.

The election result once again indicates the need but also the opportunity to impart most clearly to the party the mass character which we consider essential. With regard to renewing membership cards, this means not only making every effort to achieve 100 percent success in the federations where this goal has not yet been reached, but also to go beyond it where it has and thus seize every opportunity where the election results have been positive, starting with the major cities, ranging from Turin to Naples and Rome, where the proportion of members to voters is still very unsatisfactory--but also where the results have shown that we really are at a "high water mark," as a result of a decisive increase in the party's organized strength.

ANSA: STRAIN SEEN EMERGING AMONG LEFTISTS IN LABOR UNIONS

AU030845 Rome ANSA in English 0825 GMT 3 Jul 80

[Text] Rome, July 3 (ANSA)--The political and union world was still in a flurry today over the row at a rally of CGIL-CISL-UIL [Italian Federation of Trade Unions-Italian Confederation of Labor Unions-Italian Union of Labor] union leaders in Milan Monday. The secretary-general of the (Socialist-Republican) "UIL" trade union central, Giorgio Benvenuto, was hooted down by "CGIL" (pro-communist) union members at the meeting.

In an interview to the Milan daily IL GIORNO, Benvenuto warned of the growing conflict between socialists and communists and said that if things went on like this this prospects looked dim. What purpose was there in reproposing the French scheme of rupture between the two leftwing parties, he asked.

The "CGIL" last night issued a note condemning the "episode of intolerance" and voicing the hope that it would not in any way compromise the unitary atmosphere within the CGIL-CISL-UIL federation. Socialist Deputy Loris Fortuna, deputy speaker in the house said that France was being used as a model. "The communists cannot digest the socialist growth", he said. Liberal Party Deputy Secretary Antonio Patuelli sent Benvenuto a note stating that an attempt has been made to intimidate a laic union force like "UIL" because it expresses a line which is not under the sway of, or secondary to, that of the PCI.

IL POPOLO, the official organ of the Christian Democrat Party took a similar view. An article signed by Editor-in-Chief Luciano Radi said that the gravity of the episode lay in its connection with the tough and strident campaign that the PCI has been waging against the socialists for months.

UNIONS ANNOUNCE DAILY 4 HOUR AIRPORT CONTROLLERS STRIKE

AU022030 Rome ANSA in English 1949 GMT 2 Jul 80

[Text] Rome, July 2 (ANSA)--Traffic operations at Italian airports will be unmanned for four-hours a day from July 8 to 15 as a result of an airport strike staged by members of the "CGIL" [Italian Federation of Trade Unions], "CISL" [Italian Confederation of Labor Unions] and "UIL" [Italian Union of Labor] labor confederations.

The nationwide walkout of tower control and traffic operators was announced by the unions today to protest the government's failure to live up to its legislative commitment to revamp the job statuses of the striking categories. The coordinating committee of the three organizations dispatched (?telegrams) today to the Transportation Ministry, the commissioner for civilian flight assistance and the aeronautics department of the Defense Ministry.

DENMARK ADVOCATES COMMENCEMENT OF SALT III NEGOTIATIONS

LD010817 Copenhagen AKTUELT in Danish 26 Jun 80 p 8

[Connie Pedersen report: "Denmark Proposes NATO Talks With the Soviet Union"]

[Text] Ankara--Foreign Minister Kjeld Olesen, in his speech at the NATO foreign ministers' meeting in Ankara yesterday, advocated that NATO offer the Soviet Union real negotiations on limiting the numbers of medium-range missiles in Europe.

"There must be no doubt that Denmark supports real negotiations," the foreign minister said at the meeting, which is expected to be dominated by the missile question and the Afghanistan crisis.

The Danish move, which will hardly please the United States, intends that negotiations can be started even though the SALT II agreement is not approved by the Senate in Washington.

When in December the NATO nations reached their decision on the deployment of the 572 American medium-range missiles in Western Europe, they proposed that negotiations on European strategic arms would take place within the framework of a SALT III agreement. The Danish Government's view is that this can no longer be expected.

West German Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt's proposal of a 3-year freeze on the production of medium-range nuclear missiles in both East and West is seen by Kjeld Olesen as a call to negotiations within the 3 years before the missiles are deployed in Europe.

Sources in the minister's delegation do not think that Jimmy Carter's controversial letter to the West German Federal chancellor is connected with Schmidt's proposal for a freeze; it is rather an expression of general American dissatisfaction with Schmidt's visit to Moscow on 30 June, they say.

However, they expect that Helmut Schmidt will reiterate to the Russians NATO's determination on medium-range missiles and on Afghanistan.

Kjeld Olesen does not regard the partial Soviet withdrawal announced this week as the withdrawal that the West is demanding. It is rather a regrouping. But it does show something of the pressure to which the Soviet Union is being subjected, he said.

MITSOTAKIS RETURNS, MAKES STATEMENT ON TALKS

AT021055 Athens Domestic Service in Greek 1830 GMT 1 Jul 80

[Text] This evening Prime Minister Rallis was visited by Foreign Minister Mitsotakis, who returned to Athens this afternoon and who briefed the prime minister on the results of his visit. As known, after attending the NATO spring foreign ministers conference, the foreign minister visited Munich where he spoke at the university of the Bavarian capital on current problems of Greek foreign policy.

In a statement Mitsotakis, among other things, mentioned the following:

"I can tell you that I am returning generally satisfied from my visit. The NATO foreign minister's conference was a success. The talks I have had with the foreign ministers of the countries which interest us, that is the United States, West Germany, Britain and with other colleagues were useful."

I AVYI Comments on Statement

AT021200 Athens I AVYI in Greek 2 Jul 80 pp 1, 8

[Text] In an obvious attempt to create a climate of euphoria around his visits to Ankara and Munich--which he returned from yesterday afternoon--Foreign Minister K. Mitsotakis delivered a long statement which caused sensation among political observers because, on the basis of completely new terminology, it is couched in terms totally different from those which Greek foreign policy has maneuvered with from 1974 to date.

"Naturally we concluded no agreement but the establishment of an atmosphere and a lessening of a negative disposition which existed on both sides does establish prerequisits for dialogue," Mitsotakis said, thus in his capacity as foreign minister, appearing to argue that there was also a Greek "negative disposition" toward Turkey. It is stressed that this is toward the Turkey which questions our national airspace and the continental shelf of our islands and demands that we cede over our soverign rights in the Aegean, while it continues to occupy 40 percent of Cyprus territory.

Referring particularly to the "extremely useful"--as he described them--talks with Turkish leaders, Mitsotakis stated, "We resolved to activate dialogue and to attempt, with good will and in good faith on both sides, to find solutions to the differences which separate us."

Always moving within this same tone he also said:

--"I believe that dialogue is the only way for us to reach solutions to certain of our differences.

--"I believe that there can be no second opinion on the principle of Greek-Turkish friendship, on its usefulness to both countries and on the usefulness of solving our differences, if they can be solved.

--"A sound step forward was taken in this direction. More will follow. I do not wish to forecast the result but I can state that I return much more at ease than when I departed."

Placing special emphasis on the fact that it was resolved that dialogue should be continued "primarily at the political level," Mitsotakis announced that his next meeting with Turkish Foreign Minister Erkmen will take place on 10 September at the United Nations where dialogue will continue.

Referring to his visit to Munich, Mitsotakis said he expressed Greek views to his German interlocutors but without any result.

"I cannot tell you that I changed German policy," he said. "The decision was made and it is final. I do believe, however, that I made our friends the Germans understand the positions of Greece and this is a positive prerequisite for the further continuation and even development of friendly relations between the two countries."

A particularly special sensation, on the other hand, was created among political observers by the euphoria demonstrated by Mitsotakis over the results of the NATO conference on which he added: "I believe that I have advanced the question of our reattachment to NATO's military wing and I believe that I have greatly helped our allies understand the position of Greece and this is particularly important."

Political observers specifically commenting on this portion of the Mitsotakis statement underlined that: The new foreign minister is attempting an extremely delicate effort to separate his position from that of his predecessor and current Prime Minister G. Rallis by permitting the creation of the impression that with his first visit overseas he achieved things which his predecessors had not managed to achieve.

At the same time Mitsotakis also separates his position politically from the foreign policy line pursued to date with respect to positions toward NATO and particularly with the position expressed by Karamanlis, which was recently reiterated by Rallis as the country's prime minister, that is "Greece is in a hurry to return to NATO."

In conclusion, there is a general impression that yesterday's enthusiastic statements by Mitsotakis are couched in tones which are clearly different to those used, even only the other day by Prime Minister Rallis, in reference to prospects for our reattachment to the military wing of NATO.

KKE (INTERIOR) DEMANDS PARLIAMENTARY DEBATE OF NATO ISSUE

AT011227 Athens I AVYI in Greek 1 Jul 80 p 1

[Statement by the KKE (Interior) Press Office]

[Text] The KKE (Interior) considers it necessary that the country's political leadership and Parliament be informed about the content and results of the NATO meeting in Ankara both because the meeting has been linked with Washington's effort to drag its allies, and consequently our country, into its adventurist activities in the broader area of the Middle East and of Africa by extending the activities of NATO into the area of CENTO, which has been dissolved through the struggle of the Middle Eastern people, and because the New Democracy government is "listening favorably" to the steadfast U.S. aim of reconfining our country in the military wing of NATO and compelling it to sign the bases agreement very soon. After all, the Rallis government is reiterating the position of the previous New Democracy government that it agrees with these things, provided that they are done on the basis of the Haig-Davos agreement, an agreement that is unknown to the chamber and the political leadership, which worries our people most profoundly.

The KKE (Interior) believes that all these things are directed against the national interests, the Cyprus issue and our country's international position.

GOVERNMENT RECEIVES VOTE OF CONFIDENCE IN NATIONAL ASSEMBLY

TA021511 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1400 GMT 2 Jul 80

[Excerpts] The government has received a vote of confidence with 227 votes against 214 votes at the National Assembly voting today. Our correspondent Metin Aksoy reports the following from the parliament.

[Begin Aksoy recording] The voting which began at 1540 lasted 45 minutes. The JP, the NSP and the NAP groups, a deputy from the Republican Reliance Party [RRP], a deputy from the National Order Party [MNP] and 10 independent deputies voted in favor of the government. The RPP group, an independent deputy and a deputy from the Turkish Unity Party [TUP] voted against the government. The Senate and the National Assembly met under Assembly President Cahit Karakas at 1500. The 108th round of voting to elect a president was held. However the votes were not counted as there was no quorum. Karakas then adjourned the meeting. The National Assembly met following the joint session with the Senate and the National Assembly. [end recording]

[Begin Karakas recording] I am opening the 104th session of the National Assembly. We have a quorum. We proceed with the agenda. We are going to vote for the motions of confidence and no confidence submitted to the 102nd session of the National Assembly held on 30 June 1980. Concerning the Council of Ministers headed by Prime Minister Suleyman Demirel. Honorable deputies, I would like to make a statement concerning the voting. The two motions were submitted in accordance with the same article of the Constitution, in other words in accordance with Article 89 of the Constitution. Since the results of the voting will be the same the two motions will be put to vote together. Now let me explain the meaning of the votes to be cast. A positive vote means a vote of confidence for the Council of Ministers and a negative vote means a vote of no confidence. The last paragraph of Article 89 of the Constitution stipulates that a simple majority, in other words at least 226 votes, is necessary to topple the government. [end recording]

[Begin Aksoy recording] Dear listeners, the voting was held following Karakas' statement. The voting lasted 45 minutes. After the voting Karakas announced the results as follows: [end recording]

[Begin Karakas recording] Four hundred forty-one deputies participated in the voting with 227 votes in favor and 214 against the government. According to this result and in accordance with article 89 of the Constitution the government has received a vote of confidence from the simple majority. A vote on no confidence in the government is out of the question according to this result. [end recording]

[Begin Aksoy recording] Dear listeners, I would like to make a correction. In the beginning of our program I stated that 10 independent deputies voted in favor of the government. However, these 10 independent deputies voted against the government, while one independent deputy abstained. JP, NSP and NAP deputies, a deputy from the MNP, a deputy from the RRP and an independent deputy voted in favor. The RPP group, 10 independent deputies and a deputy from TUP voted against. Later Prime Minister Suleyman Demirel came to the rostrum and thanked the National Assembly. [end recording]

[Begin Demirel recording] Mr President, honorable deputies, I greet you with respect. You have expressed your confidence in our government. The government has received the confidence of the lofty assembly. I thank you. We will continue to work wholeheartedly in order to deserve your confidence. The almighty God will help us. I express my respects to you all. [end recording]

Erbakan on Restoration Government

TA021135 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1000 GMT 2 Jul 80

[Text] NSP leader Necmettin Erbakan has said that if his party comes to believe that a national-solution restoration government can indeed be established, then his party will vote to topple the present government. At a news conference he held today in parliament, Erbakan said that the present government must be toppled immediately and a new government established. He pointed out that the new government to be established must be a national-solution restoration government. He said: The NSP does not support governments blindly, nor does it topple them blindly. We do not want to add another crisis to the present ones.

Erbakan stressed that in June 1980 Turkey was worse off than in November 1979 [the time the present government assumed power]. He added that it was impossible for the Justice Party to solve the present problems. He said that nothing could be expected other than bloodshed, tears and suffering as long as this government remained in power. Erbakan added that if the present government left the disaster would end and restoration would begin.

On the characteristics the new government should have, Erbakan said: It must be a government of brotherhood, of restoration, of parliament. It must be, above all, not a government ordered about by the West, but a government pursuing policies of national solution so that further damage is not caused. It must be a connective bridge government so that a stable period can begin after the elections.

Erbakan said that the minute he believed that such a government would be established he would topple the present government. He stressed that the Turkish parliament was mature enough not to take steps before seeing what was going to happen. He said: Four hours from now, it might be the point where disaster ends and salvation begins.

Replying to journalists' questions, Erbakan said that his premiership was not basic to him beliving that a national-solution restoration government would indeed be established.

A reporter asked him whether the NSP deputies would attend today's session of the National Assembly if the RPP asked for a meeting with a view to establishing a new government and if the meeting lasted a long time. Erbakan replied: It would be useful to spend time, if time is necessary, in order to bring about a solution.

Asked whether the NSP would give a vote of confidence in the government if a new government formula was not found until the assembly session today, Erbakan said: Convincing and clear developments can still occur before the assembly session. If they do not occur it is not the end of the world. We are always ready for this solution and we are waiting. However, we do not think it would be right, without seeing the solution, to add another crisis to the already many crises of the country. I wish we had elected a president first. I wish this would have been clarified before the interpellation was submitted. The fact that these solutions were not clarified so far does not mean that they cannot be clarified during the next 4 hours or at a later stage. The minute they are clarified the nation will be saved from the disaster. That is what we believe.

NO PRESIDENTIAL VOTING DUE TO LACK OF QUORUM

GENSCHER ADDRESSES BUNDESTAG ON MOSCOW TRIP

DW031257 Cologne Westdeutscher Rundfunk Network in German 0927 GMT 3 Jul 80

[Speech by Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher following the government statement by Chancellor Schmidt in the Bundestag in Bonn--live]

[Text] Mr President, esteemed ladies and gentlemen: The subject of our debate today is the government statement on the Venice meeting of the seven chiefs of state and government and on the talks the Federal chancellor and the Federal foreign minister had in Moscow. I will refrain from commenting on the polemics by the minister president of the free state of Bavaria, but I would like to ask you, Mr Minister President, to take the floor again and tell us which of our partners in the Western alliance you meant when you said that they could count on the tacit or open approval of the action taken by the Soviet Union in Afghanistan. Nothing should be obscure in this respect. [applause]

Ladies and gentlemen, the subject is an assessment of the results of the Venice meeting, of the results of our Moscow visit and the contributions the FRG is making towards safeguarding the balance in Europe, the solution of conflicts in the whole world, the strengthening of ties in divided Germany as well as our contribution toward overcoming the serious crisis in Afghanistan resulting from the country's continuing occupation by Soviet troops. In this respect, ladies and gentlemen, it is not sufficient to criticize the Federal Government, nor is it sufficient to say with regard to Afghanistan that the Alliance must be in agreement and the CDU must govern--then the Russians would not have marched into Afghanistan. This is an inadmissible belittlement of the challenge the West is confronted with and the nations of the Third World are confronted with. The Federal chancellor reported on our Moscow visit which took place following most thorough preparations with all our partners. I had an opportunity in Paris yesterday to brief the French foreign minister and subsequently the U.S. President and the U.S. Government. We considered it important to inform the French Government as quickly and as comprehensively as it did following the meeting of the French president with the Soviet leadership in Warsaw, and we also considered it important to immediately convey to the U.S. Government the answers to questions which the U.S. President had asked the Federal chancellor to clarify. This shows that the U.S. Government was not against our Moscow visit, but expected to derive some benefit from it. [applause]

Ladies and gentlemen, the U.S. President stated at the end of our talks yesterday that the American nation followed our Moscow trip with great interest. As he, the U.S. President, had said earlier in Venice, this Moscow trip was a good and constructive step. In the light of these statements it is untenable to claim that the Federal Government took a unilateral action against the will or against the distrust of its partners. [applause] The U.S. President then added that the Federal chancellor in Moscow had excellently represented not only the cause of the FRG but also the cause of the United States and of the other allies. He, the President, highly assessed the firmness and clarity of the attitude we adopted in Moscow, for which he expressed his admiration and appreciation. [applause] Ladies and gentlemen, we agreed with the U.S. Government that the Soviet reaction to the negotiation proposal made by the Western alliance on nuclear medium-range systems in Europe must be studied carefully and in a constructive spirit within the Alliance. This shows that neither the Federal Government nor the U.S. Government will be led to assume rashly and precipitately that this Soviet proposal is aimed at undermining NATO's decision to close the arms gap. This shows, on the contrary, that the firm attitude adopted by the Federal Government from the start, namely, advocating the arms gap closure decision and also emphatically advocating negotiations, has paid off, because the other side is now also prepared to hold negotiations. Therefore, it is necessary to study in a business-like, careful and constructive way the possibilities resulting from this Soviet reaction to our proposals on arms control in Europe.

From the outset we meant both things seriously: arms gap closure and negotiations. Negotiations are to us an equal part of the joint decision by the alliance. [applause] Ladies and gentlemen, the interest of our Western partners in the results of our trip is also indicated by the fact that a meeting of the European foreign ministers, which was convened at the suggestion of Foreign Minister Thorn, will be held in Luxembourg this afternoon. I want to stress above all that political cooperation between the European Community members and Japan has recently further developed satisfactorily. This manifested itself in Venice both at the European Council meeting and at the conference of the seven. The close schedule of consultations with our allies and partners mirrors the extent of the common interests and the determination for common action by the Western community of states.

Apart from the questions which the U.S. President had asked the chancellor to discuss, the Federal chancellor in Moscow also complied with a wish of the ASEAN foreign ministers who met in Kuala Lumpur last week and who had asked the Federal chancellor to report the great concern this group of states has over the critical situation on the Kampuchean-Thai border and in Kampuchea. You see, ladies and gentlemen, that the significance, the opportunities, the benefits of this trip have been seen not only by our own government, but by our partners in the European Community and by the Western alliance. Such an important group of states as the ASEAN states which are bound up with us politically also considered it important that we use this visit to explain their concerns and their problems to the Soviet leadership. [applause] Therefore, I think that an objective assessment of the visit and its results is called for.

I believe also that it would have been proper--and I hope that this will still take place in the debate--for the representatives of the opposition to comment on the speech by the Federal chancellor in Moscow. That speech was a most far-reaching expression not only of the position of the Federal Republic of Germany, but also of the positions of our Western partners. It was a speech whose ideas and thoughts were deepened in confidential talks. It would be a significant step toward a factual discussion in the Bundestag if the opposition could say here whether the speech by the Federal chancellor in Moscow contained points it agreed with and whether there are points where there is no agreement. We ought to assess the visit in this way. [applause] That could then become the basis for a constructive debate which would be more than just polemical criticism with an eye to the election campaign. [applause]

Ladies and gentlemen, we consider the Moscow visit as necessary and useful. It was necessary because the way the international situation has developed demands that influence be exerted through direct talks on the actions of this world power, because developments depend to a great extent on these actions. Influence ought to be exerted through direct talks. I noted with great interest and satisfaction that right after the new U.S. secretary of state took over, he used his presence in Vienna to meet Mr Gromyko and to point out to him the common positions of the alliance. This was certainly not an intention to play down the Soviet intervention in Afghanistan, but to clearly and frankly express the approach taken by the Western alliance. The same applies to the meeting between the French president and the Soviet leadership. The visit was and could be useful because we were able to speak and act on the firm basis of carefully coordinated Western positions. Following the meeting of the Nine and the meeting of the seven in Venice, the Western alliance outlined its ideas very clearly and extensively at the NATO foreign ministers meeting in Ankara.

I would like to stress particularly the statements of the Council of Ministers on Afghanistan, arms control and disarmament problems--particularly medium-range arms --the forthcoming CSCE followup conference in Madrid, as well as Germany and Berlin. Ladies and gentlemen, the ministers of the alliance repeated in Ankara their readiness to work on an improvement of East-West relations and to maintain talks and contacts between East and West so as to point out their stances, to avoid misunderstandings, to facilitate a solution of the current crisis and to promote constructive cooperation as much as possible under the existing conditions. That is the original text of the NATO joint communique. We acted in Moscow according to the aims we formulated together. It means that we acted in accordance with these aims. [applause] In view of the clear, firm and predictable approach on the part of the Federal Republic of Germany, predictable for the Soviet leadership and all other states of the world, the Soviet leadership realized that we really did not come to Moscow to be separated from the alliance. Our approach was confirmed there: Namely, that the Soviet Union, in its own interest, attributes the greatest significance to relations with the United States with regard to future developments in the world.

We know that it is not right for Moscow--and we tried to accomplish some enlightment in this context--to believe that Washington is responsible for the deterioration of relations and to therefore expect that the initiative for an improvement must also come from Washington. We felt the bitterness over the upset relations with the other world power. Those responsible in Moscow still find it hard to realize that this is the consequence of their own actions. It is necessary to strengthen this insight regarding the effect Soviet actions are having on East-West relations by using clear languages in Moscow and also through direct, personal contacts. Our discussion partners were able to convince themselves that Western unity is unshakeable with regard to all problems involving us. It turned out in the course of the visit that our voice carries some weight because one knows that the Federal Republic of Germany is a firm and predictable factor in Western solidarity. Western determination with regard to defense and Western preparedness to negotiate--as has been demonstrated by all the decisions during the entire time we have been a member of the alliance. [applause]

Ladies and gentlemen, regarding the Afghanistan problem, it was to be expected that the Soviet Union did not indicate a change in its approach. I think it was not decent to insinuate that the Federal chancellor said something different, or that he considers the announced withdrawal of Soviet troops to be some progress. May I quote something from the speech he just gave here: We have termed this--namely the withdrawal of troops--as a step which would lead in the right direction if such a withdrawal were the beginning of a continuous movement which will be continued until full withdrawal has been achieved. That is the demand; namely, to solve the problem through complete withdrawal. [applause] The Federal chancellor added that one ought to give some thought to a timetable for a political solution.

Ladies and gentlemen, no doubts exist with regard to the Western position. We will not accept faits accomplis. There will be no becoming accustomed to Afghanistan. In Moscow we greatly supported the efforts of Afghanistan's neighbors, that is Iran and Pakistan, whose foreign ministers tried to make a beginning for a solution in the commission formed by the Islamic conference in Islamabad together with the secretary general of this commission. We have the impression that a steady continuation of these efforts may very well show some effect. The approach by the Islamic conference shows that the obvious conflict created by the Soviet occupation of Afghanistan is not merely an East-West problem, but that it is very much an East-South problem. And it is therefore so necessary that we must point out in a clearly supporting way our approach to the aims and intentions of the Islamic conference.

Regarding medium-range arms, the NATO communique of Ankara once more urged the Soviet Union to negotiate immediately and positively on the American proposals, and to begin prior to the ratification of SALT II with a preparatory exchange of opinion without prerequisites. The reaction by the West, the reaction which the chancellor has explained here, shows that this appeal also had public and political effects to which the Soviet Union believed it had to respond. This is why we will examine this reaction carefully and in a constructive spirit, jointly with all partners in the Western alliance. [applause]

Ladies and gentlemen, it is inherent in the logic of Western policy to do what is necessary for our own security and defense, on the one hand, and not to neglect any chance to achieve a balance on as low a level of armament as possible on the other. The efforts toward developing militarily significant confidence-building measures will especially deserve special significance after Afghanistan, measures which will be applied on the entire continent; on the entire European continent means including the European part of the Soviet Union. Ladies and gentlemen, jointly with our alliance partners we said concerning this in Ankara that this geographical area of validity of these measures as far as we are concerned is of central significance for the arrangement of this European disarmament conference on the occasion of the Madrid meeting. This concept is based on the finding that successes in arms limitation and disarmament require confidence, that the openness and predictability of the military potentials of both sides form the basis on which successful arms control negotiations are possible at all. The area of application extending to all of Europe is necessary if these arms control negotiations are to attain their end, namely, the establishment of military stability in Europe, meaning the establishment of a state in which neither side needs to fear a surprise attack by the other side. And this, after all, has grown even more urgent following Afghanistan.

We are aware that great efforts will yet be required to enforce this area of application. The Soviet Union, to which we expounded our concept in Moscow, could well give a positive signal by refraining from opposing any accord on this important issue. [applause] In this connection, ladies and gentlemen, it is necessary for the whole Bundestag to support the Federal Government on such a constructive proposal concerning the building of confidence and thus concerning more security in highly armed Europe. [applause]

[Bundestag president] Mr Minister, will you allow a question from Deputy Dr Marx?

[Genscher] Yes, indeed.

[Marx] Mr Minister, since the Bundestag supports the Federal Government whenever constructive proposals are advanced, the precondition is that you tell us what Mr Brezhnev replied to these proposals.

[Genscher] Colleague Marx, I explained to you that the Federal Government explained the stance of the alliance as publicized in Ankara. The fact that I did not rule out the possibility of an accord may show you, on the one hand, that a final result has not been attained but that, on the other hand, I do not rule out the holding of a European disarmament conference with this area of validity of confidence-building measures. However, we will attain this only if we exploit the coming months for bilateral consultations, also with the East European states so as to prepare for the Madrid conference. I ask you not to interpret it as a tacit tolerance of the intervention in Afghanistan if additional meetings are held with other politically responsible people in Eastern Europe. [applause]

[Bundestag president] Will you allow another question by Deputy Marx?

[Genscher] Yes.

[Marx] Mr Minister, would you then give us more than just a hint as to the basis for your assumption that progress is possible and that the Soviet side will react favorably to the proposals?

[Genscher] Even if an exchange of letters were read here, letters which the Federal Government did not publicize, I would like to refrain from violating the confidential character of talks by describing the attitude of the other side. But I am prepared indeed, Mr Deputy, to answer your question in the Foreign Affairs Committee. You know that [passage indistinct]. [applause]

Mr Deputy, even though parliamentary work is drawing to a close, we should be able to find a way to inform objectively about this part of the talks.

Ladies and gentlemen, in Ankara the alliance once again endorsed its position on Germany and Berlin, and it paid tribute to the calm situation in Berlin and to the conclusion of the inter-German agreements dated 30 April 1980. This statement by our allies is particularly valuable at this very time as it proves the common position of the Federal Republic of Germany, the three powers and the rest of the allies toward our national concern, and as it underscores the fact that our national interests are not at odds with our membership in the Western alliance, but that parallel interests exist. To us, ladies and gentlemen, this ought to be important encouragement to continue our treaty policy. I think that the fact that our partners have appreciated the basic treaty with the GDR as an important contribution toward improving the situation in Europe should also be an occasion for many a critic of this basic treaty in our country to review his opinion on this issue.

Esteemed ladies and gentlemen, all of us are aware that a peace strategy for the eighties must not be limited to insuring peace only in the East-West area. Peace policy in our world means working toward the peaceful solution of conflicts in the Third World. Peace policy today means contributing with all our strength toward overcoming hunger and misery in the Third World and toward extending assistance to the developing countries in bringing about stability and decent living conditions. [applause] And finally, peace policy also means that we do what we can to keep the East-West conflict out of the Third World. [applause] At this point West-East policy and North-South policy interlock. It is decisive for the further development of the East-West relationship that the principles of detente apply in all regions of the world. This means that the principles of the indivisibility of detente must be implemented. At the same time success in this respect forms the precondition for the possibility of an independent development of the Third World in peace and stability. Conflicts fanned and fed from outside and artifically transferred to the Third World are a decisive impediment to economic and social development in these countries.

The basis of our policy toward the Third World is the respect for and the support of the independence and self-determination of the countries of the Third World. What we want is not to establish zones of influence or export our own concepts of economic and political systems to the Third World, but to establish a relationship of equal partnership with the states of the Third World and to respect their organizing their own system on the basis of their own concepts. In adopting this attitude we know that it is this policy alone to which the future belongs. Ladies and gentlemen, while political and ideological hegemony aspirations are increasingly at odds with the interests of the Third World, new options for cooperation emerge for us from our avowal of independence and plurality.

This also applies to relations between the West and the nonaligned states, relations which have achieved a new and positive level of development. These relations were burdened well into the seventies by the decolonization process and would still be burdened had we followed the advice that can also occasionally be heard here with regard to our relations toward certain groups and states in the Third World, particularly in Africa. [applause] Ladies and gentlemen, the decolonization process has been more or less concluded. The main aim of the countries of the Third World is the preservation of their independence and the implementation of equal political and economic rights in international relations. We can approve of these aims for good reason and not out of opportunism because they are in line with our own convictions and ideals. Therefore, we stand here on the side of progress. This policy is part of our strategy of safeguarding peace worldwide. World peace, peace and economic welfare for one's own country can be safeguarded only if one succeeds in setting up a system of equal rights for all states.

The Soviet Union will have to ask itself whether in the long run participation in such a policy of cooperation with equal rights will not offer more advantages to it than its present activity in the Third World, as expressed by the intervention in Afghanistan. Ladies and gentlemen, it is decisive for mankind, which will number 6 billion people in the year 2000, to have food and jobs, to achieve a smooth transition from the age of oil to the age of new forms of energy, and last but not least to preserve the ecological living conditions on our planet, a planet which has become small. That is an enormous challenge we have to face. We will be viewed with regard to our political action as to whether we have made our contribution to stability, social progress and justice in the Third World.

Ladies and gentlemen, such a discussion dealing with serious problems of our time, with great challenges, must also produce an answer regarding the individual approach of every one of us to these challenges and regarding what contribution the Federal Republic of Germany--the various parties in this chamber--can make to a peace strategy based on the fact that we here in Europe as partners of the European Community will make our contribution to the stability of a democratic and liberal Western Europe. We must make our contribution to Western security, but also to the reduction of tensions between West and East as well; we must make our contribution to security and stability, to the independence of the states of the Third World which in view of the intervention in Afghanistan look with expectation at the approach, determination and unity of the Western alliance. [applause] In order to achieve that, more is necessary than just polemics and insinuations.

The visit by the Federal chancellor to Moscow, our visit there, has been viewed by various standards. Nothing would be more self-righteous than using a standard we set ourselves in assessing the visit. Colleague Kohl stated the following in a BILD ZEITUNG interview on 14 June 1980: The standard by which such a visit must be measured is that it must produce something for peace. Our important demands are: First, the Federal chancellor must firmly demand the withdrawal of the Soviet troops from Afghanistan. I think that those who read the toast of the Federal chancellor will agree that point one of these demands has at least been fulfilled. [applause]

Second, the figures in connection with family reunification have strongly deteriorated. The Soviet Union must again permit more people to leave in order to join their relatives in the Federal Republic of Germany--a demand we have fully supported. Let us see how matters will develop in the coming months and whether this demand was firmly represented in Moscow. [applause]

Third, the Soviet Union must be prepared to discuss its medium-range missile rearmament and to give up its present veto regarding NATO's suggestions to negotiate. Let us take up the suggestion of the other side, its reaction, and let us examine whether the answer is constructive or not, as has been demanded. [applause]

Ladies and gentlemen, fourth, the Soviet Union must give up its resistance in the Vienna negotiations on troops reductions in Europe. The Federal chancellor has said here that the Soviets have announced that they will make a new suggestion for the Vienna negotiations. Let us please assess it together.

I think that measured by these four demands, the result of the visit is presentable. [applause]

We have noted with satisfaction that public opinion in the world has taken an absolutely positive approach to the statements contained in the speech by the Federal chancellor. We have noted with satisfaction that the American President, the head of state of our most important ally, has assessed our visit and its results positively. In this debate today we face the judgement of the Bundestag and the German public with optimism. Thank you. [applause]

GISCARD REITERATES 'INDEPENDENT' FOREIGN POLICY

LD060740 Hamburg DPA in German 0033 GMT 6 Jul 80

[Text] Paris--French President Valery Giscard d'Estaing has once again stressed France's independent role in world politics, pointing out at the same time that this had nothing to do with lack of solidarity vis-a-vis the West. In an interview with the Paris correspondent of FRANKFURTER RUNDSCHAU, prereleased to DPA, the president said on the eve of his state visit to the Federal Republic that solidarity was not for him a synonym for subservience.

"France leaves no doubt as to which camp it belongs to. It is neither neutral nor neutralist. If it came to the point it would be meeting its obligations without weakness," the president said. In the interview, he paid tribute to the development of German-French relations, which had attained a quality surpassing everything one could have hoped for at the time of the signing of the friendship treaty. In the interview, he denied wanting to visit the GDR. "I have no plans to visit the GDR."

Concerning the topical question of environmental protection, above all on the German-French border in connection with the French nuclear program, the president said that his country was determined to continue the fight against environmental pollution. However, this should not be allowed to put the brakes on French nuclear energy plans, which were vital for an independent energy policy.

PCI DELEGATION POSTPONES DEPARTURE FOR MOSCOW; NO REASON GIVEN

AU031955 Rome ANSA in English 1940 GMT 3 Jul 80

[Text] Rome, July 3 (ANSA)--An Italian Communist Party delegation led by Gian Carlo Pajetta and Paolo Bufalini will not be leaving for Moscow tomorrow as planned. No reason was given for the change. Observers noted, however, that the Soviet magazine NEW TIMES had lashed out at Pajetta on June 18 for statements he had made during a visit to China by a PCI delegation of which he was a member. The PCI responded to the magazine in a conciliatory tone and Pajetta later confirmed his plans to head the delegation then scheduled to leave for the USSR on July 4.

LONGO: CEAUSESCU SAYS USSR RECOGNIZES AFGHANISTAN 'BLUNDER'

AU041530 Rome ANSA in English 0930 GMT 4 Jul 80

[Text] Rome, July 4 (ANSA)--Romanian President Nicolae Ceausescu believes that the Soviets realize that they made a colossal political blunder when they invaded Afghanistan and therefore must be helped to find a political way out of the impasse, according to Pietro Longo today. In an article appearing in HUMANITA, the Social Democratic Party (PSDI) secretary said that the Russians are already looking for a political solution that would allow them to withdraw all of their troops from the West Asian nation. according to Ceausescu. Longo, who recently had talks with the Romanian head of state, said that the boycott of the Moscow Olympics had not caused the Soviets to take a more rigid stance. On the contrary, the boycott helped them understand the grossness of their error and look for ways to remedy things, he continued. Longo claimed that it was therefore "indecent" that the Italian Parliament has not as yet debated a "PSDI" motion in support of the boycott.

COLOMBO NOTES WEST'S RESPONSE TO INTERNATIONAL ISSUES

Italy's 6-Month Leadership

AU051345 Rome ANSA in English 0915 GMT 4 Jul 80

[Text] Rome, July 5 (ANSA)--The European Nine and Western nations in general succeeded in pulling themselves together during the trying six-month period that Italy was deputy chairman of the Brussels-based European Economic Community (EEC), according to Italian Foreign Minister Emilio Colombo. "It wasn't a period of normal administrations," Colombo told the European Journalists' Associations in Rome yesterday. He said that "problems of crucial importance" were ironed out during the Italian Government's term as leader of the EEC's decision-making councils. The Nine and the West regained the kind of "solid" unity that enabled them to "speak out clearly" at two rounds of summit talks in Venice last month, one between EEC state and government leaders and another between the leaders of the West seven most industrialized states. Their regaining unity, Colombo added, made West German Chancellor Helmut Schmidt's trip to Moscow this week much easier than it would have been otherwise.

The Italian diplomatic chief took credit on behalf of the Rome government for having lead the nine back to a unified path during the past six months. He took umbrage at critics who spewed "easy slogans" against the Italian Government's alleged subservience to the United States and cited Iran and the Middle East as proof of Europe's and Italy's talent for taking "original" stands. "The Italian Government played a key role in these achievements", Colombo asserted, even though that role was often carried out behind the scenes. Angered by insistent insinuations that Italian foreign policy was deferential to Washington's authority, Colombo snapped "you don't make foreign policy with slogans".

The Italian diplomatic chief defended all of the moves that the Rome government, under Premier Francesco Cossiga's leadership, has made on the European and international scene. Whatever form they took, he stressed, these moves were aimed at achieving the same things that other European governments are after, "a revival of detente and the strengthening of peace."

Denial of Western Discord

LD031423 Paris AN-NAHAR AL-'ARABI WA AD-DUWALI in Arabic 30 Jun-6 Jul 80 p 9

[Interview granted by Italian Foreign Minister Emilio Colombo to AN-NAHAR AL-'ARABI WA AD-DUWALI on the Island of San Giorgio--date not given]

[Text] Italian Foreign Minister Emilio Colombo has described the Soviet decision to withdraw some of its forces from Afghanistan as "positive, provided it is confirmed and leads to complete withdrawal." The Italian minister said this in an interview he granted to AN-NAHAR AL-'ARABI WA AD-DUWALI on the Island of San Giorgio.

[Question] How do you view the Soviet decision to withdraw some of its units from Afghanistan?

[Answer] We have to wait. The best expression we can use is the English "wait and see."

[Question] What is the political dimension of the decision and what is the Western response to it?

[Answer] A comprehensive political assessment of the Soviet decision has been made. The statement issued by the seven Western industrialized states confirms our attitude to the Soviet presence in Afghanistan.

We regard the decision to withdraw some units as positive provided it is confirmed. We believe that withdrawal must continue until Afghanistan is completely liberated and independence and sovereignty is restored to it.

[Question] It has been said that the Soviet Union, by its decision, tried to sow division and discord within the Western ranks.

[Answer] If that was its wish and desire, it did not succeed. Indeed, it failed, because seven states' response came in their united stand, whether in their view or in their denunciation of the occupation and demand for complete withdrawal.

[Question] What practical measures will be taken to consolidate the dialogue between the Western industrialized states and the oil-producing states?

[Answer] We have one possible avenue--the European-Arab dialogue, which we discussed elaborately about a week ago.

[Question] But it is still in its theoretical stage, on the level of principles.

[Answer] This is true. For this reason we have to do something that will help to make the dialogue more constructive. Regrettably, no initiative has yet been taken in this sphere.

[Question] Was the Middle East issue, particularly the recent European declaration, raised during the seven states' meetings?

[Answer] No. It was not discussed at the heads of state level, but it was raised in a general manner during the foreign ministers' meeting.

[Question] With regard to Iran, the issue of the American hostages was not mentioned by name?

[Answer] The statement on Iran was general and it dealt with the issue of the hostages in a general manner. But, although we did not refer to the subject of the hostages in Iran in a direct manner, the meaning was clear.

L'UNITA CITES PCI DEPUTIES CRITICISM OF DEFENSE POLICY

["S.P." report: "Lower House Debate Begins: More Criticism Than Consensus for Government's Military Policy"]

[Excerpt] Rome--Defense Minister Lelio Lagorio's report on the government's military policy has prompted more criticisms and bewilderment than consensus. This is what emerged from the lower house defense committee debate, due to end this morning with a reply from the minister. Speakers during yesterday's two sessions, attended by the defense chief of general staff and the chiefs of staff of the three branches of the armed forces, included the communists Baracetti, Bernini, Cerquetti and Vito Angelini.

"The report presented by Lagorio on the government's behalf," Baracetti said, "reflects a foreign and military policy aimed at special relations and links with the Carter administration's current policy. This is a line which isolates Italy and dissociates it from its principal European partners and from broad socialist and Christian currents of ideology and opinion on our continent." We hope, Baracetti added, that some of the demagoguery present in the report was not inserted "as this government's visiting card with respect to the U.S. administration with a view to securing a certificate of absolute loyalty and teacher's pet."

Next Baracetti criticized Lagorio's approach to the structural problems and to the conditions of personnel, stressing that the human aspect "is essential for the efficiency and unity of the armed forces."

The total absence in the defense minister's report of any reference to Europe's role within NATO was severely criticized by Comrade Bruno Bernini. This role, he said, has been acquiring particular prominence with the change in the strategy of the United States and the Atlantic Alliance and the transition from the "strategy of the global response" to the strategy of the "flexible response" which, by increasing the chances of limited local wars waged with tactical nuclear or conventional weapons, is increasing the danger of a conflict in Europe and therefore cannot fail to increase its responsibility in determining NATO's policies so as to assert within it its own inalienable interests with regard to security and the future.

ANGOLAN ENVOY ON CUBAN TROOPS, RELATIONS WITH WEST

NC041415 Paris AFP in English 1401 GMT 4 Jul 80

[Text] Lisbon, July 4, (AFP)--Angola will request aid from Cuban troops already stationed in Angola or from "other countries" if South Africa continues its invasion of that country, Ambassador Adriano Sebastiao said here today.

Speaking at a press conference, the Angolan diplomat said that his government had not yet appealed for help but could find itself obliged to do so.

Mr Sebastiao also said that Luanda should review its relations with certain Western governments which were not supporting Angola's position following the South African invasion.

"We demand that these countries, which call themselves friends of Angola, clearly define their position with regard to respecting the sovereignty of an independent state," he said.

FRENCH PREMIER RAYMOND BARRE VISITS MADRID

Arrives 3 Jul

LD030926 Madrid Domestic Service in Spanish 0900 GMT 3 Jul 80

[Hector Arenas report from Madrid's Barajas Airport]

[Excerpts] Just a few minutes ago Prime Minister Suarez welcomed French Premier Raymond Barre here with a greeting and a cordial handshake, as he arrived on an official visit.

Barre, who is accompanied by the ministers of industry, agriculture and foreign trade, and the secretary of state for foreign affairs, will be staying for about 11 hours.

He will discuss bilateral problems, and in particular he will speak officially for the first time about France's stand on imposing terms for Spanish membership into the EEC in the light of the Community's agricultural and financial problems.

It is also hoped that this visit will produce explanations from the French Government on recent incidents directed against Spanish trucks in France and against Spanish fishing vessels, as well as discussions on ETA terrorist actions being planned from French territory. Another subject for discussion will be the situation of Spanish workers and their families in France.

After the arrival ceremony the two heads of government, Suarez and Barre left by helicopter for the Zarzuela Palace where the first round of talks are now beginning.

Talks With Suarez

LD031400 Madrid Domestic Service in Spanish 1200 GMT 3 Jul 80

[Report by unidentified correspondent from Moncloa Palace]

[Excerpts] The first meeting between Prime Minister Adolfo Suarez and French Premier Raymond Barre lasted just over 2 hours. Only two other persons were present: Mr Barre's interpreter and on the Spanish side Alberto Aza, chief of the prime minister's staff, who was also acting as an interpreter.

At the meeting the French premier gave a long exposition on the problems currently affecting the European Economic Community.

Suarez for his part said that the Community's internal problems should not get in the way of Spain's right to join the Community. Suarez put to the French prime minister the need for Spain and the Community to engage in a process of keeping each other informed on political matters.

For his part Raymond Barre was very careful to point out that it is not France's intention to paralyze the negotiations for Spanish accession and that these negotiations should proceed aside from any internal problems.

Adolfo Suarez repeated that this is precisely what Spain is asking for: that the agreed timetable should be adhered to and that any reforms needed in the Community should be made as soon as possible but without being tied to Spanish entry or nonentry into the Common Market.

Another matter raised at the meeting was that of terrorism, and considerable time was spent on this. The Spanish side made clear the absolute need for international cooperation in the matter of dealing with terrorism, and French cooperation was specifically requested to deal with the ETA.

A further matter raised was that of the transport of Spanish fruit on French roads, though this was also dealt with at meetings between other members of the delegations.

It should be added that while Adolfo Suarez and Raymond Barre were meeting at Moncloa Palace, the French ministers of agriculture, foreign trade and industry and the secretary of state for foreign affairs were meeting their Spanish counterparts.

At this moment the prime minister is hosting a luncheon at the Viana Palace for the French delegation. Later, Adolfo Suarez is due to accompany the French premier to an audience with the king, and at 1630 there will be a meeting of the two delegations at Moncloa Palace.

Paris Report on Talks

LD031810 Paris Domestic Service in French 1700 GMT 3 Jul 80

[Text] Twelve hours in which to convince his interlocutors: This is the duration of Raymond Barre's talks in Madrid with Spanish officials, including Adolfo Suarez, his counterpart. Two important issues: the war on the holiday resorts waged by the ETA, some of whose men are reported to have been trained in France, and Spain's admission into the Common Market, two issues which at the moment are straining relations between Paris and Madrid. Here is our permanent correspondent (Georges Tourlet):

There is no question of interrupting the talks on Spain's admission, but one must be realistic after the problems raised by the British budget contributions. Nothing can be done before the financial problems of the Community are settled once and for all. This is the explanation given just now by Raymond Barre to his Spanish counterpart during an exceptional tete-a-tete which lasted more than 2 and 1/2 hours. During this tete-a-tete, Adolfo Suarez endeavored to tone down the criticism which he deems excessive and even violent addressed for more than a month now against France.

But it was above all the Basque problem which seems to have represented the lion's share in these nonstop negotiations of almost 8 hours and, without any preamble, Raymond Barre said he was shocked by the recent accusations levelled by the Spanish interior minister according to which France unashamedly sheltered ETA terrorists. France condemns terrorism from any country whatsoever, Barre stated forcefully. Therefore it is out of the question that it should encourage or favor it. He added that the struggle against this plague is within the context of the laws and regulations regarding public order in our country. Meaning, it would be unrealistic to believe that French police would substitute Spanish police to settle this problem.

In the afternoon, at the moment when Raymond Barre was leaving after an audience given him by King Juan Carlos, ETA issued a new warning: a bomb would explode tonight in Malaga Province.

Barre Holds Second Round of Talks

LD032208 Madrid Domestic Service in Spanish 1800 GMT 3 Jul 80

[Excerpts] Spanish Prime Minister Adolfo Suarez and French Premier Raymond Barre had a second round of talks this afternoon in the Moncloa Palace renewing the subjects of their talks this morning.

According to sources close to the meeting, this afternoon was dedicated to international problems--the Middle East, Afghanistan and the forthcoming Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe in Madrid. On the Madrid conference, the French premier spoke of the need for detente and expressed the hope that this conference would be a success and that it would lead to a conference on disarmament. With regard to the Middle East, Raymond Barre told the Spanish prime minister that at the Venice summit there was clear progress along the lines advocated by Spain regarding the Middle East, as the Spanish prime minister--according to Raymond Barre--had presented to the French during his visit to Paris in November. On the subjects of Afghanistan and the Middle East, the two agreed that Europe should play a more active role.

Holds Press Conference

LD032212 Madrid Domestic Service in Spanish 2000 GMT 3 Jul 80

[Excerpts] Raymond Barre's last act in Madrid was a press conference with some representatives of the media.

Barre described the talks he held with Spanish Prime Minister Adolfo Suarez and other members of the Spanish Government as frank, cordial and useful. During the press conference, replying to questions from Spanish and French journalists, Barre pointed out that France is in favor of Spanish entry into the EEC, and he recalled France's role at other times when Spanish entry was first put on the agenda. He also insisted that France has never said that negotiations for Spain's entry into the EEC should stop. But, he also said that they should be subordinated to the thinking going on inside the Community about the budgetary program, which England has raised, and about the common agricultural policy. For the future, he said that Spain should be associated in some way with the decisions made inside the Community on policy changes. But he did not outline how this should come about. Spain, Barre summed up, should not enter a noncommunity, it should enter the EEC.

He concluded his summing up by saying that relations between Spain and France are, at bottom, good and that one should not be mistakenly influenced by certain momentary shifts of opinion.

Communique on Visit

LD030340 Madrid Domestic Service in Spanish 2200 GMT 3 Jul 80

[Text] At 2345 the official press communique from the Secretariat of State for Information arrived on our news desk--that is the official Spanish version of the visit by French Premier Raymond Barre to Spain. It reads as follows:

The visit to Madrid by the French premier comes under the framework of the bilateral meetings decided upon in Paris during the visit by the Spanish prime minister last November, although it is of particular interest in the present circumstances because of the difficulties which have arisen lately between the two countries. During the talks between the Spanish prime minister and the French premier, the subjects which have clouded relations between the two countries were examined with frankness and with tough realism. Prime Minister Suarez asked for an explanation on the French position regarding the negotiations over Spain's entry into the EEC. The French premier explained that his country's decision on Spain's entry had not changed, and that it is not France's intention to block Spanish entry into the EEC. The French Government supports Spain's right to become part of the Community and believes that our country should occupy an important place within it.

He also stressed that the French authorities had not suggested an interruption in the negotiations. They did no more than stress the importance of the changes being studied at the moment on agricultural and financial policies, and the need to clarify definitively the internal situation of the Community in order to be able to successfully conclude its second stage of enlargement. Without glossing over the importance of its difficulties he said that the Community itself is as interested as Spain is in resolving them as soon as possible.

Prime Minister Suarez, the official Spanish version continues, repeated Spain's desire and its right to cooperate within the Community in the construction of a united Europe and expressed his firm conviction that the need to reform certain of the Community's policies is perfectly compatible with the parallel development of the negotiations. Prime Minister Suarez expressed his desire that these reforms should be carried out within the perspective of a 12-member Community and therefore in consultation with Spain. The French premier gave his agreement to periodically hold information meetings to this end. The French premier expressed his regret at the attacks on Spanish trucks in France and repeated his government's decision to take the necessary measures to prevent the repetition of these incidents and to ensure that the victims of these attacks should be adequately compensated.

In connection with fishing problems, Spain proposed a series of new talks in Brussels and in Paris. Spain insisted on the need to establish a system of juridical guarantees to be applied equitably which would allow the Spanish fishermen to carry out their work in satisfactory conditions.

Prime Minister Suarez dedicated a large part of the talks to terrorist actions and he insisted on the need for a greater international cooperation in order to effectively counter such actions. In this sense he insisted on the need for a more active and closer collaboration between the Spanish and French authorities to bring about the eradication of terrorism for the benefit of the two countries. Premier Barre shared the concern of Adolfo Suarez and assured him that France condemns and will condemn all terrorist activity, and in this sense he stressed that his country will collaborate in the struggle against any kind of terrorist activity and in the application of the law. The two premiers, the note concludes, also examined the international situation and especially the subjects of the Middle East, Afghanistan, East-West relations, and the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe and on disarmament.

CANADA'S TRUDEAU HOLDS PRESS CONFERENCE 27 Jun

[Unattributed report: "Trudeau: Inflation, the West's Biggest Problem"]

[Text] Thursday's news that France has tested a neutron bomb came as a surprise to Canadian Prime Minister Pierre Trudeau during his 3-day visit to Sweden. At a press conference on Friday he said that news reports about the neutron bomb were really surprising. He did not wish to make any comment on the reports until he had them confirmed.

"Canada has always been an advocate of disarmament. It is our country's duty to try to solve different international problems," he said.

The prime minister was impressed by the extent of Swedish aid to the developing countries and said that Sweden was an example to all.

"Canada ought to give more in aid to the developing countries, but we are doing better than several other nations."

He considers the biggest problem for the Western nations to be inflation. And unemployment is also a great problem.

On Thursday Pierre Trudeau breakfasted for an hour with Foreign Minister Ola Ullsten at Haga Palace. The two Liberal Party leaders primarily discussed foreign policy questions.

After lunch on Friday with the king, Trudeau traveled with Prime Minister Falldin to the mountains in northern Sweden and spent the night in Tarfala, near Kebnekajse.

HOUSE DELEGATION RETURNS FROM VISIT TO ROMANIA

NC051700 Nicosia Domestic Service in Greek 1400 GMT 5 Jul 80

[Text] House of Representatives President Mikhailidhis and the all-party parliamentary delegation have returned from Romania following an official visit at the invitation of Mr Giosan, chairman of the Romanian Grand National Assembly.

In a statement at Larnaca Airport, Mr Mikhailidhis said the visit of the delegation had positive results and on behalf of all the members of the delegation he expressed warm thanks to the chairman and the members of the Romanian Grand National Assembly for the excellent hospitality accorded to them. This hospitality, he said, is an example of the Romanian people's friendship for the people of Cyprus.

Referring to the meeting of the delegation with Romanian President Ceausescu yesterday, Mr Mikhailidhis said that a climate of cordiality prevailed during the meeting. He said the Romanian position of firm support for safeguarding the independence, territorial integrity and unity of the Cyprus Republic was reaffirmed.

Mr Mikhailidhis added: For our part, we again explained our firm position that we support all the efforts by the UN secretary general for the opening of a substantive dialogue that will lead to a lasting and viable Cyprus solution. However, we have stressed that these efforts have failed to produce results because the Turkish side always creates obstacles.

Mr Mikhailidhis said that during the talks with the chairman and other representatives of the Romanian Grand National Assembly it was decided to establish close ties of cooperation between the two parliaments. He also said that during the meeting with the Romanian ministers of foreign trade the members of the delegation expressed Cyprus' wish for consideration of all possibilities to further develop Cyprus' economic relations with Romania. Mr Mikhailidhis expressed the hope that Mr Giosan, chairman of the Romanian Grand National Assembly, and a parliamentary delegation will soon visit Cyprus; such a visit would be another step in furthering the cooperation and development of close relations between the two parliaments.

The house president was met at Larnaca Airport by the Romanian charge d'affaires, house members and other officials. The other members of the delegation were Papadhimitriou, Toulduras, Kourtellaris and Khatzidhimitriou.

KKE (INTERIOR) FILES PARLIAMENTARY INTERPELLATION ON U.S. BASES

AT041330 Athens I AVYI in Greek 4 Jul 80 p 1

[Text] The KKe (Interior) filed the following interpellation [in parliament] on the increase of U.S. bases in Greece:

"The confidential report of the group of U.S. senators, who visited Greece, to the U.S. Senate on the current situation in Greece is extremely revealing on the extent of U.S. bases and the strehgth of U.S. personnel with which they are staffed and, consequently, on the calamitous consequences to our country's independence and our international relations. It is specifically revealed that there is a total of 16 bases (four major ones and 12 auxiliary) manned by 4,000 Americans and an equivalent number of auxiliary personnel. According to the report, these bases, which are strewn throughout the country, have a mission to facilitate strategic moves, naval operations and communications and to store war material and ammunition over and above their training purposes. In addition installations in Greece facilitate the conducting of reconnaissance flights and navel patrols in the eastern Mediterranean.

"Consequently, under today's conditions of deterioration in the international situation and intense U.S. military activity in the area of the eastern Mediterranean and the Middle East, the dangers to our country are self-evident. As a result the problem does not concern renegotiations but the commencement of the process for completely getting rid of these bases.

"The appropriate ministers are requested to inform Parliament on whether the government will insist upon the very same policy or whether in the face of international developments it will at some time resolve to proceed toward a policy of independence and equality with all countries."

I AVYI REJECTS 'SECRET DIPLOMACY' IN ANKARA TALKS

AT021230 Athens I AVYI in Greek 1 Jul 80 p 8

[From the "I Avyi" column: "The Moment of Truth"]

[Text] What the Greek people have learned from government sources and the state television regarding exactly what happened in Ankara is so limited and so confusing that nobody can reach definite conclusions about anything except for the fact that Mitsotakis and his Turkish counterpart Erkmen have become "personal friends" within the framework of the "Venizelos-Atatruk spirit." However, if we remember correctly, the "Venizelos-Ataturk spirit" was born and blossomed when Greeck recognized the reality which the Asia Minor catastrophe created. On the recognition of what reality is the rebirth of that "spirit" now based when 40 percent of Cyprus is occupied by Turkish troops and when Turkish demands in the Aegean are very clear?

We are not saying these things because we purportedly oppose a friendly and honest discussion with Turkey of all problems separating the two countries. However, we do not believe that delusions should be cultivated among the people by implementing methods of "secret diplomacy" which prepare faits accomplis. And unfortunately, within the euphoria of the "reborn Greek-Turkish friendship" there are some most disquieting indications.

Speaking about Greek-Turkish relations, Turkish Foreign Minister Erkmen said that "intervention by third parties, either for mediation or for exertion of pressure, is not needed." This observation is very correct, but the Greek-Turkish dialogue in Ankara took place due to the mediation ("arbitration" we would say) of U.S. Secretary of State Muskie who, without remembering either Venizelos or Ataturk (it is doubtful that he even knows them,) described things much more simply: Greece must return to the military wing of NATO as soon as possible for the sake of the alliance's southeastern flank and so that U.S. bases on Greek territory can be guaranteed. Greeks and Turks must agree by holding the necessary talks, amid this spirit, so that the Turkish "veto" can be eliminated. After all, the solution of differences in the Aegean concerns certain "details" which General Rogers will elaborate on.

Consequently, the current Greek-Turkish dialogue is developing within the "Muskie spirit" rather than within the "Venizelos-Ataturk spirit". Reports from Brussels which mention that Rogers is preparing to propose the Italians as the commanders of the "allied" control zone in the Aegean (which will include almost the entire area of the Greek Aegean islands) indicate most clearly the direction toward which the "good officers" of NATO are moving for the solution of Greek-Turkish differences.

Consequently, we do not object to a Greek-Turkish dialogue without "arbitration," mediation or pressure by third parties, especially by the United States. However, the dialogue which has begun in Ankara is not of this nature at all. And if we take into consideration the U.S. haste to "resolve" the issue of our country's return to the military wing of NATO before the coming into force of the agreement for accession to the EEC--that is, before January 1981--it is easy to understand the compulsive tone of the discussions in Ankara that were inaugurated with such warm words about "Greek-Turkish friendship".

It seems that the "moment of truth" has arrived. All those things about a "balance of forces" with Turkey which constituted the axis of the government's "grand policy" will be swept aside like playing cards. Our country is being pressured to answer "yes or no" and, in fact, without delay or "tricks." This is the language with which it is addressed. What will it reply?

We are afraid that the Rallis government does not yet understand that "petty cunning" is unsuccessful in dealing with the kind of people it has become involved with. We are afraid it has not prepared itself for possible borderline situations that are now developing and that it has not oriented itself toward great, but uniquely correct decisions for the protection of national interests because these issues do not lie within the search for "acceptable conditions" for a return to the military wing of NATO. By presenting the problem in this way, the road for sad concessions is already laid. This concerns a radically wrong choice for both the immediate and the future interests of the nation.

We propose the one and only reply that will simultaneously open the road for frank Greek-Turkish relations: Suspension of any discussion for a return to the military wing of NATO and closure of the U.S. bases. From then on, everything can be truly "examined under a new light," if we want to borrow Mitsotakis' expression in reply to a question by reporters in Ankara.

As long as this uniquely correct reply is not placed within the quiver of the Rallis government--not as a vague possibility but as an immediate need--embraces with Erkmen will bring to mind the "granting of honors" to the Greek flag at NATO headquarters in Izmir in 1956 at a time when thousands of Greeks--victims of the terrible pogrom of the autumn 1955--were abandoning Constantinople, naked and driven out forever. Unfortunately, it is not only Constantinople which is the only concern, but the future of Greece itself.

ECEVIT, DEMIREL ON PRIOR APPROVAL FOR U-2 FLIGHTS

TA041701 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1600 GMT 4 Jul 80

[Text] In its broadcasts this morning the BBC carried a report that Prime Minister Suleyman Demirel told a group of U.S. senators that the Turkish Government does not require the approval of the Soviet Union for the U-2 planes which will conduct reconnaissance flights at the Soviet border. Following this report, Prime Minister Suleyman Demirel and RPP leader Bulent Ecevit made statements.

In a news conference this morning, Ecevit recalled the BBC report and said that he expects the prime minister to either confirm or deny the report by noon tomorrow. Ecevit recalled that the goal of the U.S. U-2 flights is to supervise whether the Soviet Union is violating the SALT treaty. Ecevit explained that during his government it was noted that these flights would not be permitted without the consent of the Soviet Union. Pointing out that the United States submitted such a request to the Turkish Government during his term in office, Ecevit recalled that he replied to the United States that both the Soviet Union and the United States--the two sides of the treaty--should agree before Turkey could be expected to do such a thing. Noting that Demirel, who was in the opposition at that time, said that in the event of a clash these flights would greatly endanger Turkey, Ecevit said: I would not like to believe that after becoming the prime minister Mr Demirel would knowingly accept endangering Turkey.

A journalist alluded to the BBC report this morning and asked the views of Demirel, who was talking to journalists after his weekly meeting with Acting President Ishan Sabri Caglayangil today. Demirel replied: My view is very clear. I expressed my view when this subject was brought up. You either say yes or you say no. If Turkey's reply were to be determined after consulting another country, then we would damage our own sovereignty. Pointing out that the government which was in power at that time wanted to consult the Soviet Union on the subject, Demirel said: I criticized that method of approach. I told the senators exactly the same thing that I told the public that day. In other words, I did not say: No, he should not have consulted, he should permitted it. I did say: He should not have consulted anyone, he should have given his own reply. If you ask me the same question a century later, you will receive the same reply. Was permission given for the U-2 flights? What permission? No one asked us for any permission!

Ecevit on Assembly's Role

TA051708 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1600 GMT 5 Jul 80

[Text] RPP leader Bulent Ecevit has said that the next time the United States asks Turkish authorities to allow U.S. military aircraft to use Turkish airspace for checking on the implementation of the strategic arms limitation agreement, the government must consult the Turkish Grand National Assembly before making a decision on the matter.

In a written statement issued in Ankara, Ecevit said that when the RPP was in power the United States had asked it to allow flights necessary for observing Soviet land and airspace. Ecevit recalled that he had replied at the time that Turkey was not a party to the strategic arms limitation agreement but that if a Turkish contribution to the agreement was expected--an agreement that carries great importance for world peace--then the countries that are parties to the agreement should first agree on a Turkish contribution. Ecevit added that his government had also informed the United States that if the United States and the Soviet Union would agree on a Turkish contribution then the authorized bodies of the Turkish state would have to decide whether or not U.S. military aircraft would be allowed to use Turkish airspace.

The RPP leader noted that it was understood from a report submitted to the U.S. Senate that the Demirel government is pursuing a policy different from that of the RPP. Ecevit said: This different attitude was confirmed by Prime Minister Demirel. We are concerned about this.

Ecevit then said: The United States asked our government to allow the flights, but Mr Demirel said at the time that the flights should not be permitted and that, if we agreed to them, Turkey would be placed in front of a cannon.

Ecevit said that the next time the United States asks Turkish authorities to allow U.S. military aircraft to use Turkish airspace, the issue should be discussed in the Turkish Grand National Assembly because the decision to be taken on the issue, if not taken carefully, might place Turkey in front of a cannon, in the terms used by Mr Demirel himself last year.

DEMIREL COMMENTS ON AGREEMENT WITH U.S., INTERNATIONAL ISSUES

TA041759 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1600 GMT 4 Jul 80

[Excerpt] Replying to questions by journalists after his weekly meeting with Acting President Ihsan Sabri Caglayangil today, Prime Minister Suleyman Demirel recalled that the defense cooperation agreement between Turkey and the United States is in effect and said that his government does not intend to conceal the agreement from the nation or from the nation's representatives. Demirel said: The agreement serves the interests of Turkey. The Turkish Grand National Assembly will receive the defense cooperation agreement with understanding.

In reply to a question on Turkey's full membership in the EEC, Demirel said: The EEC issue is an important subject for Turkey. I wish Turkey could join the EEC tomorrow and adapt itself to the economic system of the EEC. However, Turkey should not be left outside the EEC system, which is an economic and commercial system. It currently has relations with the EEC as an associate member. Even if it is not a member Turkey would, nevertheless, conduct the maximum trade with EEC countries. This is necessitated by Turkey's location in the world. However, if, while doing this, Turkey is able to secure certain possibilities for its development and establish a competitive economy, then it would be very beneficial for Turkey.

Replying to another question, Demirel said that it would be very erroneous to say that production in Turkey has dropped on the basis of the figures for the first 4 months of 1980. He said the figures at the end of the year would reflect very satisfactory results.

Demirel added that he received the impression from his meeting with the Greek foreign minister and from messages he received from Greek President Karamanlis and Prime Minister Rallis that Turkey and Greece are determined to solve their problems in a manner in line with good-neighborliness, with understanding and in a cool-headed and intelligent manner.

TA032024 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1900 GMT 3 Jul 80

[Text] A Sudanese trade delegation headed by the minister of cooperation, commerce and supply, Faruq al-Maqbul, arrived in Ankara for official contacts today. The delegation was received at Ankara Esenboga Airport by Commerce Minister Halil Basol who pointed out that this was the first time a visit at the ministerial level was being carried out between Turkey and Sudan.

He stressed that the visit was thus especially significant. He expressed the belief that this visit would make important contributions to the further development of the trade relations between the two countries. The Sudanese minister discussed the importance of the historic and religious ties between Turkey and Sudan. He said that his country was ready for all kinds of cooperation to develop and expand its relations with Turkey. The official talks between the Turkish and Sudanese delegations begin tomorrow. A commercial agreement is expected to be signed at the end of the 2 days of talks.

Talks Begin

[Text] Talks have begun in Ankara on increasing the economic and commercial relations between Turkey and Sudan. The Turkish delegation is headed by Commerce Minister Halil Basol and the Sudanese delegation by the minister of cooperation, commerce and supply, Faruq al-Maqbul, who arrived in Ankara yesterday. In a speech before the talks, Halil Basol said that Turkey and Sudan, which are developing countries, will complement each other economically and contribute to each other's development efforts. Basol pointed out that despite the historic and religious ties between the two countries, their trade relations were not at the desired level. He added that this visit would be a leap in the relations. The Sudanese minister of cooperation, commerce and supply said that it was interesting that the commercial and economic relations between the two countries, which had strong historic and religious ties, were extremely insufficient. He pointed out that the ways in which Turkey and Sudan could contribute to each other's development efforts would be discussed at the talks. He stressed that the commercial agreement to be signed would constitute an important start in the relations. The Turkish-Sudanese talks will end tomorrow. The agreement, which will organize the commercial relations between the two countries, is expected to be signed tomorrow.

According to the agreement, Turkey will export construction material, light industry goods and chemicals to Sudan. Turkey will import fuel oil, leather and long-fiber cotton.

DEMIREL, ERKMEN RECEIVE VISITING ISLAMIC MAYORS

TA032127 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkihs 2000 GMT 3 Jul 80

[Text] The mayors of the capitals of several Islamic countries who are in Ankara for the meetings of the administrative council of their municipalities' union are continuing with their contacts. Prime Minister Suleyman Demirel and Foreign Minister Hayrettin Erkmen received them this morning. They were received by National Salvation Party leader Necmettin Erbakan at 1800. Erbakan said relations between Turkey and the Islamic countries must be further developed. He added that the Islamic countries must establish their own Islamic cultural union. The mayors visited RPP leader Bulent Ecevit at 1900. Ecevit said that cooperation among the developing countries must be further developed so that they can struggle more effectively in the international arena. During these meetings, the visiting mayors stressed that the economic and social relations among the Islamic countries must be rapidly developed.

FOREIGN MINISTER ERKMEN ON ECONOMIC AID, NEIGHBORING COUNTRIES

LD030955 London AD-DUSTUR in Arabic 30 Jun-6 Jul 80 pp 27, 28

[Interview granted by Turkish Foreign Minister Hayrettin Erkmen to Zahi 'Azar in Paris--date not given]

[Text] [Question] Turkey is now pursuing an economic policy which was defined in the 5-year plan which was approved in 1978 and aims at reducing the budget deficit by one-third, that is by about $2 billion by 1983. How do you view the progress of this plan today after the recent rise in oil prices?

[Answer] The rise in oil prices will of course affect our plan, but it is not the only factor. Oil purchases and price rises are crises to be added to other crises.

The recent rise in oil prices has placed us in a difficult situation. Two years ago we were paying about $1.5 billion [presumably annually] while today we pay $3.5 billion. That is an increase of $2.0 billion. This is a large figure if compared with our payments. Therefore, the oil price increase affects us.

On the other hand, we understand that the oil-exporting countries need to calculate their profits and do not wish for those profits to be reduced. We cannot complain because those countries want to maintain the level of their profits; but if they arbitrarily decide to increase profits and the matter becomes one of competition among them, then their position is no longer defensible.

It will be difficult to maintain a balanced budget and the deficit in payments will definitely be affected. But the pressure caused by the increase in oil prices, which will increase the deficit, can be reduced if it is coupled with an equivalent increase in the price of the raw material we export. We hope that the wheat price will increase a little more than we estimated, in which case the rate of deficit will be reduced.

[Question] Does Turkey, by virture of its OECD membership, hope that the organization member states will play some part in mitigating the effect of the oil price increase on it?

[Answer] There is no clear solution to this matter yet, but there is an inclination to contact the oil-exporting countries and ask them to reduce this increase so that the various countries can, first, afford to buy the oil and, second, be able to balance their budgets to some degree.

We can say that this is beginning to have some effect in persuading exporting countries to "trim" their prices.

[Question] The OECD countries have worked out a program to help Turkey. Probably the largest amount that the organization has given to a member was the recent $1 billion. How do you evaluate the volume of this aid and is it attached to political obligations on your part?

[Answer] One of the objectives of this organization is to give aid to member states to alleviate economic difficulties. Talks began 2 months ago between the organization and the Turkish Government. The talks resulted in a decision to allocate aid to Turkey, the burden of which will be shared by the various member states. Bilateral agreements will be concluded between Turkey and these countries. We have so far concluded agreements with three or four of these countries.

I can say that we have been understood. I do not wish to discuss the volume of aid because it has already been finally approved. Had they given us more: We would certainly have accepted it gladly.

[Question] Is there any relation between this and the improvement of your relations with the United States, in the light of new developments towards a solution to the Cyprus problem?

[Answer] There is, of course, some development on this level. We do not consider the Cyprus question as causing a crisis between the United States and Turkey. The Cyprus war was, of course, considered a major event between Turkey and the United States, which imposed a ban on the purchase of some arms. Today we maintain our previous attitude to the Cyprus problem; it is a principled attitude. We demand that the two countries come together to agree on the regime or form of government they want for Cyprus. We propose a federation as a reasonable solution to this problem because we are still opposed to the restoration of the unitary state in Cyprus, in view of the existence of two communities on the island. Now we are waiting for the talks between the two sides to begin. The problem today is in the hands of the UN secretary general, who is at present proposing the beginning of discussions, starting from the issues on which the two sides agree.

Makarios and Denktas began these talks several years ago and agreed on several points and afterwards there were some contacts between Denktas and Kyprianou. What is important is to consider all proposals, after which discussion between the two communities would be frutiful. But we note on the other hand that the Greek Cypriot community is always expressing objections to beginning such discussions.

We always hope that the Greek Cypriots will agree to begin dialogue, because it is only through this method that a solution can be reached. To this day the Greek Cypriots have refused all proposals submitted by the Turkish Cypriots, without accepting any discussion of them.

[Question] Recently you participated in the Islamabad Islamic summit and the conference participants adopted several resolutions. How do you view the impact of implementing these resolutions on your area within the context of the general world situation today?

[Answer] Today we are generally satisfied with the Islamabad Islamic summit resolutions. What is more important to us today is the question of Afghanistan. We consider that the conditions which that country is experiencing today must be the concern of the entire world. On this the countries taking part in the Islamic summit agreed unanimously. But a number of these countries did not see the real importance and significance of this problem.

[Question] Do you mean by these... [as published]

[Answer] Yes. But in any case their stand did not go beyond expressing certain reservations. It was generally agreed to take the side of the Afghan rebels.

On the other hand the Islamic summit resolutions included a clause on the Cyprus problem. The participating countries expressed the hope that tension between the two communities would disappear and that direct negotiations for self-determination begin.

Here again, certain countries expressed reservations on this subject, but the majority agreed.

[Question] Following the Iranian revolution the area has been witnessing community and political unrest. Disturbances have taken place in many parts of Turkey and many political assassinations have occurred. Do you expect an improvement in the situation to follow the expected improvement in the economic situation?

[Answer] We consider the Iranian revolution to be an internal matter and we have no right to interfere in it. I do not believe that they want to expand their revolution and export it to neighboring countries.

It is up to Iranian officials to ensure that their achievements are not exported abroad. Such an attitude would mark their adherence to noninterference in the affairs of neighboring countries. Although some of them try to depart from this norm, we hope that all the outstanding problems will be solved peacefully. Our policy is to advocate the maintenance of good-neighborly relations with all the neighboring and Islamic countries and hope that there will be no reasons for the creation of differences between us. There is nothing in our foreign policy that might contradict our neighbors' policy, particularly with regard to the Palestine problem. I believe that we have this feeling in common with the other countries of the area, and we have come to this conclusion during the Islamabad summit and the bilateral contacts we have had with the Arab and other parties.

With regard to disturbances in Turkey, like everybody else we have a number of terrorists. We are trying to make them see the logic of law and national legality.

[Question] How do you view the development of relations between Turkey and the Arab countries in general following the improvement of relations with the PLO?

[Answer] We have had a PLO representative for a year now. Our relations are generally good, and we are trying to understand the Palestinian Arab demand for the establishment of a Palestinian state. We believe that it is a natural right for them and we hope that one day they will obtain a land on which to build their awaited state.

Our relations with the Arab countries are good and all we hope for is that the Arabs will end their differences and devote themselves to the future.

DEMIREL CRITICIZES RPP INTERPELLATION OF GOVERNMENT

TA031847 Ankara Domestic Service in Tirkish 1600 GMT 3 Jul 80

[Excerpts] Prime Minister Suleyman Demirel has said that the interpellation submitted by the RPP created the impression that the government was on its way out and that this greatly upset the balance established by the government. Demirel said: The government is now at the most sensitive part of its duties. However, our citizens may have peace of mind: We will save Turkey from the present conditions. The Council of Ministers convened under Demirel at 1130. At the end of the meeting, which lasted about 2 and 1/2 hours, Demirel said the Council of Ministers made a general assessment of the situation and that it would reconvene at 2200.

On the interpellation submitted against the government, Demirel said: As a result of the impression created in the country that the government would fall, people became uneasy and there is a rush to buy goods. Now we must again put things in order and overcome this hysteria. I request our citizens not to be carried away by provocations. As long as we hold office we will perform our tasks in full accord with the laws of the Turkish Republic. The state has the power to overcome excessive acts and we have enough sense of duty and courage to exercise this power. This sense of uneasiness is the cause of the incidents that are occurring in various parts of the country. Certain types of anarchy, motivated by the feeling that the government would fall, have been encouraged and have caused trouble in various places. Within a few days disturbances have occurred in Corum, Sivas and Ordu. However, I am hopeful that we will overcome all these troubles and restore full peace in the country.

Prime Minister Demirel added that the country would not experience any shortages of goods in 1980 and called on the citizens not to rush to buy goods. Demirel said that as long as his government remained in power there would be no shortages of gasoline, diesel oil, natural gas, sugar, medicine and fertilizer.

Replying to reporters' questions, Demirel said his party would exert efforts to secure the early election of the new president. He added that there was no question of his party changing its presidential candidate.

In reply to another question, Demirel said that there was enough foreign exchange in the central bank and that Turkey's foreign exchange needs for 1980 had been completely met. He added that the creditor countries had accepted in principle the deferral of debt payments totaling $789 million which would become due during the current year. Demirel said the production situation was improving and better results would be obtained in the months to come. He declared: Let no one feel concerned; Turkey will import goods, including oil, worth nearly $8 billion. Demirel said that government efforts to reduce the rate of price rises have also begun to produce positive results and that figures for the month of June were encouraging. He said price rises had dropped from 10 percent a month to 2.5 to 3 percent. He said: If Turkey can maintain this percentage during July and August, this will be a good sign in combating inflation. Demirel concluded by saying that the government would use various democratic measures in a bid to increase investments and production to the highest possible level.

ECEVIT: ERBAKAN INSISTED ON PREMIERSHIP BEFORE CONFIDENCE VOTE

TA041028 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1600 GMT 3 Jul 80

[Excerpt] RPP leader Bulent Ecevit said that during his contacts with the NSP prior to the vote of confidence held yesterday, NSP leader Erbakan's premiership was proposed as a definite condition. Revealing that he did not accept this condition, Ecevit said: I was very surprised to hear Mr Erbakan deny this yesterday. At a news conference he held in parliament, Ecevit said that he had received the impression that there were no differences of opinion between the RPP and NSP about the aim and functions of the national solution restoration government they had talked about. Ecevit added: However, the issue reached a standstill when Mr Erbakan insisted on becoming the prime minister of that government. We said that even the largest party in the National Assembly should not assume the premiership of such a restoration, unity and peace government. So we could not have allowed the premiership to be assumed by a member of a 22-member party. The proposal to make Mr Erbakan the prime minister was first made during the weekend. We said it was impossible. Nothing more was said about that until 2 days ago when the NSP said that this was a condition. This ran counter to the government formula we had been promoting. The NSP seemed to approve of the idea of that government formula on the one hand and to propose a condition that made the establishment of such a government impossible on the other. Naturally, we could not accept their proposal.

Erbakan Denial

TA041034 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1600 GMT 3 Jul 80

[Text] NSP leader Necmettin Erbakan said that his party did not cast a vote of confidence in the government but that it cast a white vote on the interpellation.
The real meaning of the results of the voting was that the minute the work on the establishment of a new government is concluded the present government will be toppled by 236 red votes.

At a news conference he held in parliament, Erbakan said that before the vote of confidence he had not received any convincing or clear answers from the concerned parties and from parliament on the establishment of a national solution restoration government. He said: We waited for that until the last minute. The answers to these two questions were not given to us: Why an independent prime minister and not a party-member minister? And if it is going to be a non-party prime minister who is that non-party prime minister who will carry out the national solution? They said: "Let us first topple this government, we will think about the issue of a prime minister later." No, we could not accept that. Under these conditions, Erbakan said, the NSP deputies had cast white votes to prevent a government crisis. He added: That is the real meaning of the vote of confidence held yesterday. In reality, 236 members of parliament believe that this government can do no good for the country. The reason that this reality was reflected as 227 votes in favor and 214 against is that the work on the establishment of the new government is not yet completed.

The NSP leader stressed that nothing was lost following yesterday's vote and that the work on the establishment of a new government would continue. He added that the minute this work was completed, if necessary, the NSP itself would submit an interpellation against the present government. Asked whether the NSP had set a condition that the prime minister of the new government would have to be an NSP member, Erbakan replied: We want a national solution government. It is very natural for the prime minister to be from the NSP. However, we are not setting this as a condition. We are ready to accept a prime minister from another party or an independent if we are convinced that he can carry out a national solution, that he will restore and not destroy. We are ready to accept such a prime minister if we are convinced.

ECEVIT OPPOSES APPOINEMENT OF SENATORS BY ACTING PRESIDENT

TA041851 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1600 GMT 4 Jul 80

[Text] RPP leader Bulent Ecevit has said that he does not consider it possible that any citizen who respects parliamentary democracy would accept an appointment as senator by an acting president. Ecevit expressed this view during a news conference today after the ceremony for independent Deputies Hilmi Isguzar, Tuncay Mataraci and Hasan Korkut, who joined the RPP.

Ecevit said that he still considers Prime Minister Suleyman Demirel's statement in the beginning of June, on the subject of the appointment of senators by an acting president, to be valid. He said, however, that if at the end of 1 month the view still exists that the acting president should appoint new senators, his party cannot accept this view. Noting that his party cannot accept the fact that the acting president feels obliged to appoint the five senators because of the 1 month limit in the Constitution, Ecevit continued:

In the softest terms, this would be a very shadowy appointment. If this appointment is made by the honorable acting president, who is a member of the JP, new interpretations and explanations would be attributed to the current hindrances by the JP in a bid to obstruct the election of a president. It would be concluded that the JP is obstructing the election of a president in a bid to obtain--without any right--five senatorial seats.

Ecevit noted that it was clear from the beginning that a president could not be elected without an interparty conciliation. Noting that Demirel had rejected his party's appeals for a conciliation for the past 4 months, Ecevit continued: Our appeals concerning the presidential election are still valid and will always be valid. However, the JP government is obviously not disturbed by a state without a president, because it is a government which can survive only by obstructing the functioning of the parliament.

Ecevit recalled that, in his statement yesterday National Salvation Party leader Necmettin Erbakan announced that he would not insist on a premiership in a government to be established if the current government is toppled. Ecevit said: This is a positive and hopeful development. I hope that this attitude will continue in the future as well.

In reply to a question on whether his party is considering cooperation with socialist parties which are not represented in the parliament in the struggle against fascism, Ecevit said that the RPP is opposed to polarization. Ecevit noted: In defending democracy, there should not be a separation between left and right. In its real meaning, democracy constitutes a guarantee for the sound and free existence of both the right and the left.

Ecevit pointed out that Demirel attributed the shortages, the shaky situation of his administration and the attacks in certain circles to the interpellation. He said: In my view, the reason for Demirel connecting these recent attacks to the interpellation motion submitted by us is clear. This connection carries the following threat: If you attempt to topple this government, then we cannot control or stop certain persons. The houses of RPP supporters could be destroyed, their quarters could be burned and they could be killed. You--RPP leaders and legislators--could also be killed.

JP Supports Appointment

TA041922 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1600 GMT 4 Jul 80

[Excerpt] A statement issued by the Justice Party [JP] leadership council called on the RPP to hold early elections. JP deputy leader Yigit Koker announced the statement in a news conference today.

Koker recalled that Senate President Ibrahim Sevkitasagun became acting president when President Cemal Gursel was taken ill on 14 March 1966 and appointed Cevdet Sunay as senator during his term as acting president. Koker said: RPP leader Bulent Ecevit's statement that honorable Caglayangil will not appoint senators, as the Constitution stipulates, is merely ridiculous. There is no procedure more natural and more constitutional than the appointment of senators within the time stipulated by the Constitution by honorable Caglayangil, who would have been requested to appoint the new prime minister and the Council of Ministers if the interpellation, which was submitted by Ecevit and his colleagues and which was rejected by the National Assembly the other day, was approved. Ecevit's claims to the contrary are unconstitutional and aim to create a tempest in a teacup and deceive the public.

DEMIREL, COUNCIL OF MINISTERS DISCUSS SITUATION IN CORUM

Demirel Statement

TA051836 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1800 GMT 5 Jul 80

[Text] The Council of Ministers convened at 1930 to discuss the incidents that occurred in Corum. In a statement to the press before the meeting Prime Minister Demirel said the situation was now calm in Corum and that the measures already taken and to be taken would be discussed by the Council of Ministers. Demirel said: The state is in control of everything. The state forces have made great efforts and protected the public order and they continue to protect it.

Pointing out that 15 citizens were killed during the incidents, Demirel said: The provocations, enmities, hatred and grudges that turn the citizens against each other cannot be easily prevented.

I ask citizens every day: What good does it do to go after each other's throat? Why are you killing each other when there is so much to do in the country? I am telling everyone once again: Turkish citizens must be left alone. There are forces that want Turkey to collapse. I am telling everyone outside these forces: We will destroy the forces that want Turkey to collapse. Do not ask us when. This is a struggle. However, everybody must help the state. You ask me how you can help the state, I will say by not being carried away by provocations, by not doing wrong things and by trusting the state and the state's security forces. Replying to a question, Demirel said that martial law would not be imposed in the province of Corum.

Council of Ministers Statement

TA052037 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 2000 GMT 5 Jul 80

[Excerpt] This evening the Council of Ministers meeting lasted 90 minutes. A written statement issued after the meeting says that the Council of Ministers was briefed by Interior Minister Mustafa Gulcugil, Health and Social Welfare Minister Munis Islamoglu, Gendarme Commander Gen Sedat Celasun and Security Director General Ismail Dokuzoglu, who returned to Ankara from Corum today. The statement then says: The Council of Ministers was grieved to see that, despite all the measures taken by the state to ensure peace and calm, the members of a nation who have lived together through suffering and happiness for centuries were carried away by provocations, thus causing bloodshed among brothers and damaging national property.

The statement says that the state has sent a sufficient number of security forces to the site of the incidents to ensure the supremacy of law and public order and that it will continue to take all measures to ensure absolute calm. The Council of Ministers called on the citizens not to be carried away by provocations, to refrain from shedding the blood of their brothers and to help the state in its efforts to ensure peace and calm.

Giscard, Schmidt Talks

LD071616 Paris Domestic Service in French 1500 GMT 7 Jul 80

[Excerpt] Valery Giscard d'Estaing began his first round of talks with Chancellor Helmut Schmidt in Bonn a short time ago. The two men are discussing the Afghan crisis, East-West relations and, naturally, problems of security in Europe.

Genscher-Francois-Poncet Talks

LD071820 Hamburg DPA in German 1620 GMT 7 Jul 80

[Text] Bonn--In a 1-hour special exchange of views with French Foreign Minister Jean Francois-Poncet, Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher, gave an assessment of his trip to Moscow. This was announced by a Foreign Office spokesman. They also discussed the developments in the Middle East.

No official information was given about the subject of the discussions between Schmidt and Giscard which probably also dealt with the visit to Moscow. Giscard had a meeting in May with the Soviet state and party leader Leonid Brezhnev in Warsaw.

Giscard Dinner Speech

LD071920 Hamburg DPA in German 1837 GMT 7 Jul 80

[Text] Bonn--During a dinner tonight at Schloss Falkenlust, French President Giscard again stressed his expectations that together the reconciled and friendly peoples of France and the Federal Republic will succeed in initiating the rebirth of an influential Europe.

The French president said in his dinner speech that it is the duty of both nations "to preserve Europe through their united forces from the shadowy existence threatening it and to provide it again with the power and influence in the world which it deserves," for a strong and independent Europe is in the interests of peace and the balance of forces in the world. According to Giscard, French and FRG membership in the Western NATO defense alliance in no way forms an obstacle to such an "independent and self-assured Europe."

Giscard-Genscher Talks

LD080834 Hamburg DPA in German 0653 GMT 8 Jul 80

[Text] Bonn--French President Valery Giscard d'Estaing received Federal Foreign Ministers Hans-Dietrich Genscher for a political exchange of views at Gymnich Castle near Bonn this morning. An important subject at the meeting was the recent talks of Chancellor Helmut Schmidt and Genscher in Moscow.

After the meeting with Genscher, Giscard will travel to Baden-Wuerttemberg. In Baden-Baden, he and Helmut Schmidt will view a German-French parade at the French Army headquarters. The Baden-Wuerttemberg Land Government, headed by Minister President Lothar Spaeth, will then give a luncheon in honor of the French president and his wife at the Parkhotel in Baden-Baden.

BONN DENIES SUPPLYING ANTITANK MISSILES TO AFGHAN REBELS

LD071708 Hamburg DPA in German 1537 GMT 7 Jul 80

[Text] Bonn--The Federal Government today once again strongly refuted a report in PRAVDA over the weekend accusing the Federal Republic of supplying antitank missiles to Muslim resistance forces in Afghanistan.

Government Spokesman Klaus Boelling told the press in Bonn that there is "absolutely nothing in" this story. It has, on the contrary, been "invented."

According to the PRAVDA report, the United States is said to be supplying the Afghan rebels with weapons, and the Federal Republic, as well as Japan, is involved in this.

CHANCELLOR SCHMIDT INTERVIEWED ON MOSCOW VISIT

DW071155 Hamburg DER SPIEGEL in German 7 Jul 80 pp 25-31

[Interview with Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt by editors Rudolf Augstein, Paul Lersch and Erich Boehme in the chancellor's office in Bonn]

[Text] SPIEGEL: Mr Chancellor, your visit to Moscow has been disappointing to many people because you brought back more than they expected. On the other hand, other people were disappointed because they thought you could have achieved more. How do you assess the result of your Moscow visit, and what have you actually achieved?

Schmidt: One cannot assess the overall international situation in any other way than by saying that it is tense and dangerously aggravated on several points. There is the intervention in Afghanistan, the hostage situation and the Persian Gulf, the Palestinian hotbed of tension, Jerusalem, the rights of the Israelis, the rights of the Palestinians and so forth. There is the danger that the West and the East could relapse into an uncontrolled arms race in the field of Eurostrategic nuclear arms.

As regards the first three situations, we have brought about a situation whereby the Soviet leadership, which was numerically very heavily represented in our talks, has taken cognizance of an intensified representation of our analyses. We based our treatment of the Afghanistan situation on our consultations in the European Community, NATO, the Venice meeting and particularly on the two conferences of the Islamic states in Islamabad. We strongly urged the Soviets to give attention to the exploratory delegation which emerged from the Islamabad conference.

SPIEGEL: Did you discuss concrete possibilities of a solution?

Schmidt: I think we added a few drops with regard to this situation--and many drops will wear away a stone--adding to the impression on the Soviet side that a political solution, a political end to the intervention in Afghanistan is necessary to overcome this crisis.

This also applies in a similar but different way to the situation of the hostages taken in Tehran and to the situation in the Persian Gulf. The Soviet leadership said very clearly that it condemns the taking of hostages, but most of our time was spent on such issues as Afghanistan and Eurostrategic arms.

SPIEGEL: Assuming that you have not brought along anything else, would you still consider such a discussion necessary and useful in view of the dangers you have described?

Schmidt: Yes, I believe so. I have been saying for many years that one must talk with each other in critical times and that one must listen to what the other is saying so that crises will be defused and not aggravated.

But one cannot say that we have not brought anything with us. The Soviet leadership understands that there is no chance of separating the Federal Republic of Germany from NATO's two-part decision. I told the leadership that I not only deny that the Americans compelled me to stand by the decision, but I pointed out that I was one of the originators of the decision, and that this is why it is absolutely out of the question for me to dissociate myself from it. But the Soviet Union sees the danger of the arms race as much as we do. General Secretary Brezhnev, Mr Kosygin and the other gentlemen are not adventurers. They are as worried about warlike events as any reasonable person.

SPIEGEL: Chancellor candidate Strauss said in the Bundestag that the present situation cannot be compared with that of 1914, as you have recently done, but much rather with 1939.

Schmidt: I consider the latter to be nonsense.

But let me get back to Moscow: Brezhnev and his colleagues in the Soviet leadership are as afraid of war as we are here. They do not want to run the risk of a war, and they know that an arms race can exacerbate the situation. This is why I predicted last year that the Russians would be prepared to negotiate; but I could not say when or under what conditions. It has turned out that the effect of these many efforts is that they are prepared to negotiate and they are even prepared to have immediate talks.

I consider this indeed to be an important point, namely, that the stagnation existing for half a year has been overcome.

SPIEGEL: May we stay for just a moment with Afghanistan. Both sides again outlined their known standpoints without any movement on the matter. You said that both sides have learned something from the intense talks. Can you tell us what?

Schmidt: I hesitate to answer that because one does not discuss confidential diplomatic talks. But I will give you an example: I believe that the announcement of a partial withdrawal of Soviet troops from Afghanistan is a consequence of the urgent statements made to the Soviet leadership by Giscard d'Estaing in Warsaw. I do not rule it out therefore that such talks could have later consequences. Brezhnev concluded the negotiations with the remark that what the German side had said also with regard to those points where there was no agreement would be carefully considered. I do not believe that this was merely diplomatic politeness. I made a similar remark.

The decisive thing is that one speaks and listensin a crisis instead of making impressive and threatening gestures to each other, instead of engaging in gestures involving prestige which grow in a spiraling fashion which some day could make parallels to July 1914 not seem so farfetched.

SPIEGEL: The opposition charges that with your visit to Moscow you have helped the Soviet Union escape its international isolation, without having pressed it to make any other step toward withdrawal from Afghanistan.

Schmidt: Well, what the opposition leader says must not necessarily...

SPIEGEL: Who is it, by the way?

Schmidt: You must ask the CDU/CSU yourself about that. But Strauss is undoubtedly the present opposition leader. He seems to believe that the world can be made more peaceful by isolating the Soviet Union and driving it into isolationism. That is wrong. The Soviet Union is a powerful state, it has allies; as a whole it has a great economic potential and particularly a very great military potential, and, due to these two facts, also a great political potential. It is obvious that the West does not have any means of power nor would it be prepared to use military means of power to oust the Soviets by force from Afghanistan. Not even some German opposition speaker is that blind.

This results in the inevitable consequence that a policy is necessary which will prompt the Soviet Union to decide on its own to leave Afghanistan. We must facilitate this and make it easier for it to embark on this path.

We discussed, for example, what countries could guarantee that no foreign troops would move into Afghanistan once the Soviet leadership withdrew its troops.

SPIEGEL: What was the answer?

Schmidt: I have said before that I do not intend to outline details of these talks. But a talk was naturally very useful on who would benefit from the guarantees, who would have to be the recipient of such guarantees and what would have to be put down in the guarantees. Such talks naturally cannot lead in 2 days to a written result that would have to be ratified in the near future. This is, much rather, the promotion of a process of thinking which will take a number of months, I assume.

SPIEGEL: You mean the power polic, instrument of isolating the Soviet Union has less weight than, say, the campaign mounted by Helmut Schmidt to convince and achieve understanding?

Schmidt: The attempt to isolate a world power seems to me to be very adventurous. Somebody must have failed to study the state of affairs on the map correctly.

SPIEGEL: Do you mean the Americans?

Schmidt: No, I mean the one in whose position you placed yourself here during your last three or four questions.

SPIEGEL: But did you get the impression that Brezhnev can consider at all the withdrawal of all troops demanded by the West as long as the situation in Afghanistan continues to be so instable, as seen from the Soviet point of view?

Schmidt: The catchword "political solution" naturally also implies an effort to imagine in which way a domestic policy situation can be brought about in Afghanistan allowing the 1 million refugees to come back from Iran and Pakistan without being exposed to abuse at home, and subsequently in which way civil war can be prevented in that country. All these are very delicate and difficult topics, because at the same time part of the political solution must be that Afghanistan's independence, nonalignment and sovereignty not be restricted from outside.

I have no doubt that the Soviets reflect on all such things; my friend Giscard d'Estaing did not doubt this either following his talks in Warsaw. Just before you came in Giscard d'Estaing and I exchanged our impressions again.

SPIEGEL: PRAVDA has made it plain again that there can be no solution of whatever kind which does not guarantee a government acceptable to Moscow. How does this statement square with the Western ideas of a neutral, nonaligned Afghanistan?

Schmidt: Political declarations of intent are not determined for eternity, even if they are printed by PRAVDA. There are opening positions, then there are intermediate positions, renegotiations, finally there are hopefully final positions, meaning agreement. That is something absolutely normal.

SPIEGEL: Naturally there will never be a solution that Moscow does not approve of.

Schmidt: That is what I said. The solution will come only if the Soviet leadership itself makes a decision in this respect. Therefore, it must be helped to embark on the road toward such a decision.

SPIEGEL: And nonalignment and communism are not mutually exclusive?

Schmidt: Yugoslavia is a nonaligned communist state. There are such examples. But a political solution does not at all have to imply that Afghanistan is bound to be a communist state!

SPIEGEL: Now let us discuss the arms control issue regarding which, as you said yourself, you have come back with a tangible positive result. Undoubtedly you succeeded in making the Soviet Union abandon two prerequisites for resuming negotiations on the control of Eurostrategic arms: The one was the demand for the suspension of NATO's decision to close the arms gap, the other the demand for prior ratification of the SALT II treaty by the United States which, on its part, does not want to ratify as long as the Soviet Union is in Afghanistan. In this respect you were able to do away with the mutual blocking of the two superpowers.

Schmidt: I agree with your analysis.

SPIEGEL: This has created the possibility of holding preliminary negotiations.

Schmidt: Yes.

SPIEGEL: But at the same time the Soviet Union has built up two new obstacles. It says that negotiations can be held, but a result cannot come into force unless SALT II has been ratified. And in such negotiations more has to be discussed than just the Eurostrategic arms which matter at this point, that is to say, more than just the SS-20 missiles and the "Backfire" bombers on the Soviet side and the Pershing-2 and cruise missiles on the American side.

Schmidt: These are not new obstacles. As for SALT II, I understand the position of the Soviet Union. If you have negotiated for 6 or 7 years with the other world power on a treaty on the limitation of lethal nuclear weapons which are termed strategic because they can totally wipe out the Soviet Union, on the one hand, or the United States, on the other, then importance must be placed on this treaty becoming effective. President Carter does. Even such states as the Federal Republic which did not participate in the negotiations consider this very urgent.

Regarding the second point I must tell you that I expect that the Soviet Union would demand that all weapons capable of reaching parts of Soviet territory and not necessarily all of the Soviet Union be included in a round of talks or negotiations on Eurostrategic arms. We use for them the English term "forward based systems" or FBS. This seems to me to be very logical.

At this point I told the Soviet delegations that as a representative of a state which has a vital interest in the resumption of such talks, I would take the libery to state that if the FBS were to be included in the talks on Eurostrategic arms to meet the Soviet's interests, then naturally the corresponding Soviet systems would also have to be included.

SPIEGEL: You mean those weapons which technically are less developed than the SS-20?

Schmidt: Not only technically but also with regard to their range.

SPIEGEL: And which are already installed?

Schmidt: Yes, yes, and which may possibly yet be installed.

SPIEGEL: Does this also include the neutron weapon developed by your friend Giscard d'Estaing?

Schmidt: The answer is no for two reasons: First, because both the Soviets and the North Atlantic Alliance hold the view that negotiations on Eurostrategic weapons must be conducted by the Soviet Union and the United States and not by other. Therefore, no decision can be made on others.

SPIEGEL: That is not logical.

Schmidt: It is historically correct and it also is logical. The Soviet Union also confirmed in Moscow that they are not talking about other nuclear powers now, not about France, but only about the United States and its weapons. They are prepared to resume talks on them without any preconditions.

The second reason is that if France were to decide in a few years to produce neutron weapons they would not be used in Eurostrategic arms systems, if I understand it correctly, but only in theater arms systems, meaning for very short ranges. This second point is another reason why the problem of French neutron weapons is not involved.

SPIEGEL: The United States, too, has talked about neutron weapons again recently. Don't you anticipate new complications in this context?

Schmidt: The problem of neutron weapons, gentlemen, at this point and at present has nothing at all to do with the problem of Eurostrategic arms, not even in the view of the Soviets.

SPIEGEL: In developing their neutron weapons, do the Americans think of theater weapons only?

Schmidt: I am not a military information office. I just said what I think about this.

SPIEGEL: Your critics say that by including other weapons systems in the package of preliminary negotiations or negotiations, the Soviet Union might succeed in dragging the talks out indefinitely and, second, the Soviet Union might succeed through its announced readiness to negotiate in causing the hesitant NATO partners to abandon the NATO decision by granting minor concessions.

Schmidt: I have not heard such a criticism. It seems very stupid to me. You are probably trying to place yourselves in the position of those who are stunned and speechless at this point and do not really know what to say.

SPIEGEL: An argument need not be wrong because it comes from the opposition. It is logical that if more weapons systems are discussed, talks will be longer and more complicated.

Schmidt: If someone were to believe that the matter would be simple, he would not be a useful discussion partner. It is clear so far that at least three systems would have to be included on the Soviet side, namely, the SS-4, SS-5 and SS-20 missiles. In addition, there would be the "Backfire" bomber. Together these are at least four systems. And I stress the words "at least." It is also clear that several systems must be included on the Western side.

None of the experts on the Western side has doubted that when the talks on Eurostrategic arms begin, the Soviet Union because of its security interests will demand the incorporation of the FBS. All of this is not new. I cannot take somebody seriously who says this is too complicated for me or that it lasts too long--sorry.

SPIEGEL: How about the argument that by opening the door to such negotiations one would be encouraging NATO not to take its decision to close the arms gap too seriously?

Schmidt: If there are people who argue like that--I have not heard anything like that from German politicians so far, but it is possible that there are people in other countries who argue in this way--they would be ignoring the fact that our recent Moscow talks have achieved a confirmation of a fundamental political realization on this particular point, namely: If one wants an opponent in noeotiations to renounce his capability of inflicting damage on oneself, then the opponent will be more prepared to renounce that capability if he must take into consideration the fact that the other party is able to inflict similar damage or can gain the capability of inflicting such similar damage.

As long as one does not have that capability, or if one states explicitly that one does not intend to achieve that capability, the incentive for the opponent to give up his superiority will remain very small.

That was the meaning behind NATO's so-called double decision: Saying on the one hand that we will obtain the capability which you, the Soviets, already have and which we do not yet have, on the other hand, however, stating that we are prepared to negotiate on mutual numerical limitations. The second part of the decision is as important as the first.

SPIEGEL: So this would mean in practice that the Soviet Union would just have to keep negotiating until after 1983 to undo the NATO decision.

Schmidt: There is no deadline in 1983, there is just the technical inevitability that the United States is technically not capable before the fall of 1983 of deploying American Eurostrategic arms, which do not exist at present and which must first be developed and produced. There is no political deadline.

SPIEGEL: Does this allow the conclusion that if negotiations with the Soviet Union are in a promising state in 1983, one will not begin to deploy the Pershing-2?

Schmidt: I must say three things in this connection: First, basically I do not like to answer hypothetical questions in politics. Second, once negotiations are being seriously conducted, it is very hard to imagine that it would make sense to eliminate an important prerequisite at the end of negotiations, a prerequisite that caused the other side's willingness to negotiate. I would not indulge in such speculation. Third, one of the purposes of the negotiations is to achieve a decrease in the existing Soviet systems and the systems which are being produced. The Western alliance has explicitly stated in the NATO decision of December 1979 that it will make the number of their own deployments dependent on the result of the negotiations.

SPIEGEL: The impression exists that the United States in its present government situation will not take the second part of the NATO decision as seriously as the first.

Schmidt: Since there are people who have gained such an impression and in order to thoroughly oppose this impression I explicitly asked the American President about this point about 14 days ago in Venice. His answer was nothing new for me, but it gives me the opportunity to quote Jimmy Carter's answer in this discussion today: No doubts at all exist for the American side that both parts of NATO decision are of equal importance for the United States as well.

SPIEGEL: Will the United States enter the arms control negotiations--which it will conduct alone--in such a way and with as much energy as you would like to see?

Schmidt: I am not clairvoyant. But the U.S. Government has stated that it will discuss the new Soviet position "in a constructive spirit" in the North Atlantic Alliance. In other words, the usual NATO consultation process will take place in this matter. I hope it will end with a positive result, namely, a recommendation to our Alliance partner, the United States, to enter such preparatory talks with the Soviet Union.

I do not rule out that certain directives could be taken into consideration in this context, such as what ought to be given priority and what not; what is indispensable and what could possibly be negotiated. But such guidelines could be inserted at a later stage of the talks and negotiations.

SPIEGEL: Will such a NATO consultation take place once the American election campaign has come to an end?

Schmidt: No, I would consider that wrong. I assume that consultations will begin in the Alliance in the near future.

SPIEGEL: How do you assess the chances of positive outcome from such consultations if you face another government after the U.S. elections in November?

Schmidt: Not less than if President Carter formed the next government.

SPIEGEL: One of your consultation requests in Moscow was a talk with Soviet Defense Minister Ustinov. What is your impression of the man, what is your impression of the leadership of the Soviet Union's military apparatus?

Schmidt: I was very curious to meet Minister Ustinov. He is a top-grade expert--that could be seen in the talks which lasted 2 hours--who remembers every fact and relationship. The same applies, by the way, to his deputy, Chief of General Staff Marshal Ogarkov.

The second reason for wanting to see him during this visit was to find out how the Soviet side justifies the fact that it has achieved such alead in the field of Eurostrategic arms through great armament efforts in the past years.

SPIEGEL: Did you succeed in making it clear to Mr Ustinov that his idea is obsolete that NATO is superior to the Soviet Union in the field of territorial defense and that the Soviet Union must keep rearming with SS-20 missiles?

Schmidt: Well, these are terms I would not use and I would not insinuate that Mr Ustinov would. I have told you already that he is obviously somebody who has a clear picture of the problems to be negotiated and who understands them. Military men in the whole world think similarly with regard to one point: If worse comes to worse, they want to be stronger than the other. It is the same with Western generals and admirals as well as with Marshals Ustinov or Ogarkov or Admiral Gorshkov.

SPIEGEL: Could understanding be achieved with Ustinov at least to the effect that the quality of the Soviet potential is continually increasing with the weekly deployment of one additional SS-20 missile, while NATO's potential will remain fixed until 1983?

Schmidt: He did not contradict my statement that the Soviet quality is increasing. But he vigorously pointed out that the quantity of explosive strength is not increasing as a whole because they are scrapping old missiles.

He did not contradict what I then insistently pointed out, namely, that it is not so much a matter of how many megatons of explosives one is operating with as a whole, but that the number of Soviet warheads has doubled in the course of 10 years in this field and that it could hit twice as many targets with maybe a bit less explosive strength for each individual target.

SPIEGEL: Maybe he was not able to contradict this.

Schmidt: I do not want to go into further detail here because it would not be proper. What is decisive is the Soviet offer of negotiations which indicates that the Soviet Union, too, sees that there are antagonistic interests which must be brought into accord. Otherwise they would not be prepared to negotiate.

SPIEGEL: Was the idea you developed some time ago discussed at all, namely, that the Soviet Union, immediately or within a certain period of time, should stop the deployment of further SS-20 missiles?

Schmidt: The Soviet leadership rejected that on the second day of our talks with the remark that it was unacceptable because it is unjust for the Soviets. In doing this they would be renouncing something unilaterally. The Soviet leadership understood it better than the honorable strategists of FRANKFURTER ALLGEMEINE ZEITUNG.

SPIEGEL: There is a certain basic mood here, justified or not, that the Soviet side is trying to separate the Europeans from the Americans. It is also true that many people in Europe believe that they have already succeeded somewhat in doing this.

Schmidt: The Soviet leadership does not foster such delusions as are being disseminated here in Germany by the candidate for chancellor. The Soviet leadership has not doubted at any time that we cannot be separated from our partners in the North Atlantic Alliance or in the European Community. Mr Gromyko, for example, said so just a few weeks ago to Mr Genscher in Vienna. The remarks you cite stem from the Federal German election campaign and from some persons in other European countries who otherwise have not earned much glory with regard to firmness vis-a-vis Eastern partners.

SPIEGEL: They stem also from the American election campaign.

Schmidt: That is quite possible.

SPIEGEL: And not everything that is said in an election campaign is necessarily wrong.

Schmidt: Some correct things are also said in election campaigns....

SPIEGEL: ...provided you say them?

Schmidt: At my election meetings we come to the point.

SPIEGEL: We see, but it was you who always made it quite plain that Europeans and also the Federal Republic have to represent their own interests, if necessary, even interests different than those of the United States.

Schmidt: I did not say it that way, but in the United States, in talks with President Carter and his secretaries as well as among the American public I have pointed out in public speeches that our interest in East-West cooperation in Europe on the basis of the Helsinki joint declaration of intent is of much larger importance to our people, because 25 percent of all Germans live east of the FRG--of far greater interest than to the Canadians, for instance, or the North Americans on the whole or the United States.

I have also always stressed that for this reason our economic cooperation with the Soviet Union is of greater importance to Germans than to Americans, also of greater political importance than to the Americans.

We are interested in having neighborly relations with our Eastern neighbors which rule out a repetition of the horrors of World War II. And we live here on the potential battlefield of world war III. The potential battlefield would not be in Canada or in North America, but here. Therefore, the concerns we sometimes have are different from those others have. It does not mean that our interests have to be different, but there are certain things which concern us more than others.

SPIEGEL: The irritation may stem from a new distribution of weight within the Alliance, from the fact that the superpower United States has had to realize that its allies have gained more weight than they have had up to now.

Schmidt: I do not intend to discuss such rumors. I will simply make a statement: Somebody in the United States who wants to step on the toes of the incumbent President Jimmy Carter is allowed to expound or distort alleged or real nuances in the assessment of problems. Somebody who for domestic political reasons wants to step on the toes of the German federal chancellor in the 1980 election dampaign year is naturally interested--we heard Mr Strauss do it in the Bundestag on Thursday--in blowing up certain nuances in the assessment of some problems like a balloon so as to totally obscure reality. This is normal in election campaign years. Regrettably, it is normal.

SPIEGEL: You have returned from the Soviet Union following difficult but certainly not unpleasant or ugly negotiations 18 days before the Olympic games begin in Moscow in which a German team will not participate because it adopted the U.S. boycott decision in the sense of the U.S. punishment policy pursued to date. Would you still approve of such a boycott decision today? Would you today again recommend to German sportsmen and their officials that they not go to Moscow to the Olympics?

Schmidt: I hope you don't mind if I criticize the formulation of your question in two respects. I never used the term "boycott"....

SPIEGEL: ...But what else is it but a boycott?

Schmidt: ...I never used the term and I will not use it now, because it is not correct. Nor is it correct to say that we joined in an American decision. The truth is that the Federal Government following prior consultation said in the Bundestag in a government statement earlier this year that in case of a continuing intervention in Afghanistan the Federal Government could not recommend the participation of German sportsmen in the summer Olympics intended to serve peace and international understanding. It was up to the Soviet Union, however, to bring about a situation in Afghanistan enabling the teams of all states to participate in the summer games. Such a situation has not been brought about in Afghanistan up to the advent of the summer games, and as long as such a situation has not been brought about I would always make the same recommendation.

SPIEGEL: Mr Federal Chancellor, however credible you are in this country--and the degree of your credibility has been proved to be very high--people naturally do not believe you in this respect. And you can say nothing against our not believing you. We know very well that the United States did exert pressure, and we also know that you personally yielded with reluctance. We do not find it right if the public is told that the Federal Government made this decision on its own initiative. You would never have done it.

Schmidt: If this were a question I would have to think about whether I should answer it. But since it is not a question but an editorial comment I would recommend that you place it beside the interview in a box.

SPIEGEL: Mr Federal Chancellor, we thank you for this talk.

DIE WELT REVEALS 'SECRET' DETAILS OF USSR-FRG MOSCOW TALKS

DW080713 Bonn DIE WELT in German 7 Jul 80 pp 1,2

[Heinz Vielain article: "The Secret Details of the Moscow Talks"]

[Text] Several days after the federal chancellor came back from Moscow, the secret details of the secret talks Helmut Schmidt held with Leonid Brezhnev on problems of nuclear disarmament have now become known to DIE WELT.

Two important aspects of the Moscow talks have thus far not been mentioned in public:

1. Moscow's emphasis that on the West's part only the existing and planned medium-range capabilities of the Americans are to be included in the proposed talks:

According to the available protocol notes, the federal chancellor raised the question as to why the Soviets did not mention the French, British and Chinese medium-range missiles in the context of the conditions for their readiness for talks. He was told by Brezhnev as well as by Premier Kosygin and especially by Foreign Minister Gromyko that the USSR was now solely interested in including the U.S. arms systems that can reach the Soviet Union which are already stationed in Europe. The arms systems of the British and the French were of no interest to them at this point, so only U.S. weapons were involved. All medium-range weapons would have to be discussed in SALT III. But at this point only a "minor scope" was involved.

2. Moscow's opposition to an expansion of NATO through adding new members:

The protocol notes indicate that Brezhnev emphatically warned the federal chancellor about attempts by NATO to enlarge its sphere of action. Spain's NATO membership, which was pursued above all by the United States, would complicate the future situation on the continent. Brezhnev warned verbatim: "You, Mr Federal Chancellor, should carefully consider the consequences of such a step."

An important subject of the talks also was SALT II, according to the protocol notes at hand. The Soviets see their offer to start bilateral talks with the United States on the limitation of medium-range nuclear arms prior to the ratification of SALT II as being in "close connection" with the simultaneous demand that the U.S. nuclear weapons stationed in Europe be given priority in the talks. According to the protocol notes, Brezhnev submitted his proposal as follows: Problems related to arms and missiles of medium range could be discussed immediately without waiting for the ratification of SALT II. It was necessary, however, to include all problems related to medium-range arms. He said that he meant by this concretely that the nuclear arms of the so-called forward based systems were also to be discussed. "These will have to be discussed simultaneously in an inner and inseparable connection [in einem inneren und unaufloesbaren zusammenhang]. That is our firm view."

"In a word: NATO Has More Than We Have. That Is the Reality."

According to the protocol notes, Brezhnev said that he was now going to answer the questions the federal chancellor had asked the previous day on behalf of U.S. President Carter. The first question was whether the Soviets would observe the terms of the SALT II treaty even without ratification. The U.S. Government had already been given an answer to this question. "We confirm anew that the stipulations of this treaty are by no means binding on us as long as the treaty has not actually come into force." This was in accordance with normal international law.

"The present situation of SALT II arouses our most serious concern." The fate of this document which was of broad importance was now jeopardized. In Washington the treaty had been shelved. "They say there that it has not been ratified because of Afghanistan, but this excuse is not correct." Delays in the ratification by the United States had started immediately after the treaty was signed. Brezhnev pointed out that a lot of work had been expended on the process of the negotiations between the Soviet and the U.S. delegations. The road, however, for continuing everything in a good manner was now blocked. "I call this a dangerous policy." The United States bore the sole responsibility for halting the entire SALT process. "But I also must mention a number of NATO countries, including the Federal Republic."

Brezhnev said that the statements made by the federal chancellor were known in which he advocated ratification of the SALT II treaty. "Nevertheless too little is being done to really stimulate the U.S. Government to intensively pursue its ratification."

The second question posed was about the possibility of holding so-called preliminary talks on SALT III without waiting for the ratification of SALT II. Brezhnev said that the Soviets were considering the prospects of negotiations on arms limitations, but they asked themselves whether it would really be worthwhile to resume talks on SALT III without knowing how things would go with SALT II. "We have come to the conclusion that it is of no use to us."

On the contrary, it would further diminish the chances for a ratification of SALT II and much uncertainty would loom over any form of SALT III negotiations. But he would eventually discuss the aspects of this problem.

The Soviet general secretary said that an analysis of the consequences of the decision made by NATO to close the arms gap made it plain to Moscow that this decision constituted a dogged attempt to destroy the whole strategic balance. It was known that the United States had expressly recognized the existence of such a strategic balance. President Carter had also said so in Vienna. "That is known. It is the same balance which you, Mr Federal Chancellor, during our previous talks also said in all seriousness exists."

Brezhnev stated that he wanted to come directly to the point: "The NATO decision was not simply pressed upon you by the United States, but you also--the Federal Government--cleared the way for such a dangerous decision, working in this sense on other NATO members also and bringing influence to bear on them."

The impression had been gained in the Soviet Union that particularly an increase in the nuclear potential was involved. In connection with all this the well-known theses of a Soviet threat had been used as a justification for NATO plans. The danger brought about by the existence of the so-called SS-20 missiles had been "very greatly inflated."

In this connection he wanted to stress most firmly that the stationing of such so-called medium-range missiles in the Western parts of the USSR was just a "substitute" for older missiles. Nobody could say that this represented a new situation. These were indeed more modern missiles than the earlier ones, but one could not say that this was a weapon which did not exist before. Moreover, these missiles did not mean an addition of nuclear explosives. It had been stated publicly that there was even a decrease.

There were a greater number of launchers for nuclear warheads threatening the Soviets and their allies than launchers with charges on the Soviet side which could reach NATO countries. "In short: NATO has more than we do. This is what reality looks like."

Everybody ought to realize that approximate military equality existed between West and East. The Soviet Union did not strive for military superiority with first strike capabilities. In the fall of 1979 the USSR publicly suggested negotiations on the reduction of such medium-range missiles. At that time preparedness to withdraw nuclear arms from the Western part of the USSR was declared. One assumed at that time that additional nuclear arms would not be stationed in Western Europe.

Today one had to ask oneself in the Soviet Union whether the leaders of the European states of the NATO system realized the consequences emanating from their decision to station U.S. missiles in Europe. The basis for that decision was the Americans' figuring on eventually gaining military superiority. If such American arms were stationed in Europe, it would be aggressive armament of high strategic value.

The Americans figured, and the German federal chancellor ought to view this with attention, that in case of nuclear war they would be on the other side of the ocean. The fate of their European allies would leave them completely unconcerned. In this way the United States could after all achieve unilateral superiority. "I assure you with all certainty that in case such American missiles should be stationed in Western Europe, the USSR and its allies will take those measures which will reestablish the balance."

Brezhnev said he very much doubted whether the Federal Republic really wanted this kind of a development.

Brezhnev said it would be much better if negotiations began soon on medium-range missiles, negotations the Soviet side had suggested repeatedly. He repeated: The situation must be reestablished that existed in Europe prior to the NATO decision of last December. "You are aware of this suggestion. It will remain as we have put it."

Out of consideration for opinions existing in NATO, the Soviets would be prepared for a variant of these considerations. The USSR had announced that the problem of medium-range missiles could not be discussed in separate talks, but only within the framework of future negotiations called SALT III. It had to be considered in this connection, however, that there were many forces bringing influence to bear on a strategic situation and shaping it. No objections existed with regard to such a plan, as had been heard. But the way in this direction was blocked because the United States did not do anything for the ratification of SALT II; it would probably neglect it completely.

On the contrary, said Brezhnev, the production and stationing of medium-range missiles is being greatly increased. "This is the actual situation. It is like this." It was really very difficult to avoid gaining the impression that the NATO states are not working on a solution of the problem at all.

Brezhnev said it is possible that the West might now cite the suggestion about renouncing the stationing of medium-range missiles in Europe. "We have studied that." But since this involves only the Soviet Union, everybody would understand that this is a completely different handling of the problem. "Naturally we do not agree to that." He did not want to add any details, but just stressed that one must not lose sight of the far-reaching interests of peace and security.

Then Brezhnev told the chancellor that a new suggestion had been thought of which up to that moment had not been outlined to anybody. He meant the following: The treatment of problems connected with such arms and medium-range missiles could begin immediately, without any delay. So it meant that one could start handling these problems immediately, without waiting for the ratification of SALT II. In doing this, however, it would be necessary to include all questions involved pertaining to medium-range arms. In doing this one ought to discuss all sides of the problem and also solve them.

"In saying this I mean concretely that we ought to not only discuss medium-range missiles, but also those nuclear arms involving the so-called forward based systems [FBS]. They must be handled simultaneously in an "inner and inseparable connection. That is our firm opinion."

On this point Schmidt turned to Gromyko, requesting an explanation. The chancellor wanted to know why Brezhnev "Did not mention the English, French and Chinese medium-range arms." Schmidt: "Does it mean that these (the non-American medium-range arms, editorial board) will have no bearing on the described situation?"

Gromyko answered in Russian that Moscow was concerned exclusively with the American FBS. "The instruments of the others do not interest us here." Only in connection with SALT III did one want to discuss the medium-range arms of all. At the moment one had a "smaller framework" in mind.

Brezhnev confirmed: "These are our thoughts. I wanted to say this to you and you ought to pass it on to President Carter in the same way," so the federal chancellor could see that the USSR wants to have contractual agreements. If the Federal Republic of Germany itself remained interested in halting the dangers of military conflicts which had grown, it could now play a "significant role" by aiming for "all-round, just solutions."

Brezhnev stressed that he also wanted to touch on another issue: it was obvious that NATO was trying to extend the area of its activity as well as its functions, and that it was trying to recruit new members. "That can be clearly seen with regard to the Spanish case." But it is clear that including Spain in NATO, which the United States is aiming for particularly, would complicate the future situation on the continent. "You, Mr Federal Chancellor, ought to consider most carefully the consequences of such a step."

Brezhnev stated that the socialist states had repeatedly suggested another method, namely, the "nonexpansion of military pacts." It was the Soviet standpoint that no further steps should be made with regard to the establishment of blocs. It would be detrimental to detente.

"We Do Not Want Nuclear Arms--I Am Just a Messenger"

According to the protocol notes, Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt first expressed thanks for the important answer to the question of President Carter. He stated that he was "just a messenger in both directions." The Federal Republic of Germany had no nuclear arms and "does not want to have any in the future. To that extend I am not a negotiating partner." Yet he wanted to make two remarks.

The Federal Republic of Germany, as could be imagined, had a basic and profound interest in the further development of arms control and arms limitation. Its territory served, on the one hand, as a place for stationing nuclear arms, while, on the other hand, it would thus become a target for possible military conflicts.

His first remark was that what was said about responsibility for the delay in SALT II ratification with regard to the point where the Soviet side talked about the Federal Republic sharing this responsibility was not correct. He himself suported ratification while in the United States in such a frank way that the administration over there considered it almost an insult. "The problem is that the government over there cannot give orders to the Senate."

Schmidt reminded Brezhnev that a two-thirds majority in the Senate is necessary to gain ratification, but it did not exist at present. It was part of the democratic process in America that the administration must strive for the approval of the Senate. One must have a feeling for this in order to overcome the difficulties that might come up in this connection.

The chancellor said further in this connection that there was no contradiction in the system. In saying this he meant that a majority of senators support SALT II now, but that there was no two-thirds majority necessary for ratification. If he had understood President Carter correctly, he had disrupted ratification procedures because otherwise he would have reason to fear another defeat in the Senate.

The chancellor assured Brezhnev that he was under the impression that the U.S. administration now and in the future would remain interested in ratification. Had Carter suffered a defeat on SALT II, a provisional application of the treaty would have been impossible. "I will naturally pass your suggestion to President Carter. It seems very interesting to me."

Then the chancellor stated that he wanted to repeat Brezhnev's suggestion in a summarized form.

First, immediate beginning of talks on medium-range missiles, without waiting for SALT II ratification. (Brezhnev agrees.)

Second, the Soviets demanded that all elements of the strategic situation ought to be considered, particularly the American FBS. (Gromyko adds: not particularly but due to the internal connection with FBS.)

Third, the USSR suggested that these should be bilateral talks between the United States and the Soviet Union.

Fourth, Brezhnev assumed that if an agreement were achieved it would become effective only once SALT II had been ratified.

Schmidt added the following remark after stating that he could not say this as a representative of one of the negotiating sides, but only due to his special interest in the problems. It seemed to him that FBS would be considered and that "it will not be forgotten to include your SS-5, SS-20 and the Backfire bomber in the negotiations." (Kosygin: "so this is your proposal now.") Gromyko whispers to Brezhnev. Brezhnev states: "It is said that the appetite comes from eating." Kosygin to the chancellor: "So that is your proposal now?" Schmidt: "It was just a remark I ventured to make."

Then the chancellor said that he wanted to return to another remark addressed to the German side. Schmidt recalled the talks with Brezhnev at Gymnich Castle near Bonn - (1978; editorial board), with Kosygin and Gromyko 1 year ago at the Moscow airport, and with Gromyko once more in November last year, and that he pointed out on all occasions his "persisting concern" with regard to the topic being discussed now. He had said 2 years ago that the possibility was very close of speaking about the existence of an "approximate balance" and of an "approximate parity" of armament.

"I foresaw at that time that the balance would experience a change due to the Soviet SS-20 and the Backfire." He said that he must state today that he felt "considerable concern" with regard to that change. "The Soviet Union in the past 2 years had deployed a new SS-20 system every week." The SS-20 missiles have three warheads. The old SS-4 and SS-5 had just one warhead.

Schmidt outlined to Brezhnev that in 1970 Soviet medium-range missiles were equipped with some 600 warheads while today there were 1,350 warheads. "Moreover your new system is mobile," that is, without fixed positions. "They can be reloaded," and the range could also be increased.

OPPOSITION SPOKESMAN SCORES SOVIET DISARMAMENT PROPOSAL

LD041145 Hamburg DPA in German 1025 GMT 4 Jul 80

[Text] Bonn--Manfred Woerner, opposition security policy spokesman, in Bonn stated today that the Soviet proposal, announced by Chancellor Helmut Schmidt, that talks on medium-range nuclear weapons be started before ratification of the SALT-II treaty, makes it certain that there will be another German-American dispute. He said that in the future the Federal Republic and the Soviet Union, in an unholy alliance, will demand the ratification of SALT II. If this does not happen, it then will be stated that implementation of the NATO decision on counterarming will not be possible because the United States had not fulfilled the conditions. Woerner stated that thus "the Soviet proposal is deeply and above all anti-American."

Woerner stated that the Soviet proposal shifts responsibility for the continuation of the arms limitation talks onto the United States. In the event of failure the Americans would then get the blame. The NATO counterarming decision thus is craftily turned into a conditional matter. The extension of the talks to include all nuclear systems in the field of medium-range weapons and forward-based systems makes successful arms limitation as good as insoluble.

Woerner described the Federal Government's reaction to the Soviet offer on talks as naive. He said that this and a predominantly uncritical attitude by the press, suggests that the Soviets have achieved their objective.

GISCARD INTERVIEWED ON RELATIONS WITH FRG

DW070949 Frankfurt FRANKFURTER RUNDSCHAU in German 7 Jul 80 p 1

[Paris correspondent Lutz Krusche undated interview in Paris with French President Valery Giscard d'Estaing]

[Text] FRANKFURTER RUNDSCHAU: Your visit to Germany will be the first official visit of a French chief of state since that of General de Gaulle in 1962. What basic differences exist in French-German relations today compared with De Gaulle's times ?

Giscard d'Estaing: The visit by General de Gaulle to Germany some 17 years ago marked a change in the history of our two people. It symbolized their will for reconciliation which was confirmed 1 year later by the signing of the "Elysee Treaty" on 22 January 1963. Reconciliation is an established fact today. It was the necessary basis for strong future common action based on our feeling of solidarity on the European continent as well as on our relations with the rest of the world, where our common efforts must strengthen the role of Europe. French-German relations have developed on all levels and in all fields. They have experienced an upswing and achieved a quality surpassing everything one could have hoped for in 1962. My visit is a confirmation of this reality and the solidity of French-German cooperation. It is evidence of the significance of this cooperation with regard to the action of our states and the basic dimension it represents.

FRANKFURTER RUNDSCHAU: Your visit will take place 3 months prior to the elections in the Federal Republic, and it is certainly not without domestic political significance. How are your relations with "Anglophile" Federal Chancellor Schmidt, and to what extent does this influence cooperation between our two states?

Giscard d'Estaing: My relations with Chancellor Schmidt are based on friendship and confidence. If they have contributed something to the quality of relations between our two states, then I am happy about it. But I believe that they are primarily based on the feeling of our solidity on the European continent, a feeling shared by the French and the Germans. Since this is so, it is important that the responsible people of the two countries exchange opinions frankly and trustfully, discuss difficult and complex problems and seek reasonable answers together. Our action becomes more effective in this way. This is to the benefit of French-German cooperation, but also to the benefit of Europe as a whole, for which it is significant element.

FRANKFURTER RUNDSCHAU: You are the president of all Frenchmen, including the 50 percent who are leftists. Why is a great part of the French leftists so "anti-Federal Republic"? Do you think they would like it if you visited the GDR? Have you considered that possibility?
